Mrs. Clinton, mindful of the biracial coalition Mr. Obama built in South Carolina in 2008 when he handed her a stinging loss, has already visited its African-American population centers twice. Mr. Sanders has yet to reschedule his first trip.

"She's talking about the issues we care about," said Bakari Sellers, a former South Carolina state representative who is black and is supporting Mrs. Clinton. "Whether it's voting rights or police reform, Hillary is attacking them head-on."

As for Mr. Sanders, he said, "I'm not hearing Bernie Sanders's name at the barbershops."

Bernie Sanders Walks A Fine Line On Gun Control // NPR // Jessica Taylor – June 24, 2015

In the wake of last week's Charleston church shootings, 2016 Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders explained his competing concerns between gun rights and gun safety.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I think guns and gun control is an issue that needs to be discussed," Sanders told NPR's David Greene in an interview that will air on Thursday's Morning Edition. "Let me add to that, I think that urban America has got to respect what rural America is about, where 99 percent of the people in my state who hunt are law abiding people."

In the wake of the tragedy that took the lives of nine African-American parishioners at the Mother Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church, many Democratic politicians have renewed calls to tighten gun-control measures. Sanders said he's open to a conversation about what to do next on gun-control measures and would go along with stricter background checks, for example. But he noted in the interview that those measures alone wouldn't solve the problem of gun violence in America.

"So obviously, we need strong sensible gun control, and I will support it," Sanders told Greene. "But some people think it's going to solve all of our problems, and it's not. You know what, we have a crisis in the capability of addressing mental health illness in this country. When people are hurting and are prepared to do something terrible, we need to do something immediately. We don't have that and we should have that."

For left-leaning senators from largely rural, pro-gun states — like Vermont — it can be tough to strike a balance talking about guns. Sanders has had a mixed voting record on guns. He voted to end the "gun-show loophole" and in favor of the 2013 universal background check bill and assault-weapons ban following Sandy Hook Elementary school massacre that left 20 children dead. But, previously, Sanders voted to allow guns on Amtrak and against the Brady bill.

It's a stance that could prove problematic for the insurgent White House hopeful. While Sanders has staked out forthright positions mostly to the left of former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, guns is one issue where he is more toward the middle of the current field. It's one he doesn't bring up as often as his other rivals, either.

Sanders explained that as a representative of his state, he has to have their interests at heart, but argued that could put him at a good place to bridge a compromise.

"I think the people of Vermont and I have understood for many years that what guns are about in Vermont are not what guns are about in Chicago, Los Angeles or New York, where they're used not for hunting or target practice but to kill people," Sanders said. "I think, interestingly enough, I'm in a very good position representing a rural state to bring forth common-sense legislation regarding guns."

He added, "I can understand if some Democrats or Republicans represent an urban area where people don't hunt, don't do target practice, they're not into guns. But in my state, people go hunting and do target practice. Talking about cultural divides in this country, you know, it is important for people in urban America to understand that families go out together and kids go out together and they hunt and enjoy the outdoors and that is a lifestyle that should not be condemned."

For more from Sanders on foreign policy, his 2016 chances and more, tune into Morning Edition on Thursday.

This Quirky New Hampshire Law Might Keep Bernie Sanders Off The Ballot // NPR // Jessica Taylor – June 24, 2015

Presidential hopeful Bernie Sanders is on the rise in New Hampshire. But that might not matter if the Independent senator from Vermont can't get on the Democratic ballot in the first-in-the-nation primary state.

Due to a quirky New Hampshire filing process — and Sanders's status as an independent rather than a registered Democrat — there are lingering questions about how easy it will be for him file for the primary next year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

State law says that presidential candidates must be a registered member of the party whose primary ballot they are trying to get on. In fact, the Declaration of Candidacy they must fill out is fairly straightforward (emphasis added):

I, _____, swear under penalties of perjury that I am qualified to be a candidate for president of the United States pursuant to article II, section 1, clause 4 of the United States Constitution, which states, "No person except a natural born citizen, or a citizen of the United States, at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of President; neither shall any person be eligible to that office who shall not have attained to the age of thirty-five years, and been fourteen years a resident within the United States." I further declare that I am domiciled in _____, in the city (or town or unincorporated place) of _____, county of _____, state of _____, that I am a registered member of the _____ party; that I am a candidate for the nomination for the office of president to be made at the primary election to be held on the _____ day of _____; and I hereby request that my name be printed on the official primary ballot of said _____ party as a candidate for such nomination.

It's one of those blanks that is problematic — asking candidates to say "that I am a registered member of the _____ party. Sanders is not a registered member of the Democratic Party, having been elected every time as an independent. Early in his career, he made failed runs as part of the Liberty Union Party.

He did appear on the Democratic primary ballot in Vermont for the Senate in both 2006 and 2012, winning their primary, but he declined the nomination both times so he could run as an independent. Still, the avowed socialist has always caucused with Democrats and is even ranking member of the Senate Budget Committee.

Former Rep. Charlie Bass, R-N.H., says that isn't enough evidence for the Vermont senator to make the cut, especially with his explicit rejection of the Democratic nomination in his state twice.

"In short, Sanders is not a Democrat, has not been elected as a Democrat, has never served as a Democrat and cannot plausibly claim, at least in New Hampshire, to be a Democrat," Bass wrote in a Washington Post op-ed.

Even if he wanted to register as a Democrat, he couldn't — Vermont, like 19 other states in the country, doesn't have party registration. Other previous candidates for president who came from states that didn't register by party — such as both George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush from Texas and Al Gore from Tennessee — were able to prove a party history because they had been on ballots and won primaries many times.

But Sanders's candidacy presents the state with a quandary it hasn't faced before — and one that its top elections official isn't even sure how it will shake out.

"Whenever the question has come up, there was some way to usually show the person has been on the ballot of that party," New Hampshire's long-serving Secretary of State Bill Gardner told NPR. "I really don't know."

Gardner noted that if Sanders does put down Democrat and there are any challenges to the validity of that, or if he is rejected outright, disputes would be heard by the New Hampshire Ballot Law Commission. The five-member committee is made up of three Republicans and two Democrats.

For their part, Sanders's campaign doesn't seem to be worried yet. "We don't think it's going to be an issue," his spokesman, Michael Briggs, told Politico. Briggs did not respond to a request for comment from NPR.

One thing Sanders does have on his side is that both the national and state party have recognized him as a legitimate Democratic candidate for president.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"At the end of the day, Sen. Sanders will appear on the New Hampshire Democratic Party ballot," New Hampshire Democratic Party Chairman Ray Buckley confidently predicted.

He told NPR he believes "the law is very clear" that its parties determine who is on their party's ballot, and that "we would be the ones, if it were necessary, to take the secretary of state to court" to ensure Sanders is on the ballot.

The quirky law and wording is actually one that is unique to just the Granite State, according to Richard Winger, who publishes the Ballot Access News newsletter.

"New Hampshire just doesn't ever seem to worry that its election laws might be unconstitutional, because they should," said Winger.

He pointed to a 1986 Supreme Court case, Tashjian v. Republican Party, which struck down a Connecticut law that primary voters had to be members of that party after the Connecticut GOP adopted a law allowing independent voters to vote in their primaries. Winger says that case could be used to justify getting Sanders on the ballot, too, since the state party supports his inclusion.

"New Hampshire is the only state dumb enough to say a candidate has to be a registered member of that party," said Winger.

Sanders struggling to get his message out to Latino and black voters, experts say // Fox News Latino // June 24, 2015

Vermont senator and presidential candidate Bernie Sanders may be seeing a surge in popularity in the early primary state of New Hampshire, but that doesn't appear to be translating with either Latino or African-American voters.

A notoriously small crowd gathered last week during his speech at the National Association of Latino Elected Officials (NALEO), appearing to indicate that even when overwhelmingly popular in the white Granite State and throughout the generally progressive state of New England, Sanders still has a good deal of work to when it comes winning over Latino voters.

"His name recognition in the Latino community is somewhere in between zero and extremely low," Matt Barreto, a pollster who focuses on Latino voters, told the Los Angeles Times. "And you're not going to win an election without Latino support."

The outspoken lawmaker, who is 73, has spent his lengthy political career campaigning for votes in Vermont – a state that is 94 percent white – and has little experience in focusing a campaign on minority issues. The oldest presidential candidate to so far jump into the fray so far, many observers say that he will likely have trouble appealing to an overwhelming younger Latino electorate in key swing states like Nevada and Colorado.

"If your only significant constituency is older white voters, that'll be good in Iowa and New Hampshire, but when you hit Nevada and South Carolina you're in another world," Democratic strategist Bill Carrick said. "If you're going to be the nominee, you're going to have to do pretty well among Latino, African American voters, women, single women and millennials. That's the challenge for Bernie Sanders — to become more than a niche candidate and become a candidate with a broad coalition of support."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Despite the low attendance last week during his speech at NALEO, Sanders was well received by the crowd and he addressed the immigration head-on after being previously criticized for focusing too much on other issues. The self-described socialist painted his views on the issue through an economic spectrum, while also giving a personal anecdote about his own upbringing in an immigrant household – a departure for a candidate who usually forgoes stories about his past.

"We cannot continue to run an economy where millions are made so vulnerable because of their undocumented status," Sanders said. "Who benefits from this exploitation?"

Along with Latinos, Sanders also has his work cut for him with the African-American community, as - despite his work in the civil rights movement and his friendship with Jesse Jackson - even Sanders admits he is little known among the demographic compared to his rival Hillary Clinton.

In the last week, Clinton has not rested on her laurels as she has spoken forcefully about race relations and gun control in the wake of the deadly church shooting in Charleston, S.C. and she visited a black church on Tuesday near Ferguson, Mo., where the killing of an unarmed black man by a white police officer in August ignited protests nationwide.

Sanders, on the other hand, has derided "the ugly stain of racism that still taints our nation," but he has yet to take the subject on in a forceful way.

"We're reaching out, but it's no secret that Bernie represents a state that is heavily Caucasian, and his decades of work on issues of importance to African-Americans aren't known amid the national conversation on race that is underway," Jeff Weaver, Sanders's campaign manager, told the New York Times. "I don't think it's presumptuous of him to speak out on these issues. And his message — the need for more good-paying jobs and opening up higher education regardless of wealth and family background — will have strong appeal with African-Americans and many other voters."

Sanders ability to appeal to Latino and African-American is seen by many as a test of his relevance as a candidate and whether or not he can be a real challenge to Clinton come nomination time or will be just someone helping shape the dialogue during the Democratic debates.

A recent CNN poll found that just 5 percent of nonwhite Democratic voters said they were likely to support Sanders compared with 65 percent who favored Clinton (in 2008 Clinton beat up 2-to-1 in garnering the Latino vote.)

Clinton has already made concerted efforts in going after Latino voters - laying out her immigration plan last month at a Las Vegas high school, hiring well-known "Dreamer" Lorella Praeli to work on her campaign and sending her campaign's political director, Amanda Renteria, to NALEO to shake hands and make contacts ahead of Clinton's speech.

While Clinton has broadened her support base and her campaigning to minority groups, Sanders is perceived as being the candidate for the tie-dyed, white Vermont liberals.

"The Bernie Sanders voter is still a Volvo-driving, financially comfortable liberal who is pretty much white," said pollster Paul Maslin.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Here is the reality of the American economy. Despite an explosion in technology and a huge increase in worker productivity, the middle class of this country continues its 40-year decline. Today, millions of Americans are working longer hours for lower wages and median family income is almost $5,000 less than it was in 1999.

Meanwhile, the wealthiest people and the largest corporations are doing phenomenally well. Today, 99 percent of all new income is going to the top 1 percent, while the top one-tenth of 1 percent own almost as much wealth as the bottom 40 percent. In the last two years, the wealthiest 14 people in this country increased their wealth by $157 billion. That increase is more than is owned by the bottom 130 million Americans -- combined.

Over the last 40 years, the largest corporations in this country have closed thousands of factories in the United States and outsourced millions of American jobs to low-wage countries overseas. That is why we need a new trade policy and why I am opposed to the 12-nation Trans-Pacific Partnership now before Congress.

Large corporations and their lobbyists have created loopholes enabling corporations to avoid an estimated $100 billion a year in taxes by shifting profits to the Cayman Islands and other offshore tax havens. That is why we need real tax reform which demands that the very wealthy and large corporations start paying their fair share of taxes.

Corporate America has mounted vigorous anti-union campaigns, making it harder for workers to collectively bargain for decent wages and benefits. That is why we must make certain that workers are given a fair chance to join a union.

As a result of the Supreme Court's disastrous Citizens United decision, corporations and the very wealthy are now spending billions to elect candidates who will represent their interests. That is why we need a constitutional amendment to overturn Citizens United and move toward public funding of elections.

Instead of putting resources into innovative ways to build their businesses or hire new employees, corporations are pumping 98 percent of their record-breaking profits into buying back their own stock and increasing dividends to benefit their executives and wealthy shareholders at the expense of their workers. It is a major reason why CEOs are now making nearly 300 times what the typical worker makes.

We have got to demand that corporations stop manipulating their shares to reward their executives and billionaire shareholders through the use of stock buybacks.

We also must do a lot more to rebuild the middle class, check corporate greed and make our economy work again for working families.

We need to raise the minimum wage to $15 an hour over the next several years. With 70 percent of the economy dependent on consumers buying goods and services, the best way to expand the economy is to raise wages and create good jobs to increase the purchasing power of the American people.

We need to create millions of decent-paying jobs rebuilding our crumbling infrastructure; our roads, bridges, dams, rail, airports, levees and dams.

We need to pass pay equity for women workers. It is not acceptable that women receive 78 cents on the dollar compared to male workers doing the same job.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We need to end the scandal of companies taking advantage of outdated rules to avoid paying overtime to "supervisors" -- often earning less than $30,000 a year -- when they clock 50 or 60 hours a week on the job.

We need to make certain that every worker in this country receives guaranteed paid sick leave and vacation time.

We need to encourage business models that provide employees the tools to purchase their own businesses through Employee Stock Ownership Plans and worker-owned cooperatives. Workers at employer-owned companies are more motivated, productive and satisfied with their jobs.

It is time to say loudly and clearly that corporate greed and the war against the American middle class must end. Enough is enough!

Bernie Sanders & Cornel West: The radical alliance that could change everything // Salon // Matthew Pulver – June 24, 2015

Senator Bernie Sanders' presidential campaign is already enjoying success that few could have predicted. Bernie is a big deal. Well, OK, if you're a white progressive he's a big deal. Otherwise, you may have no idea who he is, according to reporting this morning in the New York Times. The Times' Patrick Healy and Jonathan Martin write that "black voters have shown little interest in [Sanders]" and that "[e]ven his own campaign advisers acknowledge that Mr. Sanders is virtually unknown to many African-Americans, an enormously important Democratic constituency."

But as his presidential campaign gains altitude and attention, Sanders may be on the way to securing the most difficult black progressive endorsement there is: the blessing of Professor Cornel West, one of America's leading public intellectuals. Celebrity is rare in American academe, but the eccentric West (along with MIT's Noam Chomsky) is something of a superstar scholar. He's our Slavoj Žižek, but with far better hair and a sense of fashion.

Speaking with Grit TV's Laura Flanders in early June, the black academic icon was asked by the host if he will be supporting the increasingly popular candidate for president.

"I love brother Bernie," West replied. "He tells the truth about Wall Street. He really does."

But West, who feels burned and spurned by President Obama, his team, and the Democratic Party generally, then turned immediately to the specter of Hillary Clinton. Sanders, though an independent socialist in the Senate, is running for the Democratic Party ticket, and West worried aloud about submission to the party hegemon, Secretary Clinton.

"I'm not a Hillary Clinton fan at all," he said resolutely. "So if he uses his power to hand it over to her I'll be deeply upset."

West, ever-critical and stubbornly conscientious, was an early skeptic of then-Senator Obama's campaign in 2007-08, only to sign on to the Obama team and do 65 events for the candidate after a conversation between the two convinced West of Obama's progressive bona fides. Similarly, West has withheld a ringing and thorough endorsement of Sanders, citing Sanders' positions on the Israel-Palestine conflict.

"But I also think, in terms of foreign policy, on the one hand we have escalating anti-Jewish hatred around the world, and we've got to fight anti-Jewish hatred under all conditions," West began. "On the other hand, we have a vicious Israeli occupation that needs to be highlighted, because occupations are wrong."

West continued: "I don't hear my dear brother Bernie hitting that, and I'm not gonna sell my precious Palestinian brothers and sisters down the river only because of U.S. politics. The truth cuts over and against whatever the political arrangement is. So we've got to be able to somehow keep track of anti-Jewish hatred, which is evil, and occupations of whatever sort—in this case, the vicious Israeli occupation that's evil as well. And I think Bernie might pull back on some of those issues."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senator Sanders has caught some flak for what's seen by some as a less-than-progressive position on the Israeli occupation of Palestinian territory and its insanely disproportionate responses to extremists' attacks from Gaza. Much of the recent criticism seems to be founded on a contentious town hall meeting with constituents in August 2014, when the senator and progressive pro-Palestine attendees descended into a shouting match, during which verbal fray he angrily told an interrupting interlocutor to "shut up!"

It must be said that Sanders' positions and rhetoric on the Israeli occupation are reliably to the left of virtually all of Congress, if only marginally. But it must also be said, however, that being slightly leftward of the pack on Israel-Palestine in Washington is a far cry from active dissent in support of Palestinians' rights to territory and safety. West voices the frustrations of many who see Sanders' marginal progressivism on the conflict as much too little to affect the monolithic support which otherwise characterizes both parties. Some might even see Sanders as a curious, misshapen crag on that monolith.

Sanders appears a little (but only a little) freer to buck D.C.'s lock-step approval of Israeli occupation and aggression. The summer 2014 Israeli war on Gaza, which so angered the Vermont town hall attendees, was endorsed by 79 senators (40 Democrats and 39 Republicans) via Resolution 498, which Sanders refused to cosponsor. The resolution was adopted unanimously without a vote, so a refusal to cosponsor is something like a vote against the proclamation. However, Senators are permitted the right to object (which Sanders did not) when unanimous support for a resolution is requested, making Sanders' refusal to cosponsor the measure something like a whisper of disapproval.

And whispers don't stop wars.

The war on Gaza officially sanctioned by the U.S. Senate left more than 2,100 Gazans dead, 500 of them children, with the Israeli citizen death toll at 6, one of whom was a child. The (very much bipartisan) narrative that Hamas and other extremists' rocket attacks share any sort of commensurability with the Israel Defense Forces' assault is vehemently rejected by American leftists and many progressives—that is, much of the base on whose support Sanders' campaign relies.

Sanders was also the first senator to boycott Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's address to congress in March of this year, just half a year after the Gaza war. But Sanders explained his rationale in terms of partisan etiquette, not moral objection to the Netanyahu government's actions. Sanders cited the crass campaigning he saw in the prime minister's visit, what he viewed as the "Congress of the United States being used as a prop or a photo opportunity for [Netanyahu's] reelection campaign." The internationally recognized criminality of the Israeli state's occupation was left unmentioned as a reason to boycott the address.

That doesn't cut it for West on Israel and Palestine. But even a passing grade from Professor West is tantamount to an endorsement these days, as West's critical blade has been ground to a razor-sharp edge in the years since President Obama's inauguration. West has weaponized his singular word-smithing and placed the president in his verbal crosshairs, calling Obama a "war criminal," a "Rockefeller Republican in blackface," a "global George Zimmerman," a "black mascot of these Wall Street oligarchs," a "drone presidency" and a "counterfeit."

Senator Sanders is constitutionally incapable of committing most of the sins West attributes to Obama. While Obama might have been labeled a "socialist" by Republicans, he is in many ways a defender of the neoliberal status quo. Sanders is a proud democratic socialist. A Sanders foreign policy would very likely look less hawkish than Obama's, and his would certainly be less trigger-happy than a potential Clinton Pentagon.

Though he's become something of a pariah in black academic circles, West is still a captivating and rousing speaker and Sanders could perhaps use West on the campaign trail. He might not be someone Sanders brings along in Iowa or New Hampshire, but once the campaign trail swings south and to the cosmopolitan coasts, West might be a valuable voice in places Sanders' unpolished, heavily Brooklynite earnestness doesn't work as well. And Sanders could be the candidate West thought he was getting in Obama.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Bernie Sanders Phenomenon // The Hill // David Russell – June 24, 2015

As this very early stage of the presidential campaign continues, the speculation is rampant as to the outcome of the nominating process and then the election itself. Despite media bias, which includes burying stories, misrepresentation, dismissal and ridicule, Sen. Bernie Sanders's (I-Vt.) candidacy is becoming a reality. He is actually gaining traction.

Sanders appears at a rally in Colorado that draws a crowd that is at least as large as Hillary Clinton's "kickoff" event in New York and larger than any crowd attracted by the Republican candidates. Ann Coulter, conservative political commentator, and certainly no fan of Democrats, suggests Sanders would be a stronger candidate against Republicans than Clinton. Why? Because he appeals to the American workers, rather than Clinton, "who's now on the side of the Chamber of Commerce." According to the most recent Suffolk University poll, Sanders and Clinton are essentially tied among men in New Hampshire, even though Clinton holds a 19 percentage point lead among women.

The most intriguing comment of late was quoted by a middle-aged conservative leaving a Sanders rally in Iowa. Paraphrasing: "He may actually have a chance. What he says should appeal to everyone I know."

Most everything that is written or said at this point in the campaign needs to be taken as hyperbole, since it is really early and the time when inaugural events of the season receive the enthusiasm of base support that overstates broad acceptance. It is still the fact that only 25 percent of the electorate identify themselves as liberal, versus 35 percent as conservative. It is still the fact that the overwhelming polling results show Clinton's lead over Sanders starting at 38 percent and moving up from there to 55 percent (Real Clear Politics has Clinton's lead over Sanders averaging 47 percent). It is also clear that Clinton has shifted her rhetoric to a more progressive tone, and that will impact voters as more moderates enter the fray. It is also the case that Sanders is relatively unknown and has very little of name recognition enjoyed by Clinton.

We have argued that Sanders actually does have a chance, not just because the message is candid and direct, but because his appeal crosses party lines. The "disappearing middle class" he refers to includes 80 percent of the Republican Party. Coulter is right: Sanders actually does pose a greater threat to a Republican candidate more so than Clinton.

So, the question becomes how that threat can, or should, materialize? Starting with the facts on the ground, it is the case that Sanders has raised money from over 200,000 contributors whose contributions averaged $40. What if Sanders had access to the Obama for America contact list that included 13.5 million donors? To quote from an article that appeared in Reader Supported News, "According to Marshall Ganz, one of the architects of Obama's 2008 organizing strategy, Obama's campaign had 3,000 organizers who recruited thousands more local leaders, who then helped mobilize 1.5 million volunteers and 13.5 million contributors." What would happen if that support moved to the Sanders's column? Not likely right now, but you never know.

Sanders's independent status in the Senate may be remembered when he filibustered in 2010 against extending "tax breaks for the wealthy." At the time, he was considered quite the maverick, but he is now joined by Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), whose agenda and presence has literally changed the dynamic of the Senate Democratic caucus. It is no longer easy for senators to "get along by going along," and her powerful stance against the influence of Wall Street banks, income inequality and the Trans-Pacific Partnership has created an underlying current that forced or permitted Clinton's move to the left as she began her campaign. While Warren has publicly endorsed Clinton, the legitimacy of progressive stances also indirectly benefit Sanders. And Warren's astuteness as a politician virtually guarantees that she will end up endorsing either outcome, also a plus for Sanders.

The compelling need for Sanders at the moment is not just "more of the same." His message does resonate with virtually every worker, at every level, irrespective of party affiliation. It is clear that his current strategy of being as ever present and available in the primary efforts in New Hampshire and Iowa and engaging in other venues to introduce himself will, and should, continue. This strategy is garnering success.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What he has also to address is the media's need to continuously slander him with innuendo. "Sanders the socialist from Vermont." "Sanders rumored to have dual Israeli citizenship." "Sanders the grumpy old man." Or the repeated exclusion of his name from discussion or consideration when campaign topics are addressed.

In the past, Sanders has made himself continuously available to MSNBC, which draws essentially no one other than its less than 1 million viewers. Moving up to a slot on "Real Time with Bill Maher," which he did this past week, broadens the audience to 4 million viewers. So, if he can keep snagging coverage from National Public Radio, that number would rise to 34 million (the average listening audience for its news broadcasts). But he needs to extend that reach to the guys who speak to conservatives like Don Imus (3.25 million average), Rush Limbaugh (14.25 million), Bill O'Reilly (3.2 million), Sean Hannity (11.75 million), Dr. Laura Schlesinger (8.5 million), Michael Savage (7 million), etc.

It is not just because Sanders needs to introduce himself cross party lines; it is because he is indifferent to bluster. While conservatives like Limbaugh, O'Reilly or Hannity have made it their preferred mode of operation to interrupt, outshout or bully their interviewees, Sanders is impervious, and he stays on message no matter what is being said. And that is all that is actually needed. He needs to do as he has done for the past 40 years: just keep saying the same simplified message over and over again. It is hard to listen to if you're expecting variety, but his is the right message. Bernie Sanders is a true phenomenon.

Sanders' 'Shocking' Senior Statistic // FactCheck.Org // Brooks Jackson – June 24, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders has repeatedly claimed that 1 in 5 seniors "live on an average income of $7,600 a year." The reality is not quite so shocking

.

After we inquired, the expert who generated that income estimate revised it upward to $8,263, using more up-to-date figures and adjusting for a minor mistake.

Furthermore, that income figure does not count such non-cash government benefits as food stamps, housing assistance, Medicare or Medicaid, or proceeds from reverse mortgages. Nor does it include personal funds such as savings or insurance proceeds.

Sanders has made his remarks on senior income more than once, most recently in a Senate floor speech on senior hunger. The Vermont senator, who is running for the Democratic presidential nomination, is seeking more funding for senior programs through the Older Americans Act.

Sanders, June 16: The truth is — and this is really a shocking truth — that 20 percent of seniors in America live on an average income of $7,600 a year. Between us, I don't know how anybody can live on $7,600 a year, let alone older people who need more medicine and more health care.

He used the same figure on Jan. 16 and April 10.

However, that figure is too low. And it's not correct to say that these low-income seniors "live on" that cash income alone.

$7,600, Updated and Corrected

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When we asked where Sanders got his $7,600 figure, his campaign referred us to Eric Kingson, a professor of social work at Syracuse University and an outspoken advocate of raising Social Security benefits. Kingson, in a telephone interview and an exchange of emails, told us he had calculated the figure using statistics published by the Social Security Administration for the year 2008. Since then, the SSA has issued updated figures covering 2012, which are now the most recent available.

Using the more recent figures, and also correcting for what he termed a “minor” mistake (he says he failed to include a slice of households with income between $13,000 and $13,999 who are just at the top of the lowest 20 percent), Kingson said the correct income figure should be “about $8,263.”

Strictly speaking, this is not a perfectly accurate average. To calculate that, we would need access to the SSA’s survey data on each household, allowing us to add up all the incomes of all households and then dividing by the number of households. But we’ve looked over Kingson’s calculations and agree that given what’s available, his assumptions are reasonable and the $8,263 figure is a close approximation.

But — it’s not all that the bottom 20 percent is “living on.” That cash income figure – which includes things such as interest and dividends, as well as withdrawals from tax-deferred plans such as an IRA or 401(k) — covers total cash income for households made up of a single person age 65 or older, or a married couple where at least one spouse is age 65 or older, but it does not include many resources commonly available to seniors, especially low-income seniors.

What’s Not Included

For example, food stamps and housing aid are not counted, according to the Social Security Administration. Especially for the lowest-income seniors, those can be significant sources of support. In fiscal year 2014, for example, the average monthly food-stamp benefit per person was more than $125, for a total of more than $1,500 for a full year. And in 2011, the Obama administration announced $749 million in so-called Section 202 grants to help nonprofit groups provide housing aid for very low-income elderly people. Those and other federal assistance programs result in lowered rents for many years to come.

Also not counted in the “cash income” figure is financial assistance from the federal Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program, which laid out nearly $3 billion in block grants to states last fiscal year.

And since Sanders made a point of mentioning medicine and health care, it should be noted that Medicare reimbursements also are not counted as cash income. Also absent from the official definition of income is the value of Medicaid, the federal-state program that provides additional benefits, including long-term care in nursing homes, for low-income elderly people.

Loans — including proceeds from so-called “reverse mortgages” — are also not counted as income. A total of more than 900,000 reverse mortgages have been issued since 1990. Nearly all go to those over age 65, as a borrower must be at least 62 to qualify and the average age of those taking out such a loan for the first time was nearly 72 as of 2012, the last year for which the government produced such information.

Other receipts not counted as “income” are withdrawals from savings, insurance proceeds, gifts from relatives or friends, capital gains (such as profit from sale of a personal residence), and any lump-sum insurance payments or inheritances, such as those from a deceased spouse.

We have no way of calculating how much all these kinds of receipts would add to the average if they were counted as “income” — but there’s no question that many seniors rely on them to “live on.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Average Versus ‘Less Than’

Sanders arrives at a low figure by focusing on the average cash income of all those in the bottom 20 percent — many of whom by definition bring in more than the average. The Social Security Administration says those in the bottom 20 percent earn up to $13,292, which is the upper limit of the bottom “quintile,” or bottom fifth. (See the footnote on Table 10.5)

We don’t mean to dismiss the hardships faced by the least affluent seniors among us, which can be substantial. Sanders would have been correct to say that 20 percent of seniors in America lived on cash income of less than $13,292 in 2012 — not counting non-cash government assistance. That’s a meager figure, to be sure. It’s just not quite the “shocking truth” that Sanders would have voters believe.

CHAFEE

UNDECLARED

WEBB

Jim Webb Criticized for Comments on Confederate Flag // NYT // Alan Rappeport – June 24, 2015

Former Senator Jim Webb, the Democrat from Virginia, has struggled to generate much excitement over his potential presidential campaign, but on Wednesday he managed to attract some attention with some curious comments about the Confederate battle flag.

In a statement on Facebook, Mr. Webb said that any discussion of the flag needed to be tempered with respect for the “complicated history of the Civil War.”

He went on to explain that while the flag had been used as a symbol of racism in recent decades, that was not always the case.

“We should also remember that honorable Americans fought on both sides in the Civil War, including slave holders in the Union Army from states such as Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland and Delaware, and that many nonslave holders fought for the South,” Mr. Webb wrote.

The Confederate flag has been denounced by Democrats and Republicans alike in the last week since the killing of nine churchgoers in Charleston, S.C. Mr. Webb’s sentiment was rebutted by even his most loyal backers on Wednesday.

“As one of your most enthusiastic supporters, I have to disagree with you on this issue,” David Dickerson wrote in a comment on Mr. Webb’s post. “As a fellow Southerner, I prefer to take Robert E. Lee’s path and disassociate from that flag and what it stands for.”

Others, such as Jordan Genso, expressed disappointment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I don’t need to agree with you on every issue in order to support you, but this should be low-hanging fruit for you to be on the right side of,” Mr. Genso wrote. “And there’s no reason not to state that the Confederate battle flag represents a quasi-nation whose short existence was spent trying to fight for an immoral cause.”

Mr. Webb has a history of defending the confederacy. In a 1990 speech at the Confederate Memorial in Arlington, Va., he said, “I am not here to apologize for why they fought, although modern historians might contemplate that there truly were different perceptions in the North and South about those reasons, and that most Southern soldiers viewed the driving issue to be sovereignty rather than slavery.”

In 2008, Politico reported that Mr. Webb’s book “Born Fighting” seemed to sympathize with the Confederate cause, potentially giving pause to then Senator Barack Obama as he was vetting potential running mates. In Mr. Webb’s book, Born Fighting, he wrote about acquiring a Confederate headstone through the Veterans Administration for a great-great-grandfather.

A Vietnam War veteran who has been considered a potential presidential candidate over the years, Mr. Webb announced last year that he was forming a presidential exploratory committee. This year, he said the Democratic Party could do a better job appealing to white working-class voters.

On Wednesday, Mr. Webb recalled that the Confederate Memorial at Arlington National Cemetery was meant to recognize the character of soldiers who fought on both sides of the Civil War.

“This is a time for us to come together,” he said, “and to recognize once more that our complex multicultural society is founded on the principle of mutual respect.”

Jim Webb: Confederate soldiers fought honorably // Politico // Nick Gass – June 24, 2015

Former Virginia senator and potential Democratic presidential candidate Jim Webb weighed in on the Confederate flag debate on Wednesday, urging careful consideration of both sides of the historical argument.

“This is an emotional time and we all need to think through these issues with a care that recognizes the need for change but also respects the complicated history of the Civil War. The Confederate Battle Flag has wrongly been used for racist and other purposes in recent decades. It should not be used in any way as a political symbol that divides us,” Webb wrote in a Facebook post.

Americans should remember that people on both sides fought honorably, Webb said, “including slave holders in the Union Army from states such as Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland and Delaware, and that many non-slave holders fought for the South.”

“It was in recognition of the character of soldiers on both sides that the federal government authorized the construction of the Confederate Memorial 100 years ago, on the grounds of Arlington National Cemetery,” he wrote.

This is not the first time that Webb has addressed the Civil War’s legacy in the commonwealth.

Almost 17 years before he became a senator, he spoke at the Confederate Memorial at Arlington National Cemetery on June 3, 1990, the birthday of Confederate President Jefferson Davis.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“These men, like all soldiers, made painful choices and often paid for their loyalty with their lives. It is up to us to ensure that this ever-changing nation remembers the complexity of the issues they faced, and the incredible conditions under which they performed their duty, as they understood it,” Webb said more than 25 years ago.

On Wednesday, Webb struck a similar tone.

“This is a time for us to come together, and to recognize once more that our complex multicultural society is founded on the principle of mutual respect,” he wrote.

Webb’s caution stands in sharp contrast to the stance of Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton, who on Tuesday called the flag “a symbol of our nation’s racist past that has no place in our nation’s present or future.

“It shouldn’t fly there, it shouldn’t fly anywhere,” Clinton said.

Jim Webb Pushes Back on Behalf of Confederate Flag Supporters // Bloomberg // Arit John – June 24, 2015

Former Virginia Senator and Vietnam war veteran Jim Webb has finally weighed in on the national debate over the Confederate flag—kind of.

Days after every major official and declared presidential candidate announced their stance on the flag, Webb released a statement on Facebook stating that while the flag has been used for "racist and other purposes" that not all Confederates were bad, and not all members of the Union were good.

"The Confederate Battle Flag has wrongly been used for racist and other purposes in recent decades. It should not be used in any way as a political symbol that divides us," Webb wrote. "But we should also remember that honorable Americans fought on both sides in the Civil War, including slave holders in the Union Army from states such as Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland and Delaware, and that many non-slave holders fought for the South."

While other leaders have either called for the flag to come down or supported South Carolina Governor Nikki Haley's decision to call for the flag's removal, Webb asks for Americans to "come together, and to recognize once more that our complex multicultural society is founded on the principle of mutual respect."

Every other major leader who has officially joined the race or are getting close has made their stance on the flag clear, either calling for the flag to come down, supporting Haley's decision, or saying that it's a matter best left to South Carolina. Webb is expected to announce his decision on running for president by the end of the month.

Meanwhile, Webb declined to comment on the flag to the Washington Examiner on Monday, and has a history of defending the Confederate flag in the past. In his statement, he notes that it was "in recognition of the character of soldiers on both sides that the federal government authorized the construction of the Confederate Memorial 100 years ago." During a 1990 speech at the memorial, Webb said historians should consider "that most Southern soldiers viewed the driving issue [of the Civil War] to be sovereignty rather than slavery."

It's not clear that declining to call for the flag's removal will help him with Democrats, though Bill Kristol, the conservative editor of the Weekly Standard, was immediately impressed.

Presidential Hopeful Jim Webb Defends Confederate Soldiers // TIME // Sam Frizell – June 24, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb said on Wednesday that the Confederate flag has been wrongly used as a racist symbol, but stopped short of condemning the flag outright. He also added that Americans should remember "honorable" Civil War veterans, "including slave holders in the Union Army."

"The Confederate Battle Flag has wrongly been used for racist and other purposes in recent decades. It should not be used in any way as a political symbol that divides us," said Webb in a statement emailed to TIME in response to questions about whether the Confederate flag should be removed from Virginia license plates in the wake of the Charleston shooting.

"But we should also remember that honorable Americans fought on both sides in the Civil War, including slave holders in the Union Army from states such as Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland and Delaware, and that many non-slave holders fought for the South," said Webb.

Webb is also the only 2016 candidate not to condemn the Confederate flag outright or support a push to remove it from the South Carolina capitol grounds. Republicans Scott Walker, Rand Paul and Jeb Bush as well as all the other Democratic candidates have spoken out against the flag.

A likely candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination who counts two relatives among Confederate Army veterans, Webb has a long history of defending Dixie soldiers and the flag. He is the last 2016 presidential hopeful to speak publicly about the flag.

In striking an ambivalent tone, Webb is seeking to criticize the racist appropriation of the flag, but hold on to his Scots-Irish southern roots, which he often references. (His 2005 book "Born Fighting" is subtitled "How the Scots-Irish shaped America.")

At the Confederate Memorial at Arlington National Cemetery in 1990, Webb said that Confederate soldiers are "misunderstood by most Americans" and recognized them for "enormous suffering and collective gallantry."

"It was in recognition of the character of soldiers on both sides that the federal government authorized the construction of the Confederate Memorial 100 years ago, on the grounds of Arlington National Cemetery," Webb said in his statement to TIME.

Jim Webb: "Honorable Americans Fought On Both Sides Of The Civil War" // Buzzfeed // CJ Ciaramella – June 24, 2015

Former Democratic Virginia senator and possible 2016 presidential candidate Jim Webb weighed in on the controversy over the Confederate Battle Flag Wednesday, saying it was used for racist purposes but that "honorable Americans fought on both sides of the Civil War."

In a Facebook post Wednesday, Webb wrote: "This is an emotional time and we all need to think through these issues with a care that recognizes the need for change but also respects the complicated history of the Civil War. The Confederate Battle Flag has wrongly been used for racist and other purposes in recent decades. It should not be used in any way as a political symbol that divides us."

"But we should also remember that honorable Americans fought on both sides in the Civil War, including slave holders in the Union Army from states such as Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland and Delaware, and that many non-slave holders fought for the South," Webb continued. "It was in recognition of the character of soldiers on both sides that the federal government authorized the construction of the Confederate Memorial 100 years ago, on the grounds of Arlington National Cemetery."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"This is a time for us to come together, and to recognize once more that our complex multicultural society is founded on the principle of mutual respect," he concluded.

Webb previously declined to comment on the Confederate flag, and is the last of the likely 2016 candidates from both parties to stake out a position.

Webb previously said he would announce his presidential intentions by the end of June.

OTHER

The Shameless Dolores Huerta // The Daily Beast // Ruben Navarrette Jr. – June 25, 2015

A reminder that former UFW chief Dolores Huerta, the left's favorite Latina activist, wasn't always so pro-immigration.

Our Spanish phrase of the day is "sin verguenza." It means someone without shame. As in: Dolores Huerta—the East Coast liberal establishment's favorite Hispanic and someone who is held up as an iconic labor leader and civil rights figure—is a sin verguenza.

The former vice president of the United Farm Workers union has long exploited her celebrity status. Now, in the 2016 election, Huerta is opportunistically working with People for the American Way, a Washington DC-based liberal organization that has never shown the slightest interest in Latinos or their concerns, in a campaign designed to use the immigration issue to influence Latino voters.

"I believe the Latino community can be the 'deciders' and we saw that happen in the 2008 election and the 2012 election," Huerta recently told the Latino-themed news site Latin Post.

Huerta's message to Latino voters—as sponsored by People for the American Way—is a variation on something that she said during a speech at a Tucson, AZ high school in 2006: "Republicans hate Latinos." So be sure to vote Democratic.

The goal is to discredit any 2016 Republican hopeful who might have a shot at winning Latino votes. Huerta's targets so far include Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida, Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas, and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush.

About Rubio, she said to Latin Post: "I think that he (Rubio) is a person we cannot trust because I think he's an opportunist and he's going to say what he needs to say just to get himself elected. He speaks out of both sides of his mouth."

About Cruz, she said the senator was, through his opposition to Obamacare, at least partially responsible for the "hundreds and thousands" of Texans without health insurance.

And about Bush, she said the GOP establishment favorite can't be trusted: "He's another one that first he's against immigration and then says he's for immigration."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The left's strategy of using Huerta to launch these attacks is based on three assumptions: that Latinos care about immigration above other issues; that Latinos will vote for candidates who are vouched for by other Latinos; and that—when Latino Republicans like Cruz and Rubio need to be attacked—the optics are better when other Latinos fire the salvos.

"It's not a question of your surname or the language that you can speak," Huerta told Latin Post. "It's a question about what values you hold."

Even as someone who has given lip service to empowering Latinos politically, Huerta went on to explain why she wants a woman (Clinton) in the White House and not a Hispanic Republican (Rubio or Cruz). In other words, ethnicity and language take a back seat to gender and party affiliation.

What makes this ploy of using immigration as a battering ram against Republicans not just cynical but offensive is that—despite Huerta's recent efforts to re-invent herself as some kind of immigrant advocate—she is nothing of the kind.

That is not who is she now, or who she has ever been. Huerta is a labor leader pure and simple, and, as such, she spent most of her activist career standing next to union members who, convinced that immigrants take jobs and lower wage for U.S. workers, want less immigration, not more of it.

That story is as old as the hills. It's why the 1986 Immigration Reform and Control Act—the last significant comprehensive immigration reform measure passed by Congress—was strongly opposed by the AFL-CIO and other labor groups.

We're supposed to be believe that it's all different now. The narrative cooked up by liberals and the media is, sometime during the last quarter century, organized labor learned to stop worrying about foreign competition and embraced immigration.

But that's fiction. It never happened. The labor movement is more committed than ever to defeating immigration reform efforts that include a path to citizenship for the undocumented. The only difference is now organized labor has learned to be craftier in camouflaging its true agenda.

Just like Huerta, who is obviously hoping that—on the topic of immigration—Latinos will be long on outrage toward Republicans and short on memory when it comes to the UFW.

We're not supposed to remember that, 40 years ago, the union—which Huerta claims she co-founded—was routinely criticized by Latino leaders like Bert Corona, a community organizer and co-founder of the Mexican-American Political Association, for demanding that the Immigration and Naturalization Service send agents into the fields to arrest and deport illegal immigrants who had crossed the picket line.

We're not supposed to remember that, in 1973, UFW officials set up a "wet line" on the Arizona-Mexico border to prevent Mexican immigrants from crossing into the United States. Under the supervision of Cesar Chavez's cousin, Manuel, who was something of a loose cannon, union members physically attacked the immigrants until they were bloody. At the time, The Village Voice scolded the UFW for conducting a "campaign of random terror against anyone hapless enough to fall into its net."

I've recalled this history directly to Huerta, in face-to-face confrontations at various events in California that quickly turned ugly.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And we're not supposed to remember that, in 1979, Chavez testified before Congress—not to demand more protection for illegal immigrants but to demand that the INS do a better job of removing them from the fields.

I've recalled this history directly to Huerta, in face-to-face confrontations at various events in California that quickly turned ugly. On the defensive, she insisted none of it ever happened, and claimed that she can say this definitely because, not only does she speak for the union, she in fact "is" the union. The woman is either in denial, dishonest, or delusional.

Huerta will have a tougher time explaining away her more recent betrayal of the Latino community. As an outspoken supporter of Hillary Clinton in 2008, Huerta blasted Barack Obama as not responsive to Latino concerns, calling him a "Johnny come lately" to the cause. She even took umbrage to the Obama campaign's slogan—"Yes we can!,"—which she insisted sounded a lot like the UFW's rallying cry of "Si se puede."

"Now they're copying our slogan," she told a reporter at the time. "But you cannot build a relationship no más con una palabra—just with one word."

Eventually, the relationship between Obama and Huerta improved. In 2010, the president invited Huerta to a state dinner at the White House honoring Mexican President Felipe Calderon. In 2012, Obama presented Huerta with the Presidential Medal of Freedom.

Now—despite the fact that Obama broke his promise to make comprehensive immigration reform a top priority of his presidency, deported more than 2 million people, divided hundreds of thousands of families, and falsely claimed that those who were removed were predominantly criminals—Huerta sings the praises of the Johnny Come Lately she once criticized.

Let's see, Huerta accuses Republicans running for president of being blinded by ideology, flip-flopping on immigration, and selling out. She should know. She is an expert on these things.

This is our leader, our moral compass? Says who?

White liberals may have decided among themselves that Dolores Huerta represents Latinos, but she only represents herself. She is an opportunist. She bartered away her credibility. And she needs to spend the 2016 election where she belongs: on the sidelines.

Obama Victory on Trade Wins Him New Fight With Fellow Democrats // Bloomberg // Carter Dougherty and Angela Greiling Keane - June 25, 2015

After battling his own party over trade policy for months, President Barack Obama has won a prize no politician would envy: another fight with his friends.

Congressional approval of fast-track negotiating authority Wednesday after six months of cajoling by Obama is just one step on the way to what he says will be a landmark, 12-nation free-trade agreement with Pacific Rim countries.

Democrats and liberal groups are already promising a new fight if and when the actual trade pact, known as the Trans-Pacific Partnership, comes to a vote. That could be early next year just as the campaign to succeed him gets into full swing, putting Hillary Clinton, the Democratic frontrunner, on the spot with labor and other core constituencies.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We all recognize that the next debate will be over Trans-Pacific Partnership itself,” House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California, who opposed the fast-track measure, wrote Wednesday in a letter to fellow lawmakers. She predicted a “lively and thoughtful debate” among Democrats.

Both trade policy and relations with China -- a country pointedly not part of the trade negotiations -- will be topics for the 2016 races for president and Congress. The White House wants to complete a deal this year, and Japanese Economy Minister Akira Amari said Wednesday it might wrap up at a meeting of trade ministers in July.

Divided Democrats

“The debate has only begun,” said Simon Rosenberg, president of the New Democratic Network, a Democratic-leaning research group that supports Obama’s trade agenda. “The debate will shift from the abstract discussion of trade to a very specific discussion of TPP.”

Trade is an issue that has divided Democrats since 1994, when the North American Free Trade Agreement, the deal labor unions blame for millions of manufacturing job losses, took effect. Clinton’s husband, then-President Bill Clinton, signed NAFTA and wrangled it through Congress.

With the liberal wing of Democrats gaining influence in the party and standing mostly opposed to the next, and even bigger, trade deal, Clinton has tacked left. Having once backed the accord as secretary of state, she’s now wavering.

“What she made very clear from the beginning is she’s going to respect the president and let him bring the deal back and she’ll look at it and make up her mind,” Rosenberg said. “It’s likely she’ll be supportive, but she’ll use this to remind people that trade policy doesn’t operate in an economic vacuum.”

Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders, a self-described socialist who currently is Clinton’s main challenger for the Democratic presidential nomination, is an unequivocal opponent of the trade deal.

Business Support

Eric Schinfeld, president of the Washington Council on International Trade in Seattle, said advocates are in a race with presidential politics.

“November 2016 will really shape the dynamics of the next trade vote,” Schinfeld said.

Still, Julian Zelizer, a professor of history and public affairs at Princeton University, said Obama has no reason not to use the fast-track powers he just obtained, which lets him submit trade deals to Congress for a quick, up-or-down majority vote without amendments.

“If you are going to go this far in angering the base of the party then you use the procedure to get the deal or it’s not worth it,” Zelizer said.

Final Vote

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The bill Congress just passed lays out a procedure, including written notifications, a study of the economic impact and limited debate, that could take about six months before a final vote is cast on the agreement.

U.S. Trade Representative Michael Froman told a group of CEOs in Washington on June 10 that business will need to gin up something similar to its lobbying effort on fast-track trade authority to get the deal approved by Congress. “It may not be at the same intensity for six months, but that will be a big debate,” Froman said.

The business lobby, in turn, wants Obama to keep making the public and private case for the accord, especially to lawmakers, said John Engler, president of the Business Roundtable, which coordinated the business push. Obama’s willingness to mobilize top officials, including Defense Secretary Ashton Carter, convinced them he was serious about persuading lawmakers to back fast track.

“A goal of the administration should be to make sure no one can go to the floor and say, ‘I didn’t know what’s in this agreement,’” Engler said in an interview. “There’s no time to sit back.”

Mobilizing

Engler also called on the administration to mobilize the different industries that would benefit from the Pacific trade deal. Under the pact taking shape, agricultural exporters could ship more to Japan, more American financial services would be for sale in Asia, while Silicon Valley would see restrictions on how governments can curb data flows. The pharmaceutical industry may get stronger patent protection and automakers could see exports rise.

Liberal groups who opposed fast track are vowing to redouble their efforts to defeat the Pacific trade deal, well aware that congressional approval of fast track means Obama can probably finalize an agreement with the other nations: Japan, Australia, Brunei, Canada, Chile, Malaysia, Mexico, New Zealand, Peru, Singapore and Vietnam.

“What it doesn’t mean is that Congress must pass such a TPP,” said Robert Weissman, president of Public Citizen, an advocacy group. “When the inexcusable and anti-democratic veil of secrecy surrounding the TPP is finally lifted, and the American people see what is actually in the agreement, they are going to force their representatives in Washington to vote that deal down.”

Mass. Democratic Party invites presidential hopefuls to speak // Boston Globe // Jim O’Sullivan – June 24, 2015

Massachusetts is known less for its electoral significance in presidential primaries than its functional role as an ATM for campaigns. But that hasn’t stopped the state Democratic Party from issuing invitations to four presidential candidates offering speaking roles at its Sept. 19 convention in Springfield.

State party chairman Thomas McGee, a state senator from Lynn, penned a compelling missive laden with innuendo about the ancillary benefits for presidential candidates who might take the time to address party activists in the Bay State.

“I know you have a close eye on New England considering the role our region plays with the nation’s first primary just over the border in New Hampshire,” McGee wrote in a form letter sent to former Rhode Island governor and US senator Lincoln Chafee, former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton, former Maryland governor Martin O’Malley, and Vermont senator Bernie Sanders. (Former US senator from Virginia Jim Webb has not formalized a candidacy.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In case none of them took that hint, McGee sweetened the pot: “Addressing our convention allows you the opportunity to recruit and solidify an active volunteer that will travel to New Hampshire and beyond.”

Party officials said Wednesday they had yet to receive RSVPs.

GOP

DECLARED

BUSH

Jeb Bush Picks Woody Johnson as Finance Chairman // WSJ // Beth Reinhard and Patrick O’Connor – June 24, 2015

Woody Johnson, a top fundraiser for the last three Republican presidential nominees and the owner of the New York Jets football team, will serve as national finance chairman for Jeb Bush’s presidential campaign.

The announcement isn’t unexpected, considering Mr. Johnson’s visibility, standing by Mr. Bush throughout his recent trip to Europe and flying him there on his private jet. Mr. Johnson has been a supporter of New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, and his decision earlier this year to back Mr. Bush was viewed as a setback to Mr. Christie, who is likely to launch a 2016 bid this summer.

Mr. Bush is trying to raise money at a furious pace during the two weeks between his June 15 campaign launch and June 30, when he is required to disclose his fundraising total to the Federal Election Commission. The campaign is trying to incentivize donors by inviting those who raise $27,000 by the end of the month to a July 9-10 retreat at his family’s compound in Kennebunkport, Maine.

The pursuit of campaign money, one $2,700 maximum donation at a time, comes after six months in which Mr. Bush crisscrossed the country soliciting unlimited checks for his super PAC. The PAC is expected to report more than $100 million at the end of July, outgunning the crowded GOP field.

Mr. Johnson is seen as one of the GOP’s top fundraisers for his ability to convene top Wall Street financiers and heirs to some of the country’s fortunes. He was a top rainmaker for the past two Republican nominees, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and Arizona Sen. John McCain, with a reputation for making as many as 50 calls a day on behalf of the candidates he supports. He is credited with raising $7 million for Mr. McCain in a single night during the 2008 campaign.

The billionaire Jets owner tends to stick close to the candidates and their top advisers, and he developed a close personal bond with Mr. Romney. When the 2012 nominee considered a third White House run earlier this year, he broke the news to a small group of well-heeled donors assembled at Mr. Johnson’s Midtown Manhattan office.

“Jeb is a bold and thoughtful leader with the vision and experience to ensure our nation’s greatest days remain ahead,” Mr. Johnson said in a statement to The Wall Street Journal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jack Oliver, senior adviser to Barclays and a top fundraiser for the 2000 and 2004 presidential campaigns by Mr. Bush's brother, George W. Bush, will serve as his national finance co-chairman. Other co-chairs are expected to be named later.

Bush campaign taps New York Jets owners as national finance chairman // WaPo // Ed O'Keefe – June 24, 2015

Jeb Bush has tapped a top fundraiser for the last three Republican presidential nominees to serve as his finance chairman.

Woody Johnson, the owner of the NFL's New York Jets and heir to the Johnson & Johnson empire, will take on the role, Bush's campaign announced Wednesday morning. Veteran Republican fundraiser Jack Oliver will serve as a finance co-chairman.

Johnson, Oliver and Bush finance director Heather Larrison will be responsible for meeting Bush's goal of raising $5 million this month for his recently-launched campaign. Bush this week is on a nationwide fundraising tour with stops in Orlando, New York, Chicago, Dallas, Houston, Tulsa and Atlanta. An event last Friday at Washington's Union Station drew approximately 300 supporters, according to attendees.

Sally Bradshaw, a top adviser to Bush, said in a statement that the campaign is "honored" to have Johnson and Oliver's support.

"Woody's longstanding commitment to public service and strong track record of working with people of different backgrounds to accomplish big goals represent the values and priorities of Jeb's campaign," she said.

Johnson said in a statement that Bush "is a bold and thoughtful leader with the vision and experience to ensure our nation's greatest days remain ahead."

News of the new roles was first reported by The Wall Street Journal.

Johnson's decision earlier this year to support Bush over New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie was viewed as a sign of growing support for the former Florida governor. In the months since, he's become a frequent and active adviser and supporter of Bush's campaign and traveled with him on his recent tour of Germany, Poland and Estonia.

He's been a big financial backer of the presidential campaigns of George W. Bush, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Mitt Romney.

Oliver is a senior adviser to Barclays and Bryan Cave LLP, an international law firm based in St. Louis. He was national finance chairman for the Bush-Cheney 2004 reelection campaign.

Jeb Bush's Super PAC is Blurring 'Jeb!' Signs in Its Own Ad. Here's Why . // National Journal // Shane Goldmacher – June 24, 2015

Jeb Bush's super PAC makes no secret of its plans to spend tens of millions of dollars to help Bush win the Republican presidential nomination next year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But in the group's new 30-second video promoting Bush—a compilation of highlights from his announcement speech earlier this month—the group is blurring the multitude of "Jeb!" stickers and signage in the Miami crowd.

It's not for style. It's to comply with the law.

Federal election law says that broadcasting written or graphic materials prepared by a campaign amounts to a contribution and, thus, is subject to campaign-contribution limits.

The whole point of a super PAC is to raise and spend money outside those limits.

So the group blurred the "Jeb!" signs at the event.

"They are avoiding this allegation" of reproducing campaign materials, said Paul S. Ryan, senior counsel for the Campaign Legal Center.

It's not clear if there are plans to advertise the Web video, which clocks in at exactly 30 seconds, on TV or online. A spokesman for the Right to Rise USA, the pro-Bush super PAC, declined to comment for this story.

The relevant section of the federal code says that "the dissemination, distribution, or republication, in whole or in part, of any broadcast or any written, graphic, or other form of campaign materials prepared by the candidate" constitutes a contribution to the candidate.

The idea behind the rule, Ryan explained, is to prevent an outside group from simply taking a candidate's yard signs and reproducing them, or recording a candidate's TV ad and re-airing it.

Ryan's group and other campaign-finance reformers have been highly critical of the arrangement between Bush and his super PAC, in which the two worked together for months ahead of Bush's formal entry into the race this month. Earlier this year, the Campaign Legal Center asked the Department of Justice to investigate what it called "willful violations" of federal law.

In this particular instance, the Bush super PAC appears to be cautiously adhering to the law.

Super PACs have been steadily pushing the boundaries of coordination and the reproduction of campaign materials in recent years. Numerous candidates, perhaps most memorably Mitch McConnell last year, have posted video B-roll of their candidates online, hoping super PACs use the favorable footage in ads.

The specific right of outside groups to use such B-roll actually came before the Federal Election Commission in 2012. The six-member panel, divided equally between Democrats and Republicans, deadlocked on the matter. Super PACs have used such candidate-produced footage ever since.

Jeb Bush Is Slow to Catch Fire in Iowa // Sentinel Republic // Eugene Robinson – June 24, 2015

“I will take nothing and no one for granted”, the 62-year-old Bush, a son and brother of two ex-presidents, told a crowd of supporters at a university in Miami.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush, as he's done before, assigned responsibility to Clinton for what he regards as President Barack Obama's misbegotten foreign policy. Americans would just have to deal with the fact that these two families are never, ever going away.

The Republican presidential candidate and ex- Florida governor said that easing immigration laws, loosening regulation, and simplifying the tax code would be part of his formula to almost double the nation's current economic growth. Especially for a candidate who's been eyeing a bid for the White House for quite a while now, you'd think that all the digital bases would be covered and all the possible web properties related to that candidate or his/her name would be secured and under control.

Yet when it comes down to Hillary against the field, the poll suggests it's going to be either Rubio or Bush that'll give Clinton the greater challenge. But the same poll in May found him at just 10 percent, tied with his onetime protege, Sen.

It wasn't until past year that the predominantly Republican Florida Legislature tackled fixing this inequity so that it wouldn't become a campaign issue for the unpopular Republican Gov. Rick Scott, who was facing re-election.

The dynastic consequences of such a pairing in November 2016 have not gone unnoticed among many voters and rivals, of course.

But is there anybody who believes Jeb Bush is the man to take on the pampered elites?

One of those, Correct the Record, is blazing an entirely new trail – and one that some election watchdogs say is questionable – by planning to coordinate directly with the Clinton campaign. The following day, he said it somehow dishonored US troops to even ask the question. "And the answer is not all that positive for her".

Yet a defiant Bush has showed small willingness to placate his party's right wing.

Bush, whose wife is Mexican-born, addressed the packed college arena in English and Spanish, an unusual twist for a political speech aimed at a national audience.

But family political dynasties are rare in our history because they are so hard to replicate.

Several speakers broke into Spanish, including Bush himself, who is fluent in the language.

Thanks to the super PAC that served as his campaign-in-waiting for six months, the Republican contender said he's raised more money in 100 days than any Republican operation in modern times. Then, after winning the nomination, he would have to shift back toward the center – but not so abruptly that he disillusioned true believers. Still, Bush commands 94 percent name identification among likely Michigan voters, followed by Paul with 82 percent, Rubio at 70 percent and Walker trailing far behind at 55 percent. That, in turn, could mean that a finish in the top tier – rather than an outright win – has more meaning than in the past. Bush has had everything in his life handed to him on a silver platter. "The people who know, know that".

Early opinion surveys place Bush in the middle of the Iowa pack among republican candidates.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In that poll, Bush did better than Rubio, though he still was down to Hillary in a head-to-head contest Bush with a 51-40. He is smart, experienced and deeply informed about domestic policy issues such as education. His brother, the 43rd president, and his father, the 41st president, were not in attendance for his presidential announcement speech in Miami on Monday.

RUBIO

Marco Rubio fights conservative backlash over his support of Obama trade authority // Miami Herald // Alex Leary – June 24, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio has a new headache from the right: His support for President Obama's Pacific trade deal.

"Marco Rubio Casts Deciding Vote For Obamatrade Without Even Reading It," screamed a headline in Breitbart News, which last rode the Florida Republican on immigration.

Deciding vote is hyperbolic but Rubio's was essential as the measure was advanced Tuesday by 60 votes, the exact number needed to overcome the Senate's procedural hurdles.

A number of conservative groups have lashed out at giving Obama fast track authority on trade deals, claiming the accords have been created in secret and warning it wouuld bring in more foreign workers. Plus they don't want to give Obama any more power.

Rubio felt it enough to push back on Twitter today, linking to a National Review story that says Rubio did read the deal.

As noted earlier, the trade issue has divided Republican candidates. In the Senate, Rand Paul and Ted Cruz voted no yesterday.

Rubio after the vote breezed by reporters without taking questions. He hasn't said much publicly about the deal lately but was a visible champion, writing in the Wall Street Journal and calling on action during his first foreign policy speech as a presidential candidate.

"It is more important than ever that Congress give the president trade promotion authority so that he can finalize the Trans-Pacific Partnership and the Trans-Atlantic Trade and Investment Partnership," Rubio said in a May 13 speech before the Council on Foreign Relations.

Jeb Bush also supports the deal.

Rubio's Cuba views at odds with young Hispanic-Americans // The Hill // Eddie Bejarano – June 24, 2015

As a young Hispanic-American, I am deeply concerned and saddened about the position Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) has taken in response to President Obama's decision to thaw relations between our country and Cuba — mainly that he, if given the opportunity, would continue to implement policies that reflect the political realities of the Cold War.

Similar to Rubio, my parents left their home nation of Peru because of political reasons. Unlike Rubio, I do not let the views of a generation of scarred Peruvians define my contemporary worldview. There is no doubt my parents' political experiences have left their mark on me, but the world today is vastly different from when they immigrated to the U.S.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It is no longer safe to assume that the entire Cuban-American community supports punitive policies against Cuba. According to a poll conducted in 2014 by Florida International University in Miami, 62 percent of Cuban-Americans ages 18-29 oppose continuing the embargo policy in place. Among registered voters, 51 percent favored continuing the embargo and 49 percent opposed it.

The statistic that I found most significant discussed what percentage of respondents supported reestablishing diplomatic ties between the U.S. and Cuba. Sixty-eight percent of respondents favored diplomatic relations with Cuba, with 90 percent of young respondents favoring a shift in our current diplomatic policy. However, support for reconstructing diplomatic relations with Cuba dropped precipitously for age groups older than 70.

From these figures, I can only deduce that Cuban-American politicians such as Rubio are approaching a momentous fork in the road. As he campaigns for the Oval Office, I ask that he consider a few important questions. Is a policy that continues to isolate Cuba beneficial to the U.S. or the people of Cuba? And is his Cuba policy reflective of the broader Hispanic-American community or solely that of an older Cuban diaspora? If he is to be the face of the Hispanic-American community, then it is my hope that his worldview, and specifically his Cuba policy, is not held hostage by the political experiences of our parents' generations.

"What do we want? New clean energy! When do we want it? Now!" seems to be the rallying cry of investors that have put forth $4 billion to invest in clean energy technology. What The Hill's June 16 article "Private investors pony up $4 billion for clean energy" doesn't mention, however, is the initiative set forth by the Environmental Protection Agency called the Clean Power Plan. This plan, which would mandate meaningful reductions in carbon dioxide, would reduce carbon pollution by 30 percent by the year 2030. States are able to meet their goals by either making existing power plants more efficient or moving toward sustainable, clean energy.

What does the Clean Power Plan have to do with clean energy investments? Everything! The White House hosted a Clean Energy Investment Summit on June 16, which laid out promises from businesses and organizations to "go greener" by turning toward clean energy. The Clean Power Plan, which provides tremendous opportunity for states to go green, promotes solutions to reducing pollution and addressing global warming concerns. Clean energy is achievable through investor support and the Clean Power Plan, and we should keep states accountable for this promise to moving toward better solutions.

Let your elected officials know that you want to invest in what's best.

PAUL

Rand Paul In 2007: Trans-Texas Corridor Could Lead To "North American Union," US-Mexico Currency // Buzzfeed // Christopher Massie – June 24, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Rand Paul said in December 2007 that a highway between Mexico and the United States could lead to a "North American Union," comparing the relationship between the US and Mexico to the early stages of the European Union's formation.

Paul, who at the time was campaigning for his father Ron Paul, then a Republican presidential candidate, said on the Future Quake radio show that his father had been unfairly "ridiculed" for discussing the possibility of a "North American Union."

"After my father mentioned the North American Union he was completely ridiculed, not only just in the debate, but Newsweek came out and wrote an article just completely making fun of him, saying it was all crazy people," Paul said. "But you know the funny thing about it is, they're saying it's all just crazy people, but it's already being built. I mean, the road is being built. The Trans-Texas Corridor."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Proposed by Texas Gov. Rick Perry in 2002, the Trans-Texas Corridor was initially intended to be a 4,000 mile network of highways and railways. According to the Houston Chronicle, Perry claimed it was necessary partly because of increased Mexican truck traffic "following passage of the North American Free Trade Agreement." The idea was largely scrapped in 2009.

Echoing his father, who argued that the "superhighway" would link the US, Mexico, and Canada, and that "the ultimate goal" included an "integrated North American Union—complete with a currency," Rand Paul dismissed the notion that the corridor was a secret "conspiracy."

"There's already money funded for it," he said. "It's been a huge debate in the Texas legislature, it's not like it's a secret. I mean, the Texas legislature voted against it because they were going to take so much land from so many farmers to build this road. So it's not like some secrecy or conspiracy that no one knows about. It needs to be publicized obviously so people will talk about it, but it's happening. So it's a real thing."

Paul then said that the President of Mexico had "talked about having, you know, a currency," saying that this was "the same thing" as what happened with the European Union.

"The President of Mexico apparently has talked about having, you know, a currency and I know people have called it the Amero," he said. "I'm not sure where that started. But think about it: the European Union was talked about for twenty years before it finally occurred and this is the same thing."

He concluded by saying that organizations like the Council for Foreign Relations and the Trilaterals Commission didn't think it was "a big deal" to have "countries sort of together in one currency."

"Most people—until people got on our side started thinking about the loss of sovereign entity and the dangers of this—they thought about it as a very bland sort of subject, they would have it at their meetings, all these, you know, the Council for Foreign Relations, the Trilaterals Commission, these type of folks. These are real organizations that exist. They talk and they talk about these things and they think it's not a big deal. They think we should have all countries sort of together in one currency and they think it's of some benefit somehow."

Sen. Rand Paul to sue IRS, U.S. Treasury // Washington Times // Ralph Z. Hallow – June 24, 2015

Rand Paul is poised to become the first major presidential candidate in memory to sue the government he seeks to lead as president.

The Kentucky senator will take legal action against the U.S. Treasury and the Internal Revenue Service for what he says is the denial of his constitutional right to vote on more than 100 tax-information treaties that the Obama administration unilaterally negotiated with foreign governments, The Washington Times has learned.

In what the suit says is a violation of Article II, Section 2 of the Constitution, President Obama has not consulted the U.S. Senate about the treaties nor given the Senate an opportunity to approve or disapprove of the treaties. The administration calls them "intergovernmental agreements." They require foreign banks to gather and share private financial information about millions of Americans living and working outside the U.S. — information they would not have to disclose to the U.S. government if they lived and worked in the U.S.

The treaties or agreements are the enforcement mechanisms of the Obama administration's Foreign Account Tax Compliance Act (FATCA), enacted by a Democratic-controlled Congress in 2010.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The act is despised by many of the estimated 8.7 million Americans living overseas, a record number of whom have — with great anger and reluctance, according to those who have spoken to the foreign and U.S. press — renounced their U.S. citizenship rather than attempt to comply with FATCA.

What percentage of them simply want to evade paying taxes to the U.S. government and to the foreign governments in whose countries they work and/or reside is unknown. The U.S. is one of the few countries that taxes its citizens on income earned and property held both at home and abroad.

President Obama pushed for the passage of FATCA as a means of capturing hundreds of millions of dollars in income and property taxes owed to the Treasury by those Americans living and working outside the U.S. But many Americans living abroad say the Treasury and the IRS are treating them as guilty of tax evasion until proven innocent.

“Obama owns this,” said Indiana-based GOP superlawyer Jim Bopp, the lead attorney for Mr. Paul and other plaintiffs in the case. “FATCA passed Congress right after Obama was elected, when the Democrats had majorities in both houses” of Congress.

“The issue is inescapably partisan for that reason and for the fact that no Republican [in the U.S. House] supported the passage of FATCA,” Mr. Bopp said. “The U.S. government didn’t start enforcing it until Obama started to target U.S. citizens overseas in the belief that they had a lot of money but not a lot of political clout sufficient to fight back.”

Nations that have approved these bilateral agreements or treaties with the U.S. include such major economic powers as China, Britain, India, Israel, Ireland, Canada, Australia, Japan, Germany, France, Spain and Switzerland, as well smaller states once considered as tax havens such as Bermuda, the British Virgin Islands, Lichtenstein and Luxembourg. So far, 112 nations have agreed to collect or receive private financial information about Americans in those countries and to turn the information over to the U.S. government.

Constitutional clash

Mr. Paul, a Republican who announced his presidential bid in early April, will join six other plaintiffs in the suit that a new organization called “Republicans Overseas Action” expects to file in a southern Ohio federal district court the week of June 29. The court’s Republican makeup is considered at least open to the constitutional arguments that the plaintiffs lay out.

The other plaintiffs base their claim of legal standing to sue the Treasury and the IRS on FATCA’s requirement that they surrender personal information in violation of the Fourth Amendment’s ban on unreasonable search and seizure and on the Eighth Amendment ban on cruel and unusual punishments — in this case, unusually large financial penalties for late filings, however innocent, or for noncooperation.

FATCA requires foreign banks to violate the privacy of their American customers by disclosing bank balances and all financial transactions. The U.S. law levies a hefty 30 percent fine on foreign financial institutions that don’t cooperate with the Treasury’s requests. The fine is actually levied against the American customer of the foreign bank, but critics say no bank can keep its customer base with fines of that magnitude.

The law also directly fines the American holder of a foreign account as much as 50 percent of the highest balance that was in that account at any time during a 12-month period as penalty for not reporting.

Mr. Paul’s suit argues that the administration purposely avoided calling the arrangements “treaties” and instead labeled them as “intergovernmental agreements” to escape having to get Senate approval. Earlier this year, Mr.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Paul introduced a Senate bill to repeal FATCA. But Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell has not scheduled debate on the bill.

Michael DeSombre, an American residing in Hong Kong, is the worldwide president for Republicans Overseas Action. He sees Democratic presumptive nominee Hillary Rodham Clinton as vulnerable on the FATCA controversy.

“When FATCA was enacted in 2010, Hillary Clinton was secretary of state. Many overseas Americans complained how unjust and destructive this law is to U.S. embassies and consulate general offices around the world. What I want to know is what did Hillary do with those reports in this election,” said Mr. DeSombre.

The other plaintiffs in the suit Mr. Paul has joined say they have been denied banking and financial services in the foreign countries where they live and work. The foreign banks don’t want to be burdened with the expense and paperwork to comply with FATCA and therefore simply refuse to accept Americans as clients.

The Republican National Committee and the recently formed Republican Overseas Action aim to get as many of those Americans living or working outside their country to register in one or another of the swing states that decide the presidency in close elections. Republicans Overseas Action is paying for the lawsuit Mr. Paul has joined as plaintiff.

The driving force behind the suit is a longtime conservative activist on the Republican National Committee, Solomon Yue of Oregon.

“The best way to defend 8.7 million overseas Americans’ right to privacy and constitutional protections is to cripple the IRS, FATCA and enforcement tools through legal action on constitutional grounds all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court,” said Mr. Yue, founder and vice chairman of Republicans Overseas Action Inc.

CRUZ

Cruz pulls another boneheaded move // WaPo // Jennifer Rubin – June 24, 2015

Well, if Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) can go from hiring the “Southern Avenger,” a neo-Confederate, to decrying the Confederate flag as “inescapably a symbol of human bondage and slavery, and particularly when people use it obviously for murder and to justify hatred so vicious that you would kill somebody,” we should rank Sen. Ted Cruz’s flip-flop on trade less harshly. Still, in the space of a week he voted for fast-track authority, heard cries from the far right and then reversed himself — and still had the nerve to denounce GOP leaders with whom he voted the first time around. Politico explains:

The Texas firebrand and Republican 2016 presidential hopeful had been a vocal supporter of trade legislation, even co-authoring a Wall Street Journal op-ed in April saying that the fast-track bill, known as Trade Promotion Authority, is a “fair deal” for the American worker. In May, he voted to advance the TPA bill, which also included a worker aid package favored by Democrats.

But just hours before a decisive Tuesday vote, Cruz [changed] his tune. . . . Cruz, who has long aligned himself with the tea party wing of the party, has taken some flak from the right for backing the trade bill initially — so voting “no” now could insulate himself from some of that criticism. Yet it could further alienate himself from big business and deep-pocketed donors who are staunch proponents of expanded markets.

Now, even before this latest jaw-dropper, Cruz was in no danger of getting mainstream support. There are not too many non-tea partyers who appreciate him after orchestrating the shutdown, going whole-hog on antiimmigration reform, whipping up support for an anti-gay marriage constitutional amendment and advancing a frankly incoherent worldview (yes on destroying the Islamic state, no on the NSA and on anymore troops). He's in single digits in most state and national polls, overshadowed at this stage by the likes of Ben Carson and former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee — whose supporters he appears to be chasing after.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cruz likes to fancy himself as the only principled man inside the Beltway, but with stunts like the trade flip-flop he makes crystal clear that his only deeply held belief is self-promotion. Coverage in Texas media of his about-face was stinging, painting him as a political coward. ("For months, Sen. Ted Cruz backed a critical part of President Barack Obama's trade agenda. But after weeks of taking heat from conservatives, Cruz abandoned his support for Trade Promotion Authority on Tuesday.") And the Wall Street Journal editorial board observed, "Much of the opposition [on the far right] has been pure opportunism, an attempt to parlay distrust of all-things-Obama into talk-show rating points or Internet clicks. The hucksters make up false accusations and spread them like Elizabeth Warren. Top prize for such opportunism goes to Ted Cruz, who turned against the trade bill at the last minute."

In his spinelessness (and oddly on both trade and the Islamic State, not to mention Syria, where both celebrated the refusal to enforce the red line) he most closely resembles Hillary Clinton. She too never met a position she was not willing to modify or discard (opposition to gay marriage, support for the Iraq war, free trade) to keep pace with the base of her party.

The winner of the GOP primary will be the candidate who can dominate one or more segments of the primary electorate, and then bring the others over. That means being responsible enough not to scare moderates, businesspeople and big donors who think a primary responsibility of governing is to keep the government open and who recoil when candidates plunge into trade protectionism, anti-immigration reform rhetoric, anti-government extremism and vociferous opposition to gay marriage. That also means embracing a tough, consistent foreign policy and advancing a credible pro-growth agenda. As for the far right, Cruz simply has too much competition, some from fresher faces than his.

Maybe Cruz has figured out that he isn't viable as a presidential candidate and is now seeking Sarah Palin-like status. He could want to be a celebrity of the far right who does not really govern or move issues but is completely simpatico with a dogged but small sliver of the electorate, and with talk radio. In that regard his biggest competition may be Carson — or Donald Trump.

Ted Cruz Takes Aim at 'Washington Cartel' // Bloomberg // Heidi Przybyla – June 24, 2015

Senator Ted Cruz showed today how he intends to capitalize on the anti-Washington, obstructionist persona he's worked hard to perfect.

In a speech to the Heritage Foundation in Washington, Cruz outlined the populist theme he'll take across the country in his bid for the 2016 Republican presidential nomination, taking aim at big U.S. banks, lobbyists, corporate "welfare" and the "Washington cartel."

The Texas first-termer portrayed himself as a victim of the "corrupt, backroom deals" that, in his view, dominate Washington. Cruz said he's been "vilified" by Democrats, Republicans and the media for bucking congressional leaders on issues running the gamut from raising the debt ceiling to a vote yesterday granting President Barack Obama negotiating authority for international trade agreements. Cruz unsuccessfully opposed both.

"The Washington cartel has amassed more and more power at the expense of the American taxpayer with the same recipe repeated over and over again," he said.

"Washington is looking for solutions for Washington," he added, declaring that those "invariably help the rich and well connected."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Opposes Ex-Im Bank

Cruz singled out for criticism the U.S. Export-Import Bank, whose practices he called tantamount to corporate "welfare," the Dodd-Frank banking legislation that he said has suffocated community banks and government subsidies for ethanol and sugar.

All of the 2016 presidential contenders are trying to weave populist rhetoric into their stump speeches in an effort to address rising income inequality in the U.S. But Cruz's approach of blaming Washington for the economic anxieties many Americans are experiencing speaks to the limited government, anti-establishment wing of his party's conservative base voters.

Rivals' plans

The senator, who was the first major presidential candidate to launch a campaign for the the White House in March, has yet to release an economic plan. Some of his rival candidates already have done so. Kentucky Senator Rand Paul has proposed tax breaks to help companies investing in poor communities and Senator Marco Rubio of Florida has called for revamping programs for the poor and middle class.

Cruz's speech signals that he plans to make a selling point of his role obstructing bipartisan legislation on budget and spending agreements, raising the debt ceiling, pro-immigration policy and surveillance laws.

When he was asked "how can we be sure that you are not part of this mess?" during a post-speech question-and-answer session, Cruz boasted that he's become a pariah in his party, even sharing an anecdote about one closed-door luncheon where fellow Republicans "screamed and yelled" at him for not going along with legislation to raise the debt ceiling.

"You can say a lot of things about me, but beloved by my colleagues in Washington is not one of them," said Cruz.

‘Speaker Cruz’ strikes again // MSNBC // Steve Benen – June 24, 2015

As the Senate prepared to vote yesterday on a key procedural measure on trade, Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) made an announcement. Though he’d recently voted for Trade Promotion Authority – better known as “fast track” – the Texas Republican had changed his mind, and explained himself in a piece for a right-wing website.

Cruz argued, in a piece circulated to reporters by Heritage Action, that congressional Republican leaders in both chambers struck a secret deal with Democrats to renew the Export-Import Bank and tied the policy to trade bill. There’s no proof of any of this – Cruz’s piece didn’t include any – and GOP leaders denied the claims.

But as Roll Call noted, the senator was just getting started.

[Cruz] went after Boehner for punishing conservatives, “wrongly stripping Rep. Mark Meadows, R-N.C., of his subcommittee chairmanship, and reportedly threatening to strip other conservatives of their chairmanships as well.”

If that wasn’t direct enough, Cruz had a couple of questions: “Why does Republican Leadership always give in to the Democrats? Why does Leadership always disregard the promises made to the conservative grassroots?”

He added later in the day, “I think it was wrong for the Speaker to punish a conservative for voting his conscience.”

Cruz has repeatedly partnered with House Republicans – the senator has teamed up with the lower chamber so often that he's earned the "Speaker Cruz" nickname – but this was an unusually brash shot across the House GOP's leadership's bow.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It was also a curious move. Cruz's enthusiastic "fast track" support was supposed to be an opportunity for him to prove his interest in actual policymaking. But just as TPA was poised to pass, the Texan ran to Breitbart to thumb his nose at his ostensible Capitol Hill allies.

Roll Call added that after his announcement, "senior GOP aides were practically lining up Tuesday to offer anonymous quotes bashing Cruz."

One said, "If Cruz is so concerned about his poll numbers, maybe he should spend more time campaigning and less time meddling in the House to avoid these desperate 'I was for it, before I was against it' ploys."

So what's the end-game here? Cruz's poll support enjoyed a brief boost shortly after his presidential campaign kickoff, but his backing has faded and he remains nowhere near the top tier. Presumably, the far-right senator is looking for new ways to connect with the GOP base.

The strategy that he's settled on appears to focus on criticizing his party's congressional leadership and championing rank-and-file Republican members – whose endorsements Cruz would no doubt welcome.

The plan, in other words, is for Cruz to run for president as the candidate most disliked by his own party's top officials.

The House GOP is punishing rebellious members. Ted Cruz is steamed about it. // Vox // Jonathan Allen – June 24, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Ted Cruz ripped GOP leaders in Congress Wednesday for punishing conservatives who voted to kill President Barack Obama's trade agenda, escalating a fight the Texas senator wants to have with his party's establishment.

Following a series of votes on trade two Fridays ago, House Republican Whip Steve Scalise kicked three Republicans out of their spots on the party's vote-counting team, Rep. Mark Meadows (R-NC) was stripped of a subcommittee chairmanship, and Red State's Erick Erickson reported Wednesday morning that Rep. Ken Buck (R-CO) is in danger of losing his post as president of the freshman class.

The Meadows decision is a "shameful example" of a leader seeking retribution "because of his principled objections" to giving the president fast-track trade authority, Cruz said in a speech at the conservative Heritage Foundation.

Cruz, who is currently mired in the second tier of Republican presidential hopefuls, would need a big boost from conservative activists to make a real play for the nomination in 2016. That was his target audience in weaving the retribution anecdotes into a larger narrative pitting conservatives against what he calls the "Washington cartel" of politicians in both parties, lobbyists, and the mainstream media.

He has little to lose in going after Republican leaders, particularly in the House, because they already detest his brand of take-no-prisoners politics. They were incensed in late 2013 when his refusal to give up on repealing the Affordable Care Act paved the way for a government shutdown. And GOP leaders hate that Cruz often complicates their agenda by riling up House conservatives.

The relations have grown so frosty that John Boehner has taken to communicating with Cruz by gesture: The New York Times reported last month that the House speaker's response to a question about Cruz's campaign was to raise his middle finger.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican retribution

Meadows, Buck, and the three Republicans kicked off the whip team all voted against the GOP leadership on the rule for debating a package of trade bills — a serious no-no in a chamber that operates on majority-party rule. Voting against a rule is considered more disloyal than voting against a bill because it threatens the ability of party leaders to control which legislation comes to the floor.

The House and Senate eventually passed fast-track trade authority for Obama.

Rep. Jason Chaffetz (R-UT) the chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform Committee and a Boehner ally, said he alone made the call to knock Meadows from the top spot on of one his panel's subcommittees.

Meadows said in a tweet that he won't vote with GOP leaders if he thinks it will harm his home district.

Boehner defended the Meadows move Wednesday after a GOP caucus meeting, according to the Hill.

"I think the chairman made the right decision. I made it clear to the members I supported that decision."

Ted Cruz mum as his South Carolina campaign co-chairmen lead fight to let Confederate flag fly // NY Daily News // Cameron Joseph – June 24, 2015

Ted Cruz's South Carolina campaign co-chairmen are leading the fight to keep the Confederate flag flying on state Capitol grounds, and Cruz's campaign won't say if he agrees with them.

State Sen. Lee Bright, a Republican, was one of just two state senators to vote against taking down the flag on Tuesday, a day after calling bipartisan efforts led by Republican Gov. Nikki Haley following the murders of nine black churchgoers in Charleston a "Stalinist purge" of his southern heritage.

And South Carolina state Rep. Bill Chumley, another of Cruz's three presidential campaign co-chairmen in the state, agrees with him, told CNN Tuesday night that "We're focusing on the wrong thing here" when asked about the flag, saying the problem was that none of the churchgoers were armed.

"These people sit in there and waited their turn to be shot. That's sad," he said. "Somebody in there with the means of self-defense could have stopped this. And we'd have less funerals than we're having."

Cruz has said he sees "both sides" of the flag debate and wants to leave it to South Carolinians to decide, and his campaign won't say whether he agrees with Bright and Chumley.

Cruz's campaign says it's leaving it up to the state to decide whether the flag should come down.

"Sen. Cruz has said consistently that this is an issue that South Carolina should solve and that's exactly what's happening. South Carolinians, some of whom agree and some of whom disagree with the removal of the flag from the state grounds, are arguing it out, and that's proper, and that's where I'm going to leave it," Cruz strategist Rick Tyler told the Daily News. "When outsiders come into a state and try to dictate what it should be doing that's not proper."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bright told the Daily News he hadn't talked to Cruz's campaign about the issue, and wanted to wait until the victims were buried to begin the debate in earnest.

But he defended his position, saying it was "beyond the pale" for people to compare the white supremacist who murdered the African Americans to Confederate generals like Robert E. Lee.

"Obviously you want to show love and respect to people who've lost loved ones but to blame it on the Confederate flag, it's hard to see how that's going to bring racial healing. What you've seen in Charleston is racial healing, I don't know how it's going to make it better by taking our flag, that'll offend a big part of our population," he said.

The Confederate flag has been a source of controversy in South Carolina after a white supremacist gunned down nine black churchgoers last week in a Charleston church.

Bright said removing the flag would give too much attention and power to Dylann Roof, the white supremacist accused of shooting the nine black churchgoers.

"He'll be remembered as the guy who brought down the Confederate flag and I just don't think we're going to give him that kind of attention," he said. “He'll be the reason the flag came down."

Bright is a Tea Party activist in the state who badly lost a primary to Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) last year. Graham is now running for president, and has joined Gov. Haley in pushing for the flag's removal.

Tyler pointed out that while Cruz was solicitor general he'd filed an amicus brief with the Supreme Court opposing the Ku Klux Klan's attempt to adopt a highway in Missouri.

"He's not some Johnny-come-lately when it comes to purging racism," he said.

Ted Cruz just upped the populist ante for 2016 Republicans // Fortune // Tory Newmyer – June 24, 2015

Ted Cruz just raised the bar for Republican presidential hopefuls angling for the fiery populist mantle.

In a 40-minute stemwinder delivered to a friendly crowd at the Heritage Foundation on Wednesday, the junior senator from Texas inveighed against a corrupt alignment of corporate and political power that he shorthanded as the “Washington Cartel.” That’s apparently new coinage, and you can expect to hear a lot more of it as Cruz tries to elbow his way out of the GOP presidential primary’s second tier and into serious contention for the nomination.

His speech was short on policy prescriptions, and he’s already struck on the anti-establishment theme that organized it. But the acidity of his vitriol tipped the rhetorical pH scale. “Lobbyists and career politicians today make up what I call the Washington Cartel,” he said. “And it operates very much like other cartels. It operates like OPEC. I don’t know, like sheikhs, if they actually wear robes. But they nonetheless on a daily basis are conspiring against the American people.” In Cruz’s formulation, every moneyed interest and every leading pol, Republicans included, are in on it: Big banks, “GM and Chrysler and its suppliers,” “union bosses,” “rich yuppies” buying Teslas, “fat cat insurers,” Enron, Solyndra, Air India and the other beneficiaries of the Ex-Im bank, corn growers, wind energy purveyors, sugar producers, Big Box retailers, and their giant online brethren.

As he spoke, the Senate was preparing to take the last step in handing President Obama fast track authority to wrap work on the 12-nation Trans Pacific Partnership trade agreement. Cruz had been an early and important ally for the White House in its bid to secure that negotiating wiggle room. Back in April, he joined House Ways and Means Chairman Paul Ryan (R-Wisc.) in penning a Wall Street Journal op-ed calling the authority essential to "send a signal to the world. America's trading partners will know that the U.S. is trustworthy and then put their best offers on the table."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Obama administration viewed Cruz's endorsement as a major coup. Heading into the thick of the debate, the White House worried over keeping other Tea Party-affiliated Republicans on board with its trade agenda, since the whole project needed near-uniform GOP support. Cruz's position made it safe for wary House Republicans to climb aboard.

But on Tuesday, as the White House's push for fast track faced its final significant challenge in the Senate, Cruz defected. The problem, he suggested without evidence, was that Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio) had thrown a deal with Democrats to save the Export Import bank into the bargain. And that federal agency, which exists to help finance American exports, has become a bête noire for the anti-corporatist right that Cruz seeks to champion. "There's too much corporate welfare, too much cronyism and corrupt dealmaking, by the Washington cartel," he wrote in the op-ed explaining why he soured on fast track that slyly previewed his Wednesday line. So an uncharitable view of Cruz's flip on fast track might note its timing a day before the Heritage talk and the fact that it brought his position on the issue of the day neatly into line with his theme.

Obama's trade push — a defining priority he shares with the big business lobby — cleared the Tuesday hurdle, with no votes to spare, mostly on the backs of Senate Republicans. As Cruz lit out in a different direction, his Wednesday address laid a new marker for those of his presidential rivals who likewise hope an attack on the system they seek to lead will prove a winning formula.

Ted Cruz depicts lonely fight against "Washington cartel" // Dallas Morning News // Todd J. Gillman – June 24, 2015

Casting himself as a rare truth-teller in the Senate, Texan Ted Cruz depicted his brief career in Washington as a lonely fight against entrenched interests – one that has made him an outcast within the Senate, and uniquely positioned for the presidency.

"There's some Republicans who say gosh, if someone's been vilified, we can't nominate them for anything because they're all beaten up and bloodied," Cruz said. "That's the lie of the Washington cartel. That means the only people we ever nominate are people who never take on the Washington cartel. And you know what, if you've never taken on the Washington cartel you're not going to magically start once you take office."

Cruz spent an hour at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative group headquartered near the Capitol led by former Sen. Jim DeMint, a tea partier who was a key Cruz patron in the 2012 Texas Senate fight.

Now the Texan is one of more than a dozen GOP candidates vying for traction in a crowded 2016 field. At Heritage, he railed as he often does against career politicians in both parties, and the lobbyist-industrial complex that props them up. He called it twisted logic for anyone to depict him as selfish and attention-grabbing for the way he's tackled the Senate—often defying GOP leaders.

"If I'm selfish, then I must be a blithering idiot. Because who selfishly would welcome the derision, the abuse, your fund-raising shut off from this town, nasty press stories written one after the other after the other, all planted by Republicans," Cruz said.

"That's a very odd — you know what the selfish thing to do is? Come here and smile. Give an empty speech, bloviate occasionally at a think tank. Vote with the crowd. Don't rock the boat.... You go to the parties, lobbyists write you checks," he said. "It is not hard to coast and stay in office forever."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The “Washington cartel” took the brunt of Cruz’s remarks. He cited a number of manifestations of the powerful interests that align to protect the status quo, to the detriment of small businesses and struggling families.

He called the Export-Import Bank a killer of American jobs. Businesses in Texas and around the country have been urging Congress to reauthorize the bank, whose charter expires at the end of the month and which provides loan guarantees to U.S. exporters and their customers overseas. Cruz cited data showing that 10 of the biggest U.S. firms enjoy the majority of the benefits.

“It’s hard to imagine an institution that is more emblematic of corporate welfare than the Export-Import Bank,” Cruz said. “It’s good to be the king, and it’s good to be a major donor to the king.”

He defended his about-face on fast-track Trade Promotion Authority this week – a tool long used by presidents of both parties to close international trade pacts – in part by noting rumors that GOP leaders in the House and Senate had privately struck a deal to allow a vote on Ex-Im reauthorization to seal support from holdouts on trade. The leaders have denied such a deal.

“Excellent,” Cruz said. “Prove it. If there is no deal we should let Ex-Im expire and stay expired. For once, all Congress has to do is do nothing, and if Congress is good at anything, it’s doing nothing…. Let it expire and end the gravy train for Washington lobbyists on the Export-Import Bank.”

He boasted that he alone among GOP contenders for president went to an Iowa agriculture summit earlier this spring and declared his opposition to subsidies for ethanol, a corn-based gasoline substitute.

“It’s very easy for conservative politicians to talk about ending cronyism… but when you’re standing in front of the beneficiaries, that’s when you separate talk from action,” Cruz said.

He blasted both sugar subsidies and proposals to require all online retailers to collect sales tax as other examples of crony capitalism at work.

On sugar, he said, federal policies hold down production to artificially boost prices and profits, and those policies stem directly from heavy lobbying; sugar accounts for 0.2 percent of American farming, he said, yet it accounts for 40 percent of the lobbying outlays from crop farming.

As for online taxation, he called that a perfect convergence of powerful interests. Big box, brick-and-mortar retailers have long demanded a level playing field, complaining that online merchants can undercut them by not collecting sales tax. But the biggest online sellers have begun collecting such taxes, so they’re also trying to close the loophole.

That makes small entrepreneurs “a common enemy,” Cruz said, and “in Washington, there’s nothing more beautiful than when the lobbyists align.”

PERRY

Talking with Rick Perry about Iran, China, the Confederate flag // WaPo // Jennifer Rubin – June 24, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I spoke by phone with former Texas governor Rick Perry, who, after announcing his candidacy for president, has moved up a bit in the polls. He looks very likely to make the cut for the first debate on Fox News and is benefiting from his retail political skills and his seriousness on policy, something absent in his 2012 run.

I asked him about the latest developments in Iran, a fiery and defiant speech from the supreme leader and disclosure of a secret annex that would assist Iran with its nuclear program. “I’m glad that I don’t have President Obama as the negotiator for my next car,” he says ruefully. “But this is deadly serious. You don’t give away your strongest positions up front. In this case sanctions were working, and [Iran] came to the table.” Perry criticizes easing up on sanctions in the Joint Plan of Action. “Billions of dollars [for Iran] were freed up,” he says. “I’m really concerned he doesn’t care what’s in the deal as long as he gets a deal.” He ticks off his own demands: “Suspend enrichment. Full access to all facilities, including military facilities. If not, there is no deal. They need to end their ICBM program. That’s not even on the table. If not to deliver a nuclear missile, why do you have [an ICBM] program?” And, Perry says, Iran will need to end support for terrorism. None of that seems possible under the current president.

Perry is also critical of Obama’s response, or lack thereof, with regard to China’s cyberattack. “It appears that all they’ve been doing is discussing talking to China. We’ve got to quit talking and start acting.” He says what’s needed are sanctions on companies or entities that benefit from cyberterrorism, travel bans on those who perpetrate it and development of a blacklist of bad actors that can be shared with private companies and allies. He also says, “They’ve been stealing our intellectual property for years. They have universities that teach this, that teach hacking. We need to end any transnational cooperation with universities that are cultivating hacking.” His complaints about the Obama-Clinton-Kerry foreign policy don’t stop there. “The way China operates is that if you do not have a strong position, they consider it a sign of weakness,” he says. He then launches into a discussion of enhancing our relationship with India. “With [Prime Minister Narendra] Modi, they are very interested in building a relationship, especially economically.” He criticizes the administration early on in denying a sale of fighter jets. “They bought it from the French, the Mirage.” The failure to help friends and punish enemies, leaving allies in the lurch, he says, is “an across-the-board” feature in the administration’s foreign policy.

We turn to the Confederate battle flag controversy. Perry dealt with a similar issue concerning the flag on license plates, but he shares another incident not discussed much. “Texas was part of the old Confederacy and there were a number of places the Confederate flag cropped up. One was a plaque in the state capitol that was offensive to a pretty substantial group of people.” He acknowledges that at first he did not see the need to move a marker citing Confederate pension monies were used to build part of the capitol. “I mean, it had been there for 150 years. I was hesitant to move it. But I had really good friends — [former lawmakers] Ron Wilson and Al Edwards, Texas’s deputy secretary of state Coby Shorter and my counsel Bill Jones — all African American — who said, ‘This is really offensive.’ The license plate was the same issue. It needed to be handled with dignity and respect.” On moving the plaque (to a museum-like setting in the state courthouse) and removing the flag from state license plates, he says, “I think we handled it properly and now it is not a contentious issue.” Perry also boasts that under his governorship Texas had the highest graduation rate for African Americans. The same for Hispanics. (Fact checkers say this occurred in 2012-2013.) “There is not a more powerful message than that . . . that we care about you,” he says.

Perry hails from a red state, so his legislative successes tend to be minimized on the theory he had compliant Republicans. Perry disputes that: “Not one thing big thing did we do — tort reform, education — that we did with just Republicans. We needed some Democrats as well.” He recalls working with a Democratic African American lawmaker from Houston on a sex trafficking bill. “You couldn’t find someone more different than me, but I found out if we’re respectful we could work together.”

Perry is known nationally as a pugnacious fighter against federal overreach, but that characterization is incomplete, at least from his vantage. “My observation is a leader’s job is to bring people together. It is easy to pit people against each other — on race, on gender,” he says. In 2012, his sympathetic view toward illegal immigrants (granting them in-state tuition) was seen as a liability. Now that record may be a plus, at least in the general election. After the Obama years — filled with racial tension and massive government incompetence — presenting himself as a successful governor from a diverse state might be an effective message. In that regard, he might be the most effective non-Jeb Bush candidate in the field.

GRAHAM

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Lindsey Graham's zombie claim about no fugitive being arrested after a failed gun background check // WaPo // Glenn Kessler – June 24, 2015

"Well, 80,000 people failed a background check last year or two years ago. Nine thousand were felons on the run from the law and not one of them was arrested or prosecuted. Absolutely, if I get to be president of the United States, you fail a criminal background check, you try to buy a guy when you're not supposed to, you're going to meet the law head on."

–Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), interview on CNN, June 19, 2015

Two years ago, we examined a similar claim by Graham and found it seriously deficient, giving him Three Pinocchios. And yet we find that he is still going on television and spreading this misinformation. In this case, he repeatedly brought up this factoid during an interview about the tragic mass shooting at a church in Charleston, S.C.

Graham, who is running for the 2016 GOP nomination for president, decried the "lack of dedication" to capturing fugitives and asserted, "If I get to be president of the United States, you fail a criminal background check, you try to buy a gun when you're not supposed to, you're going to meet the law head on."

A Graham spokesman did not respond to a query about why the senator has failed to drop this false claim. Time for a refresher course!

The Facts

Graham is referring to 2010 statistics concerning the National Instant Criminal Background Check System (NICS), which is done through either the FBI or state agencies. The data has not been updated since then.

(We should note that FBI figures actually show nearly 14,000 fugitives were denied gun permits in 2010, not 9,000 as Graham said.)

The key purpose of the background checks in the Brady law is to prevent certain individuals — particularly those with criminal records — from easily buying guns. But from its inception, few people have been prosecuted for lying on the application form. A 2000 General Accounting Office report and a 2004 Justice Department Inspector General report disclosed a lack of clear guidelines for prosecution but also indicated that these are very hard cases to make.

In 2010, the FBI referred about 76,000 denials of firearms to an arm of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF), but after a review 90 percent were not deemed worthy of further investigation while another 4 percent turned out to be incorrect denials. But then even of the relatively small percentage of cases referred to ATF field offices, another quarter turned out to be a case of mistaken denial and most of the rest had no prosecutorial merit.

In the end, 62 cases were referred for prosecution, but most were declined by federal prosecutors or dismissed by the court. Out of the original 76,000 denials, there emerge just 13 guilty pleas.

As the IG's report stated:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We believe that the number of referrals and prosecutions is low because of the difficulty in obtaining convictions in NICS cases. These cases lack "jury appeal" for various reasons. The factors prohibiting someone from possessing a firearm may have been nonviolent or committed many years ago. The basis for the prohibition may have been noncriminal (e.g., a dishonorable discharge from the U.S. military). It is also difficult to prove that the prohibited person was aware of the prohibition and intentionally lied to the FFL [federally licensed dealer]. We were also told that in parts of the United States where hunting historically has been part of the regional culture, juries are reluctant to convict a person who attempted to purchase a hunting rifle.

On the surface, these numbers might suggest Graham is on the right track. But, as we explained before, it would be wrong and misleading to assume that the federal numbers tell the whole story about prosecutions stemming from background checks. Here's what a Justice Department official explained about the people listed as fugitives in the NICS data:

Speaking generally since we're talking nearly 14,000 — most of these people are state fugitives, not federal fugitives. When NICS denies based on an outstanding warrant, they routinely call the issuing jurisdiction (that would be state/local law enforcement) and let them know that the fugitive is, at that moment, at "Bob's gun shop" trying to buy a gun. In most cases, that means the issuing jurisdiction (state/local) will send a radio car to Bob's (the gun shop), scoop up the fugitive, then prosecute him/her in state court for whatever charges are pending. That means they get prosecuted on those charges — not NICS/gun offenses.

In other words, Graham is citing incomplete data. The state fugitives would turn up in state statistics, not federal data. Unfortunately, as far as we can tell, there does not appear to have been any nationwide study of how many fugitives are captured via background checks.

However, the 2000 GAO report said "if the background check indicates that the prospective purchaser is a fugitive (i.e., an outstanding arrest warrant exists), applicable law enforcement agencies can attempt to arrest the individual….Although no comprehensive statistics are available, some of these individuals subsequently have been arrested as a result of having been identified by the background check process."

We also did spot checks of some of the annual reports filed by state police agencies. None list the data in the same way but both Pennsylvania and Virginia, which have state-run systems, indicated that they identified and arrested fugitives in 2010 using background checks. In the most recent year available, 2013, both states indicated that they also arrested fugitives as a result of gun background checks.

From Virginia's 2013 report:

The VFTP processed 479,253 transactions in 2013. Of these, 2,412 were denied based on the results of a criminal history record check or the identification of another disqualifying record. During 2013, 168 wanted persons were identified for extraditable offenses, which resulted in the arrest of 124 individuals wanted in Virginia and 5 individuals who were named in an outstanding warrant from another state. In 2013, the State Police requested 961 criminal investigations related to the illegal sale or attempt to purchase firearms, which resulted in 654 (68%) closed arrests.

From Pennsylvania's 2013 report:

A total of 132 individuals with active warrants were apprehended in 2013. Since its inception on July 1, 1998, the PICS is responsible for the apprehension of 1,723 individuals.

The Pinocchio Test

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is emerging as a “zombie claim” — something that keeps popping up even after it has been debunked. As we explained before, just looking at the federal-level data does not tell the whole story. While there is no comprehensive nationwide survey of fugitive prosecutions, the state-level data from Virginia and Pennsylvania clearly shows that fugitives have been arrested as a result of the Brady law. Pennsylvania alone indicated that it has arrested about a 100 fugitives a year in the past 17 years.

Yet Graham persists in falsely claiming that “not one of them was arrested or prosecuted.” We have little choice but to increase the Pinocchio rating on this claim to Four.

Lindsey Graham Says Charleston Shooting Reminded Him Of ‘Mideast Hate’ // HuffPo // Igor Bobic – June 24, 2015

Last week's horrific shooting in a black church in Charleston, South Carolina reminded Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) of violence in the Middle East.

"I don't know how you can sit with somebody for an hour in a church and pray with them and get up and shoot them. That's Mideast hate," Graham said Wednesday on the Senate floor. "That's something I didn't think we had here, but apparently we do."

Asked by a reporter after his speech to clarify his comments, Graham told NBC's Frank Thorpe, "What ISIL is doing, that kind of hate. It's kind of that hard-heart, that, you know, heart that has been hardened after generations of hate."

Graham made a similar comment last week in an interview the morning after the shooting.

"To go into God's space and do this, I don't know," he told ABC News. "You can't explain it. ... I go to the Middle East a lot. I've seen hate up close. I've seen communities where everybody has been killed because they're a different religion, and you think that's just over there. Sometimes it's not just over there."

The presidential hopeful, who serves on the Armed Services Committee, is one of the most hawkish voices in the U.S. Senate. Last month, he called for sending an additional 10,000 U.S. troops to Iraq. He also maintains that the war there was not a mistake.

In his speech on the Senate floor on Wednesday, Graham praised the community of Charleston for welcoming the alleged shooter, Dylann Storm Roof, into their Bible study.

"He went to Charleston with a plan. The people in the church had no idea who he was or what he had in mind, and he came into the church and he was sitting in the pews by himself, and they invited him up for the Bible study," he said. "And spent an hour with him. And he said they were so nice, I could almost have backed out. That says a lot about them. Says a lot about him."

Earlier this week, Graham reversed course and joined South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley (R) and a slew of other Palmetto State lawmakers in calling for the removal of a Confederate battle flag located on the grounds of the state capitol. He previously defended the flag as "part of who we are."

Lindsey Graham’s racist Charleston jab: White supremacist suspect showed “Mideast hate” //Salon // Sophia Tesfaye – June 24, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is why we can't have nice things.

South Carolina Senator and Republican candidate for president Lindsey Graham took to the Senate floor today to honor the victims of last week's shooting at a historical African-American church in Charleston but instead of simply acknowledging the solemn moment, Graham reached back into his derisive ways to blast suspected shooter Dylann Roof's actions as inexplicable like "Mideast hate."

"I don't know how you could sit in a church and pray with them for an hour and shoot them. That's Mideast hate. That's something I didn't think we had here but apparently we do" said Graham.

South Carolina's political class had come together in near unanimity to call for the removal of the Confederate Flag from federal grounds just days before, leading to the flag being yanked from major retailers and other southern state capitols, but Graham's statement signals an unwillingness to refrain from divisive language until the victims had all received a burial.

On Tuesday, the son of infamous segregationist Strum Thurmond made an impassioned commitment to racial reconciliation in a speech calling for the Confederate flag's removal:

We must take down the Confederate flag, and we must take it down now. But if we stop there, we have cheated ourselves out of an opportunity to start a different conversation about healing in our state. I am ready. Let us start the conversation.

Graham had previously tweeted his hopes for healing in South Carolina:

Lindsey Graham's Charleston-Response Dumpster Fire Just Got Hotter // Vanity Fair // Kia Makarechi – June 24, 2015

Lindsey Graham took to the floor of the Senate on Wednesday to comment on the mass murder that took place on June 17 at a historically black church in Charleston. The suspect in the case is Dylann Roof, a 21-year-old white American who appeared in photos with the Confederate flag and appears to have written a white-supremacist manifesto.

One particularly shocking detail that has emerged about the massacre is that Roof allegedly joined the Bible-study group that was at the Emanuel A.M.E. church for an hour before opening fire and killing nine people. Here's how Graham relayed that detail on the floor of the Senate: "I don't know how you can sit with someone in an hour in a church and pray with them, and [then] get up and shoot them. That's Mideast hate. I didn't think we had that here, but apparently we do."

Graham doubled down when NBC's Frank Thorp asked him about the comment after the senator left the floor. "The kind of hate that [the shooter] exhibited I've only seen in the Mideast," he said. "It's kind of that hard heart, that, you know, heart that has been hardened after generations of hate."

Mid-East hate? Is there no antecedent for the type of white-on-black act of terror that occurred in Charleston last Tuesday? Did the senator forget about the nearly 4,000 lynchings that researchers have identified took place between 1877 and 1950? Did the Oklahoma City bombing, which took place well into Graham's adult years, slip his mind?

Did Graham forget that the first anti-terror law in the United States, the Ku Klux Klan Act—also known as the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Enforcement Act of 1871—was passed to combat white acts of terror against freed black southerners?

Also confusing is why the senator, when looking for a word to describe a mass shooting, looked toward a different region in the world. Mass shootings, as President Barack Obama noted in the immediate aftermath of the Charleston massacre, are all too common in the United States—much more so than in any developed country. The majority of those mass shootings—from Aurora to Sandy Hook to Tucson—sure seem to be committed by white males.

Graham's offensive comment is the latest in what can charitably be described as an inconsistent response to the murders. "I just think he was one of these whacked-out kids," Graham first said, noting that he did not believe racism was a primary motivating factor in the shooting. "I don't think it's anything broader than that. . . . It's about a young man who is obviously twisted."

He then attempted to clarify in an appearance on The View, but appeared to focus more heavily on the religion of the victims than their race: "This guy's got tons of problems and to kill people in a church after sitting with them for an hour shows you, tells you how whacked out this kid is. . . . There are real people who are organized out there to kill people in religion and based on race, this guy's just whacked out. But it's 2015. There are people out there looking for Christians to kill them."

As for the use of the Confederate battle flag on the grounds of the South Carolina statehouse? Graham was again caught off-guard when the political climate shifted around him. "It works here, that's what the statehouse agreed to do," Graham said last week. On Monday, he joined South Carolina governor Nikki Haley as she demanded the state legislature take up the issue of removing the flag from the grounds.

Lindsey Graham is a man who is running for president of the United States. If he wants to be a credible candidate, he should be able to form a reasonably coherent and consistent response to a mass killing that happened because an apparent racist walked into a church in the state Graham represents and picked off nine people on the sole basis of their skin color. He shouldn't need to look to the Middle East for an explanation.

Lindsey Graham Criticizes Hillary Clinton on Equal Pay // Free Beacon // Joe Schoffstall - June 25, 2015

'About creating lawsuit opportunities, it's not about equality'

Republican presidential candidate Sen. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.) criticized Hillary Clinton's support for equal pay laws as little more than a handout to the trial lawyer lobby.

Despite having a history of paying the female staffers in her Senate office far less than their male counterparts, Clinton has claimed to be in favor of laws that would mandate equal pay between the sexes.

Graham said in an interview Wednesday that her stated proposal would never work and is purely politics. He also questioned how many people would want the federal government to set salaries throughout the nation.

"Equal pay is about creating lawsuit opportunities, it's not about equality. It's about creating more opportunities for a company to be sued—it is a talking point. It is a concept and it is a shallow concept. It is designed to make people aggrieved with no solution at hand other than more lawsuits," Graham said.

The senator questioned whether such efforts are the proper role of the federal government.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Is it the government’s job to set salaries for people in this country? I would say the construct she’s proposing would never work; it’s all politics,” Graham said. “How many Americans want the federal government to inventory salaries throughout the country. There are already laws on the books where you could sue somebody if you are being paid less because of your gender.”

Clinton is “toying” with people by giving them hope when there is none, Graham said.

“The worst thing about this is you’re creating—you’re giving people hope—when there is none, you’re toying with people. Those who feel like, ‘I should be paid more,’ well the federal government is not going to come in there and give you more money but there is a process for you to sue if you feel you’re being aggrieved as an individual. Her solution is just to increase more lawsuits. When she talks about equal play and you flush it out, she’s toying with people.”

The Washington Free Beacon previously reported that Clinton’s current equal pay rhetoric doesn’t quite match up to the history of what she paid employees while in the Senate.

While Clinton was a senator, she paid females in her office just 72 cents for each dollar paid to men.

“During those years, the median annual salary for a woman working in Clinton’s office was $15,708.38 less than the median salary for a man,” the Free Beacon found in its analysis of data compiled from official Senate expenditure reports.

Clinton continues to champion equal pay on the campaign trail despite the discrepancy.

CARSON

Carson: Maryland neighbor flew, then took down Confederate flag // CNN // Tom LoBianco and Jeremy Diamond – June 24, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Ben Carson recounted Wednesday how one of his Maryland neighbors was coaxed into taking down a Confederate flag.

Carson said Tuesday on CNN's "New Day" that when he moved to a new home in rural Maryland one of his neighbors put up a Confederate flag – "I guess as a message to us," he said.

The other neighbors responded by flying American flags, which Carson said "shamed" the neighbor into taking down the Confederate one, Carson said.

"We are social beings. Let's send the right messages to each other and I think that will take care of a lot of our problems," Carson said.

Carson is the only black candidate running in the wide open field of Republican candidates this election. He often stands out for telling personal stories -- his biography of rising out of poverty to become a world-famous neurosurgeon was documented in the movie "Gifted Hands". But he also often stumbles when taking on specific issues, like same-sex marriage.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley, a Republican, called Monday on state lawmakers to take down the Confederate flag from the Statehouse grounds. South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, also a presidential candidate, joined Haley in making the call and the other Republican contenders who had been hedging on the issue later joined in the call.

Carson stressed the importance of calling things out at face value – whether that is radical Islam or what the Confederate flag represents.

"I think that what we as Americans once again have to keep in mind is that this is a pluralistic society and we have to live together, and that means we have to identify things that are wrong," Carson said. "We have to call them what they are. Because you'll never be able to deal with them unless you call them what they are."

The South Carolina General Assembly is now debating the issue of the Confederate flag on its Statehouse grounds.

Ben Carson: "Political Correctness" Could Destroy U.S. Like It Did Ancient Rome // Buzzfeed // Christopher Massie – June 24, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Ben Carson once said that America could "go the same route as Ancient Rome" because of "political correctness."

In an interview with host Soul Watson uploaded to SoundCloud three years ago, Carson talked about advice he offered young people on the importance "of having values and principles that govern your life."

He said that "no society" "can long survive without values and principles," and argued that "political correctness" was eroding the values of America.

"You know, there is no society that can long survive without values and principles," he said. "And if we get so caught up in political correctness, that nothing is right and nothing is wrong, then we go the same route as Ancient Rome. They did exactly the same thing. And they forgot who they were. They stood for nothing and they fell for everything and they went right down the tubes."

TRUMP

Is Donald Trump the honey badger of American politics? // WaPo // June 24, 2015

If Donald Trump was a YouTube sensation, he'd be the honey badger. He talks like he just don't care, people laugh, and none of it seems to hurt him.

The notoriously brash real-estate mogul and reality-television star did little to soften his image for a recently announced presidential run as he headlined the Maryland GOP's annual Red, White and Blue fundraiser Tuesday night.

Not surprisingly, Trump attacked President Obama and Republican opponent Jeb Bush with harsh rhetoric during a speech lasting more than 50 minutes. But he also delivered a bit of a slight to the audience, telling the crowd of about 600 paying guests at the BWI Marriott in Linthicum that he hadn't initially wanted to come, but had done so anyway as a favor.

Perhaps it was fitting, then, that he meticulously scrubbed his hands with a sanitary wipe after finishing grip-andgrin photos in a VIP line, as though he were cleansing himself of lowly, fawning supporters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump also did himself no favors among Hispanic voters as he tried to explain the controversial comments he made about Mexican immigrants during his campaign announcement last week, when he suggested that most border crossers are rapists and narco-criminals. "Some, I assume, are good people," he said at the time.

On Tuesday, Trump backed up his assertions with an anecdote about two U.S. border agents who told him that people who cross the border illegally are not good for the country. "They said, 'They're killers, they're rapists, they're drug dealers,'" he recalled.

Trump also suggested that reporters have misconstrued his true feelings about the immigration issue. "I love Mexico," he said. "I love the Mexican people. But I said we need a strong border."

The audience, predominantly white, didn't seem to mind the candidate's tone. Nor did they seem particularly inclined to vote for him.

"He's a little bit of a lightning rod and entertaining, but very intelligent," said Barbara Nye, an accountant from Elkridge, Md. "He's probably not somebody who needs to be president, but he does have some good ideas that are worth listening to and worth talking about."

Similarly, FedEx driver Ken Collins, of Glen Burnie, Md., said he appreciates Trump's approach.

"I like somebody who's not afraid to say what he thinks," Collins said before the speech. "But I don't know much more about him, as far as his politics."

Trump's appearance in Maryland, where registered Democrats outnumber Republicans more than 2 to 1, came one day after he finished second among Republicans in an independent New Hampshire poll. Bush finished first.

"I can't believe Bush is in first place," Trump said. "This guy can't negotiate his way out of a paper bag. So I'm in second place to Bush. I hate it."

Trump focused much of his speech on Obama's job performance, saying the president and his administration appear "stupid" and "incompetent" in general, not to mention "desperate" in nuclear negotiations with Iran.

When asked about the recent civil unrest in Baltimore, Trump said Obama has done little to uplift inner-city Americans, adding that African Americans in particular have "never done more poorly."

Trump insisted that he would help the city by bringing back manufacturing if elected president.

"You have to create spirit," he said. "You have to create jobs. You have to get people working, and they have to want to work."

Trump showed hints of a softer side with considerate words for Maryland Gov. Larry Hogan (R), who announced this week that he is battling advanced non-Hodgkins lymphoma.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I've met your governor, I respect your governor, and he is going to beat this," Trump said. "Give him my regards."

Donald Trump, the Edsel Ford Fung of Candidates, Tells Baltimore It's 'Got No Spirit, None' // Bloomberg // Melinda Henneberger – June 24, 2015

There used to be this restaurant in San Francisco called Sam Wo's, a Chinese place constantly packed with both locals and tourists, not because the food was so great, though it was OK, but because it supposedly had the world's rudest waiter, one Edsel Ford Fung, who'd insult your looks, manner, and menu choices as he took your order, if he deigned to do so at all. People couldn't get enough of it, and the worse he behaved, the harder everyone laughed.

Mr. Fung, may he rest in peace, came to mind Tuesday night amid the political stylings of Donald J. Trump at the Maryland Republican Party's annual Red, White & Blue fundraising dinner, because like the waiter who wouldn't wait, he's a presidential hopeful who doesn't, it seems, really hope to govern.

As he arrived at the dinner, held at the B.W.I. Marriott near the airport, three young men in shorts moved in to have their photos taken with him. "Make it fast," he told each of them, posing for just a second and then moving on to the next. Only, he either didn't notice that it was the same guys, over and over, or he did notice and didn't care. When he strode past the lobby bar and threw a hand in the air in greeting, everybody grinned as big as if he'd called, "Drinks on me!" Then, during a V.I.P. reception photo line, one Marylander after another got to smile, shake hands, and tell him, "You're fired!"

"That's a good one," he told one man. "That's the first time I've heard that tonight."

In a brief question-and-answer session with reporters, he was asked about the rioting in nearby Baltimore that followed the April death of 25-year-old Freddie Gray, whose spine snapped while in police custody. (At the time, Trump tweeted a series of degrading messages: "Our great African American President hasn't exactly had a positive impact on the thugs who are so happily and openly destroying Baltimore!" He also slammed the Baltimore cops, though not on Gray's behalf: "Now that the ineffective Baltimore Police have allowed the city to be destroyed, are the U.S. taxpayers expected to rebuild it (again)?" And, he misquoted the city's mayor: "The Mayor of Baltimore said she wanted to give the rioters 'space to destroy'—another real genius!")

So what would he do as president to address the city's problems? He'd bring back manufacturing, he said, and blamed President Barack Obama for failing to do that and more:

"Baltimore is a very, very special case, and it's a very sad thing that's happening there. And I know Baltimore...and I love Baltimore, and I love what it represents, and where it's gone, and now you look at what happened in one night, just in one night. I mean, other nights were a disaster but one night was catastrophic for Baltimore. You have to create spirit, you have to create jobs, you have to get people working, they have to want to work. And the other thing is, when President Obama got elected, I said look, one thing he's going to be a cheerleader for the country...and in actuality, he's just the opposite. And if you look at black and African—you just take a look—and if you look at black and African-American youth, I mean to a point where they've just about never done more poorly; there's no spirit, there's killings on an hourly basis, virtually, in places like Baltimore and Chicago, certain sections of Chicago, and many other places...Baltimore needs jobs, and it needs spirit. It's got no spirit, none."

Then, he had dinner—chicken, rice, and green beans—and told the audience that "all due respect," he hadn't really wanted to come, but had done so as a favor. That didn't keep him from speaking for 52 minutes—a State of the Union-length talk, but not so much a political speech as a score-settling march through a list of those against whom he has grievances, including Neil Young, Karl Rove, Cher, Chuck Todd, someone with the Club for Growth whose name he can't remember—"David something; I'm falling asleep and he's talking about growth." He accused former George W. Bush spokeswoman Dana Perino of sucking up to him to get him to tweet something favorable about her book, then turning on him on Fox News: "And her book did OK. I wouldn't say it's exactly Gone with the Wind." But then, what is?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

His recent comments about Mexico were actually far more favorable than reported, he said: "I love Mexico. I love the Mexican people, but I said we need a strong border. We need a wall." Here's why: "So I'm at a wedding at one of my clubs, and I always try to go by and say what a beautiful bride, and they're happy as they pay me $600 or $700 a head, and after about two minutes I'm bored stiff, and I met two border guards, and I said, 'What border? We have a border?'" And what they told him, he said, is that the people crossing the border, not just from Mexico, aren't people we want here. "They said, 'They're killers, they're rapists, they're drug dealers.'" Yet somehow, he said, the part about how much he loves Mexico never gets quoted: "I said I love Mexico, and they said I don't love Mexico."

He also, he said, had a love-hate reaction to a new Suffolk University poll that has him running second, behind former Florida Governor Jeb Bush, in New Hampshire: "And I can't believe Bush is in first place. This guy can't negotiate his way out of a paper bag. So, I'm in second place to Bush. I hate it!"

After his remarks, some Republicans left not just laughing but thinking of voting for him. "He's had his ups and downs and bankruptcies," said Oxon Hill realtor Gloria Farrar, "but he knows how to make things work." Her friend Francine Speaker mostly "found him amusing," she said. But "a non-politician politician might be fun for once."

Trump jokes about being behind Bush in New Hampshire poll // CNN // Theodore Schleifer – June 24, 2015

Donald Trump is outpolling all other Republican candidates in New Hampshire except for Jeb Bush, according to a new survey released Tuesday, though if you ask the real estate mogul himself, he thinks he should be in first.

In a poll fielded immediately after their presidential announcements last week, Bush earned 14% of the vote in the crowded GOP field, followed by Trump with 11%. Nearly a third of respondents said they were undecided.

The results from Suffolk University are the clearest indication yet that Trump, the billionaire with a penchant for bombastic rhetoric and unorthodox claims, is catching on with Republican voters early on in the cycle.

Trump referenced the poll Tuesday night while speaking to the Maryland GOP, saying he can't believe he's behind Bush.

"I'm not thrilled, cause how could Bush be in first place?" Trump said. "This guy can't negotiate his way out of a paper bag!"

Pollsters tend to caution that surveys more than six months before any votes are cast may simply be registering each contender's name recognition -- of which Trump has plenty. Trump also joins a crowded GOP field in which none of the candidates — including Bush — have been able to break out of the pack.

In the 2012 cycle, several candidates with a penchant for making headlines with their controversial claims -- such as businessman Herman Cain and former Rep. Michele Bachmann and even Trump himself (though not an official candidate) -- also garnered top spots in early polls only to crash to Earth as the campaign dragged on.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump, as well, is a deeply polarizing figure in the Granite State -- 49% of respondents said they had an unfavorable opinion of him, while only 37% viewed him positively.

Despite New Hampshire Republicans' negative impressions of Trump, few want to see him left off the debate stage in August. The poll found 60% thought Trump should make the cut for the debates, more than wanted to see George Pataki, John Kasich, Bobby Jindal or Lindsey Graham on the stage. Overall, 35% said Trump should be left out of the debates.

"Trump's controversial candidacy is being constructed in a way that gives him visibility and exposure in the short term but may also limit his growth in the long run, like a glass ceiling," David Paleologos, who directed the poll, said in a statement.

New Hampshire, with its first-in-the-nation primary, is a key battleground for 2016 hopefuls. Trump has made five visits to the Granite State this year, according to p2016, a website that tracks candidate visits to the early states.

Trailing Bush and Trump were Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker at 8%, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio at 7%, retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson at 6% and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie at 5%. No other candidates earned more than 5% in the Suffolk survey.

When asked for their second choice candidate, 14% of likely GOP voters named Bush, 13% selected Rubio, 10% picked Walker, 7% said Trump and 6% said businesswoman Carly Fiorina.

Suffolk surveyed 500 likely New Hampshire Republican voters between June 18 and June 22, yielding a margin of error of plus or minus 4.4 percentage points.

Donald Trump responds to Neil Young's diss // CNN // Sophie Tatum – June 24, 2015

If presidential candidate and businessman Donald Trump has proven anything during his first week of campaigning, it's that he's not afraid to take on the haters.

And so the saga between Trump and rock singer Neil Young continues.

When "The Donald" originally announced his run for president, he used Young's song "Rockin' in the Free World" twice during his campaign rally, which backfired when the singer came out criticizing Trump's use of his song while endorsing a different candidate.

"Donald Trump was not authorized to use 'Rockin' In The Free World' in his presidential candidacy announcement," a statement from Young management company said. "Neil Young, a Canadian citizen, is a supporter of Bernie Sanders for President of the United States of America."

Clearly Trump was not pleased with this statement as the real-estate-tycoon-turned-reality-TV-star took to Twitter Wednesday night. Trump published a series of tweets calling the artist a "total hypocrite" because according to Trump, Young visited Trump's office requesting money for an audio deal and invited Trump to his show just last week.

And don't worry, if you are a "nonbeliever," Trump even included pictures of the two shaking hands and the money request with the singer's signature just for you.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump then goes on to say that "Rockin In The Free World" was just background music at the rally among 10 other songs and that he, "Didn't love it anyway."

So, we can now add Neil Young to the list of individuals Trump has publicly dissed, which include fellow 2016 hopefuls like Jeb Bush and Hillary Clinton, as well as stars like Cher and Russell Brand and even CNN's very own Chris Moody.

Keep on rockin', Mr. Trump.

Does Donald Trump Put His Money Where His Mouth Is? Campaign Contributions Say, 'He's Fired.' // The Blaze // Jennifer Kerns – June 24, 2015

Billionaire businessman Donald Trump has a long history of raising capital and doing deals.

Even before throwing his fancy top hat into the ring for the 2016 presidential race, he became a media darling on conservative news outlets attacking far-left President Barack Obama and Congress.

But has Donald Trump put his money where his mouth is, politically?

A review of more than a decade of campaign contribution data illustrates that Trump is a bipartisan giver at best and in fact, leans toward the left.

Data compiled by CrowdPAC - a new leading resource for objective data on U.S. political campaigns – reveals that Trump's donation lean just as much to the left, as to the right.

A 30-year analysis of Trump's campaign donation history shows that beginning in the 1980s, Trump gave big to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee ($22,000), to the Democratic Assembly Campaign Committee of New York ($25,00) and to the DCCC's "Building Fund" in 1993, 1994 and 1997 (at least $10,000). He also contributed to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee in 2002 ($25,000), the New York State Democratic Party ($5,000) and the New York State Democratic Committee also in 2002 ($5,000). Public records show he contributed again to the DCCC in 2006 ($35,000) and with a whopping donation to the Democratic Campaign Committee of New York State in 2008 ($50,000).

In addition to his institutional donations, Trump has also supported longtime Democrat politicians Ted Kennedy, Chuck Shumer, Joseph Kennedy, Eliot Spitzer, Charlie Rangel, the Cuomo family and Daniel Patrick Moynihan with numerous donations. He even gave his now-opponent Hillary Clinton several donations, although in smaller amounts of $1,000 each.

Campaign finance data from CrowdPAC reveals that Donald Trump gave big to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, along with Andrew Cuomo, Hillary Clinton, Sen. Dick Durbin, and California Governor Jerry Brown. (Jennifer Kerns)

Campaign finance data from CrowdPAC reveals that Donald Trump gave big to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, along with Andrew Cuomo, Hillary Clinton, Sen. Dick Durbin, and California Governor Jerry Brown. (Jennifer Kerns)

That is not to say Donald Trump hasn't contributed to Republicans.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He has.

Trump has contributed to the Republican National Committee ($75,000), Senate Republican Campaign Committee of New York ($30,000), New York State Senate Republican Campaign Committee ($55,000), the California Republican Party during Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger's administration in 2005 ($25,000). He's also contributed to the Republican Governor's Association ($25,000), the National Republican Senatorial Committee ($90,000), and Republican Parties in key states.

Closer to home, he's also been a team player to Republican causes such as the New York State Senate Republican Campaign Committee ($10,000), Friends of Pataki ($10,000), and to GOP darlings such as Rudy Giuliani.

Campaign finance data from CrowdPAC shows that Donald Trump increased his GOP donations after a critical 2011 Washington Post article. (Jennifer Kerns)

Campaign finance data from CrowdPAC shows that Donald Trump increased his GOP donations after a critical 2011 Washington Post article. (Jennifer Kerns)

However, it seems that Trump accelerated his GOP giving after a critical Washington Post article in 2011 slammed him for being a larger contributor to Democrat Party causes and candidates. It was only after the Post article was published that Trump made larger contributions to the RNC, the NRSC and the RGA.

As Trump grew increasingly frustrated with President Obama's foreign and domestic policies – suggesting that Obama "kisses everyone's ass" and that domestically, Obama's policies are a "disaster" – it is possible that Trump genuinely turned the tide on donations.

Conventional wisdom suggests it's more likely that Trump knew he would run in 2016 and knew that conservative voters don't take kindly to big Democrat contributors.

What voters will think of Trump's history has yet to be seen.

On the one hand, conservatives may be so hungry for a White House win they may turn a blind eye to the Donald's Democrat dollars in exchange for his tough talk against Obama.

On the other hand, if conservatives value a candidate who puts his money where his mouth is and dig deep enough into the campaign finance data, voters just might say to the left-leaning, big-spending Trump this primary season: "You're fired."

UNDECLARED

WALKER

Scott Walker to sign legislation expanding gun rights in Wisconsin // WaPo // Jenna Johnson – June 24, 2015

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) plans to sign two new laws on Wednesday that expand the rights of gun owners by removing a 48-hour waiting period for those looking to purchase a firearm and allowing off-duty or retired police officers to carry concealed weapons at public schools. This action will come one week after a suspected gunman shot and killed nine people in an African American church in South Carolina, yet again prompting a national discussion about gun laws in the U.S.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Walker plans to sign the two pieces of legislation — Senate bills 35 and 70 — at a ceremony at the Milwaukee County Sheriff's Office on Wednesday afternoon, according to a Tuesday evening press release from the governor's office. Laurel Patrick, a spokeswoman for the governor, said this bill-signing was scheduled and announced about two weeks ago, several days before the shooting occurred in South Carolina.

Walker, who is expected to announce in mid-July that he will run for president, has overseen the expansion of gun-owner rights in Wisconsin. He often brags in early-primary states like Iowa that his state now allows most of its residents to carry concealed firearms. Wisconsin has also enacted a so-called "castle doctrine" that provides some protections to homeowners who shoot intruders to their property.

Walker has an A-plus rating from the National Rifle Association. In endorsing Walker during his reelection campaign last year, NRA Political Victory Fund Chairman Chris W. Cox said in a statement: "Scott Walker is a battle-tested leader in the fight to preserve Second Amendment rights in Wisconsin. He's never wavered, never backed down and never stood still in the fight to protect our freedoms."

Months ago, Walker said he supported getting rid of Wisconsin's 48-hour waiting period for those looking to purchase a handgun. Walker has said that a waiting period is not needed, especially now that firearm dealers can perform instant background checks on their buyers.

“That’s one of those where with new technology, we want to make sure the bad guys don’t get firearms, and the good guys do,” Walker told the NRA’s news network during an interview in late February, according to the Wisconsin State Journal.

Some Democrats in Wisconsin have argued that this waiting period is also a cooling-off period for those contemplating suicide or who might shoot another person in a fit of passion, especially in cases of domestic abuse. The legislation was passed by the Republican-dominated legislature earlier this month.

At the same time, lawmakers passed legislation that allows off-duty and retired law enforcement officers to carry concealed weapons on public school grounds. Current law only allows on-duty officers to do so.

Scott Walker signs two pro-gun bills // Politico // Daniel Strauss – June 24, 2015

Scott Walker expanded gun rights in Wisconsin on Wednesday by signing into law two bills that, respectively, get rid of the state’s 48-hour waiting period and let retired or off-duty law enforcement officials carry concealed firearms into public schools.

Walker’s move was long in the making — Milwaukee County Sheriff David Clarke announced on June 11 that the Wisconsin governor would sign the 48-hour waiting period bill into law.

But it also comes a week after a gunman killed nine people at an historic African-American church in Charleston, South Carolina, setting off a national debate over race and gun control.

“This bill signing has been long planned with law enforcement,” Walker Press Secretary Laurel Patrick wrote in an email.

Walker, who is expected to jump into the 2016 presidential race in the next few weeks, often touts his efforts to roll back gun laws in the state. He also has an A-plus rating from the National Rifle Association.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

During an April 10 speech at the NRA's annual meeting in Nashville, Tennessee, the Wisconsin governor bashed President Barack Obama on gun control.

"Sometimes I think that the current occupant in the White House forgets that when the president is sworn in he takes an oath to 'preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States,'" Walker said. "Well Mr. President, the Second Amendment is part of the constitution. You don't get to pick and choose which part of the constitution you support. Preserving, protecting and defending it is not optional. It's mandatory."

Walker says Obama, federal government must fix subsidies // AP // Scott Bauer – June 24, 2015

If the U.S. Supreme Court strikes down health care subsidies available under federal law, it's up to President Barack Obama and Congress to fix it — not the states, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker said Wednesday.

Walker, who is expected to launch his run for president in mid-July, wrote an opinion piece and answered questions about the issue following a bill signing ceremony in Milwaukee. The Supreme Court is expected to rule this month on whether subsidies under the 2010 law can continue to go to Wisconsin and 33 other states that use the federal HealthCare.gov website and don't run their own insurance exchanges.

Walker, who has called for a repeal of the health care law, was asked what his contingency plan was if the subsidies are struck down.

"President Obama created the problem, the previous Congress created the problem, they should fix it. As usual, they're going to want to kick the problem to the states and we're not going to take it," Walker said.

About 183,000 people in Wisconsin purchase their insurance through the exchange and nine out of 10 of them are receiving a federal subsidy, according to an analysis of state data by Wisconsin Children and Families. The average tax credit they receive is $315 a month.

Health care advocates who have been critical of Walker for not taking federal money to pay for expanding Medicaid coverage have also called on the Republican second-term governor to prepare for the subsidies to be taken away.

"It's Scott Walker's moral responsibility as governor to protect the people from a foreseeable disaster, like tens of thousands being cut off from health coverage," said Robert Kraig, executive director of Citizen Action of Wisconsin. "By passing the buck to Congress, Walker is putting at risk the lives and fundamental freedoms of people in every corner of Wisconsin."

Research director Jon Peacock and policy analyst Sashi Gregory said in a report released last week that Wisconsin should quickly accept the federal money to expand Medicaid coverage and more to create a state-run marketplace that qualifies for subsidies, they said.

Walker said anyone concerned about losing coverage should contact Obama and their federal representatives.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"They should contact their member of Congress and say, 'Stop blaming people that didn't create the problem,'" Walker said. "'You're at the federal government, step up, start leading, fix the problem you created.'"

Republicans in Congress have been divided over what their response to the lawsuit should be. Some conservatives say the statute's subsidies should be completely ended and the law dismantled. Many Republicans say a complete overhaul would have to await the 2016 elections, when the GOP hopes to capture the White House and retain congressional control.

Gov. Scott Walker Signs Bills to Loosen Wisconsin Gun Laws // AP // June 24, 2015

After signing two bills that loosen Wisconsin's gun laws, Gov. Scott Walker defended the timing of his public event Wednesday, saying it had been scheduled before nine people were shot and killed last week in a South Carolina church.

With his signature, the all-but-certain Republican presidential candidate eliminated the state's 48-hour waiting period for handgun purchases and allowed off-duty, retired and out-of-state police officers to carry firearms on school grounds. Both measures passed earlier this month in the GOP-majority Legislature with bipartisan support.

The timing of the bill signing comes amid a renewed debate over gun control and race relations after the fatal shootings at a Charleston, S.C., black church on June 17. A white man faces multiple murder charges.

Mr. Walker said the bill-signing event was scheduled on June 11. After June 30, the measures would have become law without his signature.

"If we had pulled back on this, I think it would have given people the erroneous opinion that what we signed into law today had anything to do with what happened in Charleston," Mr. Walker said at the ceremony, held at the Milwaukee County Sheriff's office.

The governor said the country's focus should be on the families affected by the shooting and on condemning the shooter.

"We need to denounce not just the acts, but to denounce the beliefs that he had. This was a racist, evil man who needs to be called out...this should be unacceptable in America," Mr. Walker said.

The governor, who was joined Wednesday by Republican lawmakers and families who supported the measures, has been an outspoken supporter of gun rights. Mr. Walker previously made Wisconsin the 49th state to legalize concealed carry—even in state buildings—and signed a "castle doctrine" bill giving homeowners more legal protections if they shoot an intruder.

He also has a 100% rating from the National Rifle Association and spoke at the NRA's annual meeting in April. The NRA in a statement Wednesday called the bills' signing a "victory for gun rights in Wisconsin."

Ten states and the District of Columbia impose some form of waiting period for buying handguns, according to the Law Center to Prevent Gun Violence. Wisconsin's 48-hour period has been in effect since 1976.

Supporters of eliminating the waiting period said it would better allow people to protect themselves, while opponents said it would lead to people caught up in fits of rage or depression to obtain weapons quickly.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Supporters also say it inconveniences law-abiding citizens, that background checks can be completed in hours and women would be able to get guns faster to protect themselves and their families from abusers.

Backers of allowing off-duty and retired police officers to carry concealed weapons at schools said it would create another line of defense for students and teachers if a shooter attacks. Opponents said allowing nonuniformed officers to carry guns at schools could scare students.

The new laws will take effect Friday.

Scott Walker Ensnared by Wisconsin Budget as White House Run Beckons // Bloomberg // John McCormick – June 24, 2015

Division among Wisconsin Republicans over how to pay for roads and a sports arena threatens to muddy Governor Scott Walker's message that he's a get-it-done manager and complicate his presidential campaign announcement.

The governor has repeatedly pledged not to reveal his plans until after he signs a two-year budget. He'd anticipated that happening in late June, but fellow party members who control his legislature aren't cooperating.

"The chances of a budget by July 1 are getting pretty slim," said Todd Berry, president of the Wisconsin Taxpayers Alliance, a nonpartisan group that since 1932 has studied government finance.

The timing matters most to Walker. Without a budget, the state would function, but the governor could be mired in Madison as competitors travel the country raising money and name recognition. He would have to decide whether to break the promise he's made to take care of state business before addressing the nation's.

The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel has reported that Walker is considering July 13 for a formal announcement. On that date, he would be among the last to enter the race.

"Governor Walker continues to meet and talk regularly with legislative leaders," Laurel Patrick, his spokeswoman, said Tuesday in a statement. "We have been and will continue working with them on a budget that best serves the citizens of Wisconsin."

Internecine Conflict

When Walker delivered his spending plan in February, he used the $70 billion proposal to highlight policies popular with his party's base, including reduced funding for a university known for Democratic leanings, drug screening of welfare recipients and enlarging a private-school voucher program. The budget was roughly the same size as the one he signed June 30, 2013.

But in a move that upset some supporters, Walker proposed using taxpayer money to pay for half of a new $500 million arena for the Milwaukee Bucks, a professional basketball team that's threatened to leave the state otherwise. He says the subsidy is more economical than losing tax revenue.

His support for public money has drawn criticism from conservative groups including Americans for Prosperity, which played a key role in his election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Government shouldn’t be in the business of financing a private sports stadium,” David Fladeboe, AFP’s Wisconsin director, said in a June 4 statement. “The current deal is based on fuzzy math, complicated accounting and millions of taxpayer dollars.”

Walker has sought to keep the arena in the budget bill. Patrick declined to say whether he’d allow a separate vote, as some Republicans have suggested .

“Governor Walker will continue working with legislators to protect taxpayers from the financial impact of losing the Bucks,” she said.

Funding for roads is equally fraught, with divisions between suburban and rural interests within the Republican caucus. Walker has opposed any increase in gas taxes or vehicle registration fees. Instead, he’s proposed issuing $1.3 billion in debt.

The Assembly’s speaker, Republican Robin Vos, is among those who have been critical of Walker’s proposed borrowing.

“At some point, your credit card is maxed out and you can’t do anymore,” he told WISN-TV in Milwaukee. “So, when Governor Walker proposed $1.3 billion in borrowing, I just think that is irresponsible.”

The debt in Walker’s proposed budget is less than half that of his predecessor’s last spending plan and at the lowest level in a decade, according to Wisconsin’s nonpartisan Legislative Fiscal Bureau.

Wisconsin has about $10 billion in tax-supported debt, 15th among states and the 13th-highest per capita, according to Moody’s Investors Service.

Governor’s Dilemma

There are no immediate dire effects if the state misses the June 30 end of the fiscal year, something that has happened in other budget cycles. Spending would continue at current levels.

Democrats are in no hurry to help.

“There are some significant issues that still remain and it could very easily spill over to mid-July or later,” said Representative Peter Barca, the minority leader of the Assembly.

Senator Duey Stroebel, a Republican, said Walker would be free of the debate’s complexities soon.

“We’re getting closer every day,” he said. “I would be shocked if this wasn’t done by July 13.”

JINDAL

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bobby Jindal Announces Bid for President // NYT // Manny Pernandez – June 24, 2015

Gov. Bobby Jindal, who became Louisiana's first nonwhite governor since Reconstruction but whose popularity has plummeted as the state struggled with a $1.6 billion shortfall, announced on Wednesday that he is running for president in 2016.

Mr. Jindal, 44, who became the nation's first Indian-American governor when he took office in 2008, joins the crowded field of Republican contenders in what even his supporters call a long-shot candidacy in which he faces several disadvantages.

The announcement was made online, and Mr. Jindal plans a late-afternoon announcement speech outside New Orleans.

Mr. Jindal has kept a low profile on the national stage compared with Jeb Bush, Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin and other Republican candidates and likely candidates being closely watched by analysts and the news media. And his poll numbers have fallen sharply in his home state as he nears the end of his eight-year tenure, amid criticism that he has been more focused on laying the groundwork for a presidential run than on Louisiana's fiscal troubles.

Mr. Jindal's announcement address, here in the New Orleans suburb of Kenner, comes two days after the latest Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll found him sharing the bottom of a list of 16 candidates. In the telephone survey, zero percent of Republican primary voters said Mr. Jindal was their top pick to be the nominee, compared with Mr. Bush, who earned 22 percent.

Low support in national polls may have especially dire consequences for lesser-known Republicans: Fox News and CNN are limiting the first two major debates to candidates who rank in the top 10 in national polls, meaning Mr. Jindal could be excluded from crucial nationally televised face-offs with his rivals.

"I don't think anybody in Louisiana thinks he can win," said Roy Fletcher, a Republican political consultant in Baton Rouge who was deputy campaign manager for Senator John McCain's presidential campaign in 2000. "It's a real, real long shot."

If there is an opening for Mr. Jindal to rise to the top tier of candidates, it probably likely have to do with whether he can rally and inspire social conservatives and evangelical Christians on a national scale.

Last month, Mr. Jindal issued an executive order to protect those who do not support same-sex marriage after the Louisiana Legislature effectively killed a similarly worded bill.

Mr. Jindal, who was raised by Hindu parents but converted to Roman Catholicism, supports abortion restrictions, has raised doubts about evolution and signed the Louisiana Science Education Act, which critics say opened a back door to teaching creationism in public schools. Last week, at an annual gathering of Christian conservatives in Washington called the Faith and Freedom Coalition's Road to Majority Conference, Mr. Jindal's speech earned enthusiastic praise.

"Jindal's poll numbers in Louisiana right now are atrocious, and most Louisianians don't think he has much chance of winning the presidency, but anybody who writes off Bobby Jindal could end up with egg on his face," said Quin Hillyer, a longtime conservative columnist who served as press secretary for former Representative Bob Livingston of Louisiana. "I am not predicting a Jindal win. I'm just saying it's crazy to rule it out."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

His campaign strategists acknowledge his poor showing in national polls and lack of name recognition, but they expressed confidence that he had both a message and a path to victory, casting him as the youngest candidate with the longest resume in a wide open Republican race. They said that in such a crowded field, all it takes to win Iowa — and alter the dynamics of the race — is 26,000 votes.

"Anybody would like to be ahead by 30 points, but there's never been a nomination this wide open in our lifetimes," said Curt Anderson, Mr. Jindal's chief strategist. "You don't have a leader sitting at the top. We start from nowhere, and we're completely fine with that."

Mr. Jindal's drop in popularity in Louisiana is a reversal of fortune of sorts. He was elected in October 2007 largely in reaction to the failures of his Democratic predecessor in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, Kathleen Babineaux Blanco.

And he had the reputation of a kind of wonky boy genius. At age 24 in 1996, he was appointed secretary of the state Department of Health and Hospitals, the biggest department in state government, and he quickly went to work cutting jobs and slashing its budget.

In 2004, at 33, he was elected to Congress from the New Orleans suburbs after losing to Ms. Blanco one year earlier in his first bid for governor. At age 36 in 2007, he ran for governor again and won, becoming the nation's youngest governor.

Yet over two terms, Mr. Jindal's approval ratings have dipped after his handling of the state's budget woes. Policy experts and lawmakers blamed the budget shortfall, the state's worst in decades, in part on the downturn in oil prices that hurt Louisiana and other energy-producing states and in part on the Jindal administration's fiscal policies.

The shortfall caused the state's public colleges and universities, which already sustained deep cuts, to consider mass layoffs and shutting departments. But this month, at the end of the legislative session, lawmakers reached an agreement to close the $1.6 billion shortfall that, because of a complex arrangement of tax credits, allows Mr. Jindal to technically claim that the state passed a balanced budget without raising new tax revenue.

Mr. Jindal and his aides defended his record and his tax credit plan, saying the budget that was passed protected higher education and health care but was in line with his philosophy of reducing the scale of government.

"Nobody has a record like he does of actually shrinking the size of the government," Mr. Anderson said. "The budget is 26 percent smaller than when he first took office."

Others are more blunt, and less flattering.

"He's a lame-duck governor and the state's broke," said Bernie Pinsonat, a Louisiana pollster who works for both Democrats and Republicans. "He's worn out his welcome with the voters."

Bobby Jindal Expected to Enter Fray Near the Bottom of the Pile // NYT // Manny Fernandez – June 24, 2015

Days after landing near the bottom of a nationwide poll of Republican primary voters, Mr. Jindal is expected on Wednesday to announce that he is running for president, joining the crowded field of Republican contenders in what even his supporters call a long-shot candidacy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Jindal, 44, was elected as the nation's first Indian-American governor in 2007 and quickly earned a reputation as a technocrat and a darling of Christian conservatives. Mr. Jindal, who was raised by Hindu parents and converted to Roman Catholicism, has since watched his approval ratings plummet. Criticized for focusing on laying the groundwork for his presidential run instead of running the state, Mr. Jindal lately has been almost as unpopular with some Republicans as he has been with Democrats.

"I don't think anybody in Louisiana thinks he can win," said Roy Fletcher, a Republican political consultant in Baton Rouge who was deputy campaign manager for John McCain's presidential campaign in 2000.

His low approval ratings are based in part on his handling of the state's budget and its $1.6 billion shortfall. Lawmakers on both sides publicly denounced, but ultimately approved, the governor's complex tax credit plan that helped close the budget gap. Republicans called the plan "nonsense."

At his announcement on Wednesday, Mr. Jindal is likely to embrace and appeal to his strongest base: social conservatives and evangelical Christians. Mr. Jindal is an outspoken proponent of "religious liberty," issuing an executive order recently to protect those who, on religious grounds, do not support same-sex marriage. He issued the order after a similar bill died in the Legislature.

"It is crazy to underestimate his doggedness or his political skills," said Quin Hillyer, a conservative columnist and Louisiana native.

Bobby Jindal Enters Crowded GOP Presidential Race // WSJ // Reid J. Epstein – June 24, 2015

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal launched a long-shot bid for the Republican nomination for president Wednesday, an effort that will rely on wooing the socially conservative voters who dominate states with early contests.

Mr. Jindal—a 44-year-old former Rhodes Scholar who is barred by term limits from seeking a third term in Baton Rouge—told a crowd in suburban New Orleans that he's the only Republican candidate who won't compromise conservative principles.

Unusual for a Republican presidential announcement speech, Mr. Jindal directly attacked a rival by name—Jeb Bush, one of the front-runners for the nomination.

"You've heard Jeb Bush say that we need to be willing to lose the primary in order to win the general election," Mr. Jindal said. "Let me translate that for you…He is saying that we need to hide our conservative ideals."

Mr. Jindal is the first of four sitting GOP governors poised to enter the crowded race. In the on-deck circle are New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, and possibly Ohio Gov. John Kasich.

Mr. Jindal was appointed secretary of Louisiana's state Department of Health and Hospitals at age 24. By 28, he was president of the University of Louisiana system. By 30, he was confirmed a deputy secretary in the George W. Bush administration.

He lost a race for governor and was elected to Congress twice before winning election to become governor on his second try, at age 36.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Now a distinct underdog, Mr. Jindal speaks about a viable path to the GOP nomination: performing well among Iowa's evangelical Christians and impressing New Hampshire town-hall audiences.

"When the front-runners are still clumped together around 10%, what that tells me there is a path wide open for folks," Mr. Jindal said in an interview last week. "I get the sense that voters are saying this isn't about just one good impression."

The latest Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll found just one Republican primary voter out of 236 polled who said Mr. Jindal was his or her choice for president. A Suffolk University poll of New Hampshire Republicans released Tuesday found two of 500 people who like the Louisiana governor best. He hasn't been above 1% in an Iowa poll since February, when he received 2% support.

Mr. Jindal's approval rating in Louisiana is hovering around 30%, which he attributes to the difficult choices he has made as governor, including cutting the state payroll by 30,000 employees and the state's budget by 26%. He said per-capita income had grown significantly over the past seven years and that the state's economic growth had outpaced the national rate.

Any plausible path to the nomination for Mr. Jindal begins in Iowa, where the state's last two caucus winners—former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee in 2008 and former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum in 2012—catapulted themselves into the national conversation by winning over the state's socially conservative voters.

This year's crowded primary means Mr. Jindal, who is opposed to gay marriage and abortion rights has to compete with more than Iowa's last two winners. Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson are also targeting the same slice of voters.

"He has made an excellent impression with traditional Christian conservative evangelical caucus goers," said Matt Strawn, a former chairman of the Republican Party of Iowa. "The bad news is there are about six other candidates, two of whom are former Iowa caucus winners who are competing for those exact same voters."

Mr. Jindal argues that early-state voters haven't gotten to know him yet. He has made 12 Iowa visits since 2013—more than Messrs. Bush and Walker and Sen. Marco Rubio. Already this year, Mr. Jindal has released policy white papers laying out his proposals for health care and education.

Judd Saul, a filmmaker from Cedar Falls, Iowa, who is the founder of the Cedar Valley Patriots for Christ, said he left a meeting with Mr. Jindal last week enthused about his positions on social issues and foreign policy. Mr. Jindal said he wouldn't rule out sending U.S. troops to Iraq to combat Islamic State.

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal Set to Enter Republican Race for President // WSJ // Reid J. Epstein – June 24, 2015

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal is set to announce Wednesday that he is running for the Republican nomination for president, in a long shot bid that will rely on wooing the socially conservative voters who dominate early primary states.

Mr. Jindal, a 44-year-old former Rhodes Scholar who is barred by term limits from seeking a third term in Baton Rouge, is the first of four sitting Republican governors poised to enter the already crowded race.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Jindal's path to the nomination looks steep. The latest Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll found just one likely Republican primary voter out of 236 polled—not 1%—who said Mr. Jindal is his or her choice for president. A Suffolk University poll of New Hampshire Republicans released Tuesday found two of 500 people who like the Louisiana governor best. He hasn't been above 1% in an Iowa poll since February, when he received 2% support.

Mr. Jindal doesn't talk like an underdog. He talks about a viable path to the GOP nomination, performing well among Iowa's evangelical Christians and impressing New Hampshire town-hall audiences.

"When the front-runners are still clumped together around 10%, what that tells me there is a path wide open for folks," Mr. Jindal said in an interview last week in Washington. "I get the sense that voters are saying this isn't about just one good impression."

Mr. Jindal has also struggled with voters in his home state. His approval rating in Louisiana is hovering around 30%. His unpopularity, Mr. Jindal said, stems from the difficult choices he has made as governor. His record, he says, includes clipping 30,000 employees from the state payroll, reducing the state's budget by 26% and stemming an outflow of Louisiana's residents to other states.

Mr. Jindal is the first in a series of Republican governors who are expected to officially enter the race. Also in the on-deck circle are New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, and possibly Ohio Gov. John Kasich.

Any plausible path to the nomination for Mr. Jindal begins in Iowa, where the state's last two caucus winners—former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee in 2008 and former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum in 2012—catapulted themselves into the national conversation by winning over the state's social conservative voters.

This year's historically crowded primary means Mr. Jindal, who is opposed to gay marriage and abortion and sought to implement "religious freedom" legislation like the controversial measure Indiana passed, and then watered down, earlier this year, has to compete not just with Iowa's last two winners. Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson, are all targeting the same slice of voters.

"He has made an excellent impression with traditional Christian conservative evangelical caucus goers," said Matt Strawn, a former chairman of the Republican Party of Iowa. "The bad news is there are about six other candidates, two of whom are former Iowa caucus winners who are competing for those exact same voters."

Mr. Jindal argues that early-state voters haven't got to know him yet. He has made 12 Iowa visits since 2013—more than front-runners such as Jeb Bush, Mr. Walker and Marco Rubio, but fewer than Messrs. Cruz, Huckabee, Santorum and Perry. Already this year Mr. Jindal has released policy white papers laying out his proposals for health care and education, though neither received much notice.

Judd Saul, a filmmaker from Cedar Falls, Iowa, who is the founder of the Cedar Valley Patriots for Christ, said he left a meeting with Mr. Jindal last week enthused about his positions on social issues and foreign policy. Mr. Jindal said he wouldn't rule out sending U.S. troops to Iraq to combat Islamic State.

"He's definitely a good contender," Mr. Saul said. "What I'd be concerned with is, is he really a serious contender? The other guys seem to be showing a little more interest in actually running."

Mr. Jindal, who waited until he could sign a state budget before formalizing his presidential aspiration, would be the 13th major Republican presidential candidate. His focus on state issues, he said, have kept him from all but the perfunctory appearances at events at which a parade of presidential contenders speak to activists.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“You can go to Iowa and give a speech—that’s different from spending a lot of time on the ground in front of town halls, answering people’s questions, taking hours to do that, we haven’t been able to do that,” Mr. Jindal said. “I’m confident that as we spend the time talking directly to voters it will pay off.”

Bobby Jindal might be Republicans’ Obama. But not in the good ways. // WaPo // Chris Cillizza – June 24, 2015

I first met Bobby Jindal in early 2003. He was running to be governor of Louisiana. He was 32. And he was, literally, the single most accomplished and impressive young person I had ever met.

Ivy League grad with degrees in biology and public policy. Rhodes Scholar. Head of the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals at 24. By 27, the executive director of the National Bipartisan Commission on the Future of Medicare. President of the Louisiana state university system. It was an absolutely remarkable resume -- the ambitious, in-a-hurry high achiever personified. (I was 27 at the time of that interview and, um, slightly less accomplished.)

Jindal lost that first race, which in retrospect was telling. He then quickly ran and won the open 1st District congressional seat in 2004 and bided his time in Washington until he could run again for governor, which he did in 2007 -- easily winning an open-seat race.

He immediately became a nationally known figure as the country's first Indian American governor -- and a Republican to boot. By the end of 2008, Jindal fever was everywhere. Steve Schmidt, who oversaw John McCain's presidential bid that year, told The Post this about Jindal: "The question is not whether he'll be president, but when he'll be president, because he will be elected someday." (That Schmidt quote appeared in a story headlined: "GOP Looks to Young Louisiana Gov. Jindal as Its Own Version of Obama." And others made the same comparison.)

It made perfect sense then that Jindal would be asked to deliver the 2009 Republican response to President Obama's address to a joint session of Congress. Then this happened:

Jindal looked and sounded totally out of his depth. His delivery was widely mocked -- Jon Stewart delivered a particularly brutal takedown -- and Jindal drew unfavorable comparisons to "Kenneth the Page," the hopelessly naive country bumpkin played by Jack McBrayer on NBC's "30 Rock."

The Jindal team -- and Republicans more generally -- dismissed the performance as meaningless. No, he wasn't great, they acknowledged. But who cares? And I generally agreed. After all, lots and lots of up-and-coming politicians delivered poorly reviewed big speeches (and even responses to the State of the Union like Jindal), and it wound up not mattering at all to their future.

Yet, looking back with six years of hindsight, that speech was telling and important to all that would come after it for Jindal. Why? It was the first tangible sign that his fast-moving and quick-climbing approach to politics had a downside. He just wasn't ready for a stage that big. It engulfed him.

Time and again over the intervening years, that narrative played itself out. He is widely disliked in Louisiana -- by Democrats and Republicans. Even as Jindal's personal approval rating has sunk to levels at times lower than Obama's in his own, heavily conservative state, he spent almost half of 2014 outside the state in pursuit of his presidential ambitions.

A May poll showed that just 31 percent of Louisianans approved of the job Jindal was doing. "There’s a solid argument to make that no state is in worse shape than Louisiana," said Bob Mann, a former top aide to Louisiana Democratic Sen. John Breaux and now a professor at Louisiana State University. "And I can't see any reasonable argument for the proposition that Republicans would anoint the least-popular governor of the least-successful state to carry their banner into the 2016 election against Hillary Clinton who, according to one recent poll, might beat him in Louisiana."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There's little evidence that Republican voters are longing for the candidacy Jindal will formally announce later Wednesday in his home state. Jindal is currently in 15th place (out of 15) in the 2016 Republican sweepstakes, according to the polling averages compiled by Real Clear Politics. Jindal is averaging 0.8 percent of the vote in the national surveys conducted on the race and at this point is in serious jeopardy of not qualifying for the first debate, which is just six weeks away.

None of that matters, according to Jindal allies. He's a small-state governor, they say. Very few people knew him nationally in 2008. Very few people know him nationally today. "He's lost nothing ... except in the minds of a few of the irrelevant chatterers in D.C.," said one Jindal insider.

Point taken. After all, if Rick Santorum can go from punchline to the winner of 11 states in the space of one election cycle, who's to say Jindal can't make a more serious run for the nomination than people think he will today?

The problem, of course, is that presidential primary races are often won long before any voter starts paying attention -- in the raising of money and construction of organizations that are the spine of any winning campaign. And that process is heavily driven by buzz and perception, which usually -- though not always -- originates from Washington. Jindal once benefited from that buzz machine. Today, he's hurt by it -- badly.

If Jindal never becomes the serious contender that his team believes he will be, there will rightly be second-guessing of whether Jindal's tendency to always be pushing to the next big achievement, which served him well for his first 30-plus years on earth, wound up as his ultimate weakness, politically speaking. Never able to simply occupy an office or a job without looking to see where the next rung on the ladder might be. Never realizing that sometimes the best way to gain experience is to simply, well, gain it.

In the end, the long-ago comparison of Jindal to Obama might be oddly apt to Republicans looking at Jindal through the 2016 lens: Both men rose fast, racing through the paths to power that politicians take, and both, when they got what they wanted, weren't ready for it.

In launching long-shot bid, Bobby Jindal vows to be a 'doer' as president // WaPo // David A. Fahrenthold – June 24, 2015

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal — a onetime Republican rising star seeking to become one again — announced Wednesday evening that he will run for president in 2016.

"We have a bunch of great talkers running for president," Jindal said at the Pontchartrain Center here in this New Orleans suburb as supporters waved "Geaux Bobby" signs. "We've had enough of talkers. It is time for a doer."

The 44-year-old son of immigrants was the first Indian American to become a U.S. governor and, now, to become a serious presidential candidate. He sought to play up his long-shot status as a strength, casting himself as a man with nothing to lose, who owes nothing to the Republican establishment.

"I will do the things you cannot do in Washington," he told a crowd of about 500. "I will say the things you cannot say."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Following a new trend in U.S. campaigns, Jindal announced his intention at least three times on Wednesday. First he tweeted it, and then he said it into a microphone at this conference center in Kenner.

And in a novel move, he released a hidden-camera video earlier in the day showing how he and his wife had announced the news to their three children.

“We have decided we are going to be running for president this year,” Jindal said in the tone of a father saying they were expecting another baby. “That’s good? So was that a surprise?” the governor asked.

“Maybe you’ll get a chance, if you behave, to go back to Iowa,” Jindal told his children in the video. He also promised them a puppy if he became president.

It’s looking very unlikely that Jindal’s children will get that puppy.

That’s because Jindal is the 13th Republican to enter the 2016 presidential race, and several more are expected. And at the moment, he is at the back of that large pack. In a Fox News poll released Wednesday, Jindal received just 2 percent of the vote — putting him in a tie for 11th place. “None of the Above” got 3 percent.

On Wednesday, Jindal’s event included a playing of “Louisiana Saturday Night,” a fiddle-heavy country standard, which may have been the first time the words “Belly full of beer and a possum in a sack” had been played at a presidential bid announcement.

In campaign videos, and in an introductory speech by his wife, Jindal was cast as unafraid to take on long-shot fights. Beginning with this campaign.

“The key to Bobby Jindal is that he is absolutely fearless,” Supriya Jindal said, adding that she had turned Jindal down in high school the first time he asked her out.

When Jindal took the stage (to Garth Brooks’s “Callin’ Baton Rouge”), he said he would try to slash the size of the federal government, show strength to American enemies overseas, secure the U.S. border, and try to reform Medicare and Social Security.

Jindal also said — in a portion familiar from his pre-announcement stump speeches — that he would make sure new immigrants assimilated to U.S. culture to try to prevent enclaves of immigrants who reject American ways.

“I’m sick and tired of people dividing Americans,” he said. “And I am done with all this talk about hyphenated Americans. We are not Indian Americans, Irish Americans, African Americans, rich Americans or poor Americans. We are all Americans.”

Jindal also singled out former Florida governor Jeb Bush by name as insufficiently conservative. He concluded his speech by saying that for Republicans to have a chance at winning the presidency, they need to take a chance on a purist long shot.

“Republicans must stop being afraid to lose. If we try to hide who we are again, we will lose again,” he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Just eight years ago, Jindal's political future looked far brighter than it does now.

A native of Baton Rouge, he was born Piyush Jindal in 1971 but renamed himself "Bobby" after the youngest son on the "Brady Bunch" sitcom. He became a Rhodes Scholar, a McKinsey consultant and — still in his early 20s — the head of the massive Louisiana health department.

Jindal ran for governor and lost, then ran for Congress and won. He was elected governor on his second try, in 2007, at age 36.

Back then, he seemed to offer an attractive new vision of what a conservative could be: an Ivy League-educated son of immigrants, who had a relentless focus on making the government run faster, smarter and cleaner. It wasn't whether he'd be president, one prominent strategist said at the time, it was when.

"We've laughed at our politicians and the ones that have gone to jail and made the funny jokes," Jindal said in 2007. "But it's not funny anymore."

During his first years, he impressed people in Louisiana as a data-driven, hard-charging governor. He was great in hurricanes. He thrived amid the hyper-complex problems of the BP oil spill in the Gulf of Mexico in 2010.

It was politics that he had trouble with. Indeed, as Jindal pondered a run for national office, he seemed to fall into a vicious negative-feedback loop.

To address doubts among national conservatives, he repeatedly embraced harder-line conservative positions — both in terms of Louisiana's budget and in terms of social issues. But each time, he moved further away from the wonky, pragmatic persona that had made him famous in the first place.

So the doubts grew. And Jindal tried to be more hard-line. And so on.

His problems on the national stage began in 2009, when he was selected to give the GOP response to President Obama's first address to Congress. The response wound up being more memorable than the speech — but not in a good way. Jindal seemed overly slow and overly earnest, like a man explaining the government to toddlers. People compared him to Kenneth the Page, the childlike character on the NBC comedy "30 Rock."

Since then, Jindal has tried to rebuild his reputation among those with rigid socialconservative positions in Louisiana. He issued an executive order to protect "religious freedom" for Christians, wading into an angry debate over same-sex marriage and religion just as other states were trying to wade out. Earlier this month, IBM canceled a ribbon-cutting at a new facility in Baton Rouge, citing Jindal's order, according to media reports.

As other state governors sought to remove Confederate symbols from state property and license plates this week, Jindal said he would not push to get rid of Louisiana's Confederate plates.

The governor has frequently feuded with fellow Republicans over budget problems caused at least in part by his aggressive tax cuts. Those fights, along with his frequent trips out of Louisiana, caused his home-state popularity to plummet from 77 percent in his first year as governor to 32 percent this spring.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After Wednesday's event, electrician Jimmy Nowlin, 54, said he admired Jindal's efforts to bring businesses back to the state, including the poultry operation where Nowlin works. Also, Nowlin said, "he's got the right ideas, as far as I'm concerned, about God, guns and gays."

So can he win?

"You never know," said Nowlin's wife, Denise.

"You never know," Nowlin repeated. "It's up to God."

No other major Republicans appeared to speak onstage with Jindal on Wednesday. When supporters returned to their cars, they got a hint why: Sen. David Vitter (R-La.), who is running to succeed Jindal, sent someone to stick fliers on vehicles saying that he would be different from Jindal.

"Governor will be David's last political job . . . period," the flier said. "He wants to take on Louisiana's most important challenges, not play politics with them."

How Bobby Jindal lost his way // WaPo // Editorial Board – June 24, 2015

LOUISIANA GOV. Bobby Jindal entered the GOP presidential race on Wednesday, attacking Republicans who fail to "endorse our own principles" and promising to "boldly speak the truth without fear." Conventional Beltway wisdom states that governors are better presidential candidates than legislators are; they not only make policy, they also execute it, and they often have a record of concrete successes that they can feature to voters. Mr. Jindal's record, however, is less of an achievement to advertise than a cautionary tale of how political ambition can triumph over pragmatism.

Mr. Jindal entered the Louisiana governor's mansion a political star on the rise. The Rhodes Scholar had previously headed the state's health department at the age of 24, before leading its university system and serving in Congress. To a party seen as too white and too reactionary, Mr. Jindal seemed to promise policy expertise and serious intellectual power. The result, however, has been a shambolic state budget.

Louisiana's leaders have had to scramble to fill a $1.6 billion shortfall. Lower oil prices haven't helped the energy-producing state keep its accounts in order. But a major underlying driver has been Mr. Jindal's deep tax cuts and unwillingness to raise enough revenue to pay for state spending needs. He has raided various parts of the budget — hospitals, universities, rainy-day funds — to shore things up, but that's neither sustainable nor prudent. Unsurprisingly, his home-state approval ratings are lousy.

Mr. Jindal seems to have done this to market himself to tax-averse GOP presidential primary voters. Indeed, Mr. Jindal has done a lot to play the part of conservative firebrand. He flipped against the Common Core education standards and refused to take Medicaid money to cover low-income Louisianans. He pressed for a "religious freedom" bill in reaction to the advance of same-sex marriage, over the objections of Louisiana's business community. When the legislature rejected it, he issued an executive order attempting to achieve many of the same ends.

None of this, however, seems to be working for him. Despite Mr. Jindal spending lots of time in early primary and caucus states, polls find that almost no one prefers him to other GOP primary candidates. Perhaps he has yet to recover from his disastrous performance responding to President Obama's 2009 State of the Union address. But it will be hard for him to advance from here. Mr. Jindal will have a tough time beating Ted Cruz for the tea party vote, and he has stiff competition in Mike Huckabee for conservative Christians.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal talked the importance of conservatism and faith as he joined the crowded Republican field for the U.S. presidency in 2016. (Reuters)

Republican primary voters looking for a candidate who can win in the general election, meanwhile, will be more interested in a governor with a stronger record. Mr. Jindal would be in much better shape if he had made good on his original promise — to serve as the savvy Republican policy wonk he was known to be years ago.

Bobby Jindal to announce presidential plans Wednesday // WaPo // David A. Fahrenthold and James Hohmann – June 24, 2015

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, a one-time rising star in the Republican Party now struggling to become one again, will announce Wednesday afternoon whether he intends to run for president in 2016.

Jindal's appearance -- to be held in the New Orleans suburb of Kenner at 5 p.m. Eastern time -- does not seem much of a mystery. The 44-year-old two-term governor has given every indication that he will run.

He has already traveled multiple times to early-primary states -- spending 45 percent of his days outside of Louisiana last year. And this year, some of Jindal's top state-government aides have already left to join his presidential "exploratory committee."

If Jindal does get into the race as expected, he will be the first Indian-American to ever be a serious candidate for president. But at this point, his chances of winning the GOP nomination seem extraordinarily low.

There are already 12 other major Republican candidates in the race, with several more expected to enter soon. And Jindal is running behind nearly all of them: Several recent polls have shown him at just 1 percent support among GOP voters, either last or tied for last.

In the most recent Fox News poll, the news was even worse. Jindal wasn't just behind all the other candidates, he was also behind "None of the Above," which got 2 percent.

Jindal aides and advisers say that a central part of the governor's pitch will be that he is "fearless." His recently declared opposition to gay marriage and an executive order on religious freedoms will be data points to show that he's willing to take on the corporate wing of the party in ways that no one else is.

"He's not afraid to talk about things that normal politicians are nervous to talk about," one aide said, previewing the announcement anonymously because Jindal has not formally announced his candidacy.

In the months leading up to an announcement, Jindal has tried to stand out from his GOP rivals by playing up his Catholic faith, being unusually hawkish on defense issues, and being unusually tough on fellow Republicans in Washington.

Jindal has said that Congressional Republicans frequently surrender to President Obama on issues like immigration and health-care reform, and "need a spine."

Jindal, the Louisiana-born son of Indian immigrants, has also been strident about the need for immigrants to assimilate quickly into American culture. Jindal has derided the idea of "hyphenated Americans," saying that people who call themselves Indian Americans and African Americans should think of themselves as simply Americans first.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jindal has also called for barring people who believe in "radical Islam" from coming to the United States at all.

“So in other words we shouldn’t tolerate those who want to come and try to impose some variant of, some version of Sharia law,” Jindal told a conservative think tank in March, according to The Guardian newspaper. “I fear if we don’t insist on assimilation,” he said, “we then go the way of Europe.”

Just eight years ago, Jindal's future looked far brighter than it does now.

The former Rhodes Scholar and McKinsey consultant was elected governor at age 36, the first Indian American ever to govern a state. “The question is not whether he’ll be president,” Republican strategist Steve Schmidt said in 2008, “but when he’ll be president.”

Jindal seemed to offer a new vision of what a Republican could be: an Ivy League-educated son of immigrants, who had a relentless focus on making government run faster, smarter and cleaner.

“We’ve laughed at our politicians and the ones that have gone to jail and made the funny jokes,” Jindal said in 2007, after he was elected governor on the second try. “But it’s not funny anymore.”

But, as Jindal pondered higher office, he seemed to fall into a strange and vicious negative-feedback loop.

To address doubts among national conservatives, Jindal repeatedly embraced harder-line conservative positions -- both in terms of Louisiana's budget and in terms of social issues. But each time, he moved further away from the wonky, pragmatic persona that had made him famous in the first place.

So the doubts grew. And Jindal tried to be more hard-line. And so on.

Jindal's problems on the national stage began in 2009, when he was selected to give the GOP response to President Obama's first address to Congress. The response wound up being more memorable than the speech -- but not in a good way. Jindal seemed overly slow and over-earnest, like a man explaining the government to toddlers. People compared him to Kenneth the Page, the child-like character on NBC's comedy "30 Rock."

Since then, Jindal has tried to re-build his reputation among conservatives with a rigid anti-tax stance in Louisiana. In fact, legislators say, Jindal has often allowed the Washington-based group Americans for Tax Reform to dictate the details of his own budget policies.

The results was repeated blowups with the GOP-led state legislature, and threats of devastating cuts in the state budget. By the end of this year's session, legislators were so unhappy with Jindal that they tried to stop paying for his security detail at presidential campaign events.

That fighting over the budget -- and Jindal's frequent trips out of state -- also caused his in-state popularity to plummet. In his first year as governor, 77 percent of Louisianans thought he was doing a good job. By last month, the figure had fallen to 32 percent, an all-time low.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jindal's advisors are hoping that the only place to go now is up.

"Nobody knows who he is," as one aide put it. They believe most voters still only remember the governor from his botched response speech, and that -- if the bar is set that low -- voters will be pleasantly surprised to hear a more polished, experienced Jindal speak now.

He will spend this Thursday and Friday in New Hampshire and Iowa, with more travel scheduled after that. Aides think he's an excellent retail politician, and that his up-from-the-bootstraps story will resonate in a contest with former Florida governor Jeb Bush, the heir to a presidential dynasty.

In preparation for this run, Jindal's supporters launched a super PAC called "Believe Again." That motto echoed one from Jindal's first inaugural address as governor: "I'm asking you to once again believe in Louisiana."

But, in this crowded field, Jindal doesn't even have a full claim on his own slogan. BuzzFeed reported this week that Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), was also using "Believe Again" as a slogan for his own, better-polling presidential campaign.

Bobby Jindal hits Jeb Bush, hard, as he announces White House Run // Politico // Eli Stokols – June 24, 2015

Bobby Jindal went there. As the 13th Republican candidate to enter the presidential race, the Louisiana governor tried to grab attention by going negative with his announcement speech, smacking down his rivals as "selfish" politicians who are nothing more than "talkers," and calling out Jeb Bush as a mushy conservative.

"You've heard Jeb Bush saying we need to be able to lose the primary to win the general election. We're going to help him do that," Jindal said, kicking off his long-shot bid for the GOP presidential nomination.

Presenting himself as an unapologetically religious, small-government conservative, Jindal told several hundred supporters inside a musty event hall here that his rivals may talk a good game but that he plans to punch his way back into the race by telling the truth.

"Here's the truth about most politicians – They are selfish, and they are followers not leaders," said Jindal, who promised to cut spending and wear his religious beliefs on his sleeves, even if he runs afoul of Washington's "in crowd" by doing so.

Polling at just under 1 percent nationally, Jindal has little choice but to run as an insurgent, anti-establishment firebrand.

While he delivered some pretty nasty attacks on Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton — "Hillary Clinton is already trying to divide us by ethnicity, by gender, and by economic status" — he reserved his most vicious firepower for Bush, the current GOP frontrunner.

Jindal warned that Bush is putting the whole Republican party in danger by appeasing the left and masking conservative views.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“He is saying that we need to hide our conservative ideals,” he said. “But the truth is, if we go down that road again, we will lose again.”

The two-term governor, who is also a former congressman, is not just running on heated rhetoric, though. He’s hoping that his executive experience, coupled with his policy credentials, will help him break through the crowded field as campaign season picks up.

He has spent the last year rolling out proposals on issues ranging from national security to health care, and his advisers say his policy chops will help him stand out on debate stages — if he qualifies to participate — and in town hall meetings.

But during his speech Wednesday, Jindal focused less on policy points, playing up the politics of grievance that he hopes will fire up social conservatives.

“I know that some believe that I talk too much about my faith,” said Jindal, who was born Hindu but converted to Catholicism. “But I will not be silenced in order to meet their expectations of political correctness. They don’t accept the idea that you can be both intellectual and Christian. They can’t fathom the notion that you can be both smart and conservative. But, they need to get out more.”

Jindal’s speech came several hours after he broke the suspense of his announcement, declaring his candidacy on his website earlier Wednesday afternoon.

The online announcement was accompanied by several videos of Jindal and his wife discussing a presidential bid with his three young children. He prompted them to discuss what they remembered about Iowa (“the popcorn”) and warned them that “things are going to change a little bit.”

Before he took the stage Wednesday evening, supporters watched videos from former Saints quarterback Archie Manning and former Louisiana Gov. Mike Foster. Another video featured Louisiana residents praising Jindal for helping the state recover after Hurricane Katrina a decade ago, obscuring that the governor’s approval numbers in the state have plummeted over a prolonged budget battle.

Following the speech, Jindal basked in the cheers from the 800 or so supporters waving “Geaux Bobby” signs before darting onto the press riser in the back of the room to do an interview with Fox News Channel’s Sean Hannity.

But the ubiquitous conservative cable host, who has traveled to other cities to interview Marco Rubio, Rick Perry, Bush and other contenders in person, wasn’t there to greet Jindal, who put in an earpiece and did the interview remotely.

From Louisiana, he flies on to New Hampshire, where he’ll campaign Thursday. Currently, he’s polling at 1 percent in the Granite State, behind 13 other candidates.

Louisana long-shot // Politico // Katie Glueck and Eli Stokols – June 24, 2015

Bobby Jindal is used to being the smartest guy in the room. A less familiar feeling: Being written off as an afterthought before his next campaign even begins.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But that's the reality now for Jindal, who was once considered one of his party's most promising and upwardly mobile officeholders.

As he kicks off his presidential run, Jindal is widely viewed as the longest of long-shots, a candidate with a glittering resume but almost no chance of winning the GOP nomination in 2016.

It's a long way from where he was at the beginning of the Obama era in early 2009, when the president was just settling into office. At the time, the young governor of Louisiana was thought to be the Republican Party's next rising star, a blazing talent on a trajectory to be a presidential contender.

The child of immigrants from India, Jindal had become the head of Louisiana's Department of Health and Hospitals at the age of 24. By his 40th birthday, he had already served in Congress and won election to a second term as governor. Then he stepped in front of a camera to give the party's official response to Obama's first State of the Union; people who thought they were watching a coming out party instead bore witness to a political train-wreck — a tin-eared speech immediately derided as "childish" and "a disaster for the party."

Jindal now enters a far more competitive and crowded presidential field, not as a wunderkind but as an asterisk who barely registers in national polls. He is running as a reform-minded, social conservative armed with detailed policy proposals — and betting that his wonky approach will enable him to break through — but many question whether it's too late to gain a foothold in the 2016 race.

"Bobby Jindal is a young man with an enormous record of accomplishment. He was a member of Congress, a senior person at HHS and he's a two-term governor. If he really wants it, his political future is still ahead of him," said Steve Schmidt, a former senior advisor to John McCain's 2008 campaign. "But timing is an under appreciated virtue in American politics. It's difficult to see a scenario in which Bobby Jindal becomes the nominee in the 2016 cycle. He's running from the back of the pack; he's getting in comparatively late. But he is one of the most intelligent people in the race and he could very well wind up on someone's VP shortlist, in a cabinet post or in a position to run again in the future."

Jindal is polling at about 1 percent nationally now — when he shows up in the polls at all. But the two-term governor, who has rolled out policy proposals on everything from energy to health care through his nonprofit, America Next, argues that his "solutions-oriented" approach as governor will capture the attention of voters who don't want Republicans to be the "party of no."

"The great temptation for Republicans, for our candidates, is to simply be anti-Obama, and I think that's a mistake," said Jindal in a recent interview with POLITICO. "It gets great applause lines in many Republican gatherings, simply standing up and criticizing the president. The harder work, what we've got to do, is provide a positive, specific vision on the path going forward. [Voters] don't want to hear we don't agree [with Obama] on Iran or Obamacare —and we don't —they want to hear, 'But OK, what do we do differently? How do you get our country going again?...What's the alternative?"

While Jindal — who once admonished the GOP to stop being "the stupid party" — is as well-positioned as any Republican in the field to run as a policy-oriented candidate, he has drawn more national attention for his tendency to generate controversy, whether it's by skewering Rand Paul from his official government website or blasting out an unsolicited defense of Rudy Giuliani after the former New York City mayor made a controversial comment about President Barack Obama.

His attraction to the national spotlight has hurt him back home where, amid budget woes and political infighting, Jindal's approval ratings have plummeted.

"Many in Louisiana feel that Bobby Jindal abandoned them," said Brad Whitesides, a longtime North Louisiana strategist. “At some point, [anti-tax activist] Grover Norquist became more important to him than they were and they knew it.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Early voting state political operatives have expressed surprise that they haven’t seen a more aggressive approach from Jindal. The governor has only made only a handful of visits to Iowa this year and has sat out some big Republican events there — in a state where his views are likely to gain traction with the socially conservative GOP base — while Mike Huckabee, Rick Perry and others are approaching 20.

“I’m a little baffled at the approach Jindal’s taken to the state this year,” said Craig Robinson, a longtime GOP operative who now runs the Iowa Republican blog. “He’s been well received when he’s here but, for one reason or another, he’s chosen not to participate in some of the big cattle call events so far; and I don’t get it, because if anyone needed that kind of large audience to break through and introduce himself, it’s Bobby Jindal.”

Jindal and his advisers say he will be able to campaign much harder now that the contentious legislative session is over and a balanced budget has passed. They express confidence that Jindal’s retail politicking skills and ability to field questions in town hall settings will allow him to impress in Iowa and in New Hampshire, a more moderate state that is a less likely fit.

“Retail politics is very important, just like in the South, and these early state voters are only going to vote for somebody if they like them,” Jindal said, when asked how he would catch up to other candidates who, free of gubernatorial duties, have been making the rounds in Iowa on a regular basis for months. “And that involves spending a lot of time, talking and listening to people directly and taking whatever questions…they may not agree with you 100 percent, but I think they can detect whether you’re being authentic with them or not.”

Jindal has seized on one particular issue that animates Christian conservatives — religious liberty, which he’s been championing since a February 2014 speech at the Ronald Reagan Library. He has been perhaps the most vocal supporter of laws designed to protect religious freedoms, and was an ardent defender of Indiana’s controversial legislation despite widespread criticism that the measure was anti-gay. At socially conservative gatherings, like last weekend’s Faith and Freedom Coalition conference in Washington, it’s been an effective message for him at a time when many Christian conservatives have felt under attack. The governor, who was raised Hindu but converted to Catholicism, is comfortable with religious language and sees social conservatives as his natural base.

His efforts are aided by a team of experienced advisers, including Gail Gitcho, Mitt Romney’s 2012 communications director; a team from the prominent GOP firm OnMessage Inc. that includes veteran GOP operatives Curt Anderson, and, on the super PAC side, Brad Todd; and a host of longtime Jindal loyalists who have helped with previous successful campaigns.

“He’d be the only guy in the field who has actually written detailed policy proposals for how to repeal Obamacare, on national security, on energy,” Todd said, dismissing the value of early polls. “No one else has done that…It’s a little puzzling to him why no one else has done that. He can’t imagine running for president without having a pretty strong idea of what to do. Lots of politicians are very articulate with the soundbite, but no one can matching being as strong on policy as he is.”

Now Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal is in the Republican race // AP // Melinda Deslatte – June 24, 2015

Pitching himself as a "doer" in a field of talkers, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal declared his candidacy for the 2016 Republican presidential nomination Wednesday and set about trying to distinguish himself from better known rivals.

It's a long-shot effort for an accomplished but overshadowed governor, and his prospects will depend in large measure on his continued courtship of evangelical voters. But several other contenders also are determined to win over that group.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We have a bunch of great talkers running for president," Jindal said at his opening rally. "We've had enough of talkers. It's time for a doer. I'm not running for president to be somebody. I'm running for president to do something."

An Oxford-educated son of Indian immigrants, Jindal can point to a political career filled with many achievements in a short time: a position as state health secretary when he was merely age 24, election to Congress at 32 and election as governor four years later.

But the GOP lineup does not lack seasoned politicians, some with much more star power. Jindal quickly struck at one of them, accusing former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush of wanting Republicans to "hide our conservative ideals."

"But the truth is if we go down that road again, we will lose again," Jindal said.

Jindal announced his campaign online earlier Wednesday. Video clips on his website showed Jindal and his wife, Supriya, talking to their three children about the campaign to come.

Aides discussed Jindal's plans to focus on social conservatives, as he has done for months in extensive travels, and highlight his reputation as a leader steeped in policy.

Jindal intends to present himself as "the youngest candidate with the longest resume," citing an extensive background in public policy and government, strategist Curt Anderson said.

In his speech, the Louisiana governor sought to position himself as an outsider: "I am running for president without permission from headquarters in Washington, D.C."

Unpopular at home, Jindal waited until the state legislative session had ended and lawmakers found a way to close a $1.6 billion budget gap before he scheduled his presidential announcement. But he has been building his campaign for months with trips to key presidential voting states, particularly Iowa, where he has focused on Christian conservatives.

Raised a Hindu but a convert to Catholicism as a teenager, Jindal is competing for the evangelical vote with several contenders, including Texas Sen. Ted Cruz and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee.

While Jindal will continue to focus on "religious liberty," Anderson said, he aims to prove a candidate can be "both smart and Christian." And in recent weeks, Jindal has worked to showcase more of the policy wonk reputation that got him elected governor, rather than just focusing on cultural issues.

He has drawn distinctions from other GOP contenders by noting he has published "detailed plans" on health care, defense, education and energy policy.

He has suggested governors are better equipped to become president because they have run state governments, balanced budgets and implemented policy. That's an argument, however, that other White House hopefuls are making or can: Govs. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, Chris Christie of New Jersey and John Kasich of Ohio.

And Jindal doesn't get glowing reviews of his governance at home, as both Republicans and Democrats blame the governor's financial policies for causing repeated budget crises and suggest those policies are driven by political ambitions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As the governor spoke inside, anti-Jindal protesters amassed outside.

Christopher Williams, a University of New Orleans student who called for the protest on a Facebook page, said participants had a variety of beefs with Jindal, such as his tax policy, education cuts and opposition to gay marriage.

"One thing that the governor has been able to do is unite people against him," Williams said.

A path to a GOP primary victory remains difficult for Jindal. Republican candidate debates begin in August and it's unclear if he will make the cut if based on standing in national polls.

Campaign manager Timmy Teepell, a former chief of staff who ran Jindal's two races for governor, said Jindal will focus on the states that vote early in the presidential race, not a "national campaign." Jindal has trips planned to New Hampshire and Iowa later this week.

Louisiana Gov. Jindal looks ready to jump into 2016 race // AP // Melinda Deslatte – June 24, 2015

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal appears ready to launch a long-shot campaign for the Republican presidential nomination that rests on courtship of evangelical voters and his reputation as a man of ideas.

The 44-year-old, two-term governor begins without the national prominence of rivals such as Florida Sen. Marco Rubio and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who are among a dozen contenders for the nomination in a highly competitive pack.

But Jindal, an Oxford-educated son of Indian immigrants, points to a long political career filled with many unexpected achievements. He talked a governor into appointing him health secretary at age 24 with little background in either health management or government, won election to Congress at 32 and became governor four years later.

"If I were to become a candidate, I would certainly run to win and I would do it based on presenting detailed ideas about how to move our country forward," Jindal told reporters recently.

His expected campaign launch was scheduled Wednesday afternoon in the New Orleans suburb of Kenner, where Jindal lived as a congressman.

Unpopular at home, the Louisiana governor waited until the state legislative session had ended and lawmakers found a way to close a $1.6 billion budget gap before scheduling the announcement. But he has been building his campaign for months with frequent trips to key presidential voting states, particularly Iowa, where he's focused heavily on Christian conservatives.

Raised a Hindu but a convert to Catholicism as a teenager, Jindal has talked of his religious faith in small churches across Louisiana. As he readied his presidential campaign, the governor held a prayer rally in Baton Rouge, met pastors across several states and put out an executive order to grant special "religious freedom" protections to people in Louisiana who oppose same-sex marriage.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He's competing, however, with several contenders trying to appeal to the same pool of evangelical voters, including Texas Sen. Ted Cruz and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee.

As he approached his announcement, Jindal also showcased more of the policy wonk reputation that got him elected governor, rather than focusing solely on the culture wars.

He's drawn distinctions from other GOP contenders by noting he's published "detailed plans" on health care, defense, education and energy policy. He's suggested governors are better equipped to become president because they've run state bureaucracies, balanced budgets and implemented policy. That's an argument, however, that other White House hopefuls are making or can: Govs. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, Chris Christie of New Jersey and John Kasich of Ohio, as well as Bush.

"We need somebody who will go to D.C. and rescue the American Dream from becoming the European nightmare," Jindal says.

All told, a path to victory remains difficult for Jindal. GOP debates begin in August and it's unclear if he will make the cut if based on standing in national polls.

What is certain is that the term-limited governor has worn out his welcome back home as his tenure approaches its end in January.

Jindal's approval ratings in Louisiana have dropped into the low 30s due to repeated budget cuts to public colleges, near-constant state financial problems and a sense that he's crafted state policy based on his national political ambitions.

The governor dismisses the low state poll numbers as a sign he's tackled difficult problems, with large shifts in education policy, dramatic reductions to the public sector workforce and the right-sizing of government.

"Making changes is tough," he said in a recent interview. "It's easy to be a popular politician. If you want to be a popular politician, you kiss babies, you cut ribbons, you don't make tough choices. That's not what I got elected to do."

Bobby Jindal Teases Cute Kid Videos Ahead of Announcement // Bloomberg // Ali Elkin – June 24, 2015

In the lead-up to his presidential campaign announcement Wednesday, Republican Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal is releasing hidden-camera style videos of himself talking about the decision with his wife and children.

"You know, there are going to be people watching you, so you have to behave," he says. "No bunny ears behind your brother or anything."

Jindal's announcement is scheduled for Wenesday evening, and will be held outside New Orleans. The first video went up on Facebook on Tuesday night with a message saying that there would be several more.

Jindal's children are Selia Jindal, 13; Shaan Jindal, 11; and Slade Jindal, 8. In the quick snippet, the Jindal kids ask if they are going to have to dress up. The kids do not have microphones in the video, but Jindal answers a question about what will happen if he were to decide at the last minute not to run, after all.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It'd be a short speech," he said. "You'd get up there and say, 'Thank you all for coming, I just want to tell you that I've decided not to run. Have a good night.'"

Louisiana's Bobby Jindal Vows to be a Doer in Race Full of Talkers // Bloomberg // Margaret Newkirk – June 24, 2015

Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal promised a crowd of supporters he would shake up the Republican presidential race by telling the truth about his record of cutting government spending and his Christian faith.

Announcing his campaign at a rally in Kenner, Louisiana, outside New Orleans, Jindal said he was running as a leader who gets things done in a field full of people who would rather talk than act. He will address issues that his fellow Republicans won't, he said.

"The guy in the White House today is a great talker, and we have a bunch of great talkers running for President," Jindal said. "We've had enough of talkers, it's time for a doer. I'm not running for president to be somebody, I'm running for President to do something."

"I'm not running for president to be somebody, I'm running for President to do something."

Governor Bobby Jindal

Jindal, the first Indian-American governor in the U.S., is a 44-year-old evangelical Catholic conservative and Rhodes scholar policy wonk who his advisers say appeals to a broad swath of the electorate.

"Unlike a lot of candidates who excel with social conservatives, he has multiple gears," said Brad Todd, a consultant for Jindal. "He is the youngest candidate with the longest résumé."

Jindal is the 13th Republican to enter the race. He is polling near the back of the pack: A May Bloomberg Politics/ Des Moines Register Iowa Poll found him tied in second-to-last place behind former New York Governor George Pataki with 1 percent of the vote.

Jindal said he would fight to destroy ISIS, cut government, defend religious liberty, get rid of Obamacare and require immigrants to assimilate into the wider society.

"It is not unreasonable to demand that if you immigrate to America, you must do so legally, and you must be ready and willing to embrace our values, learn English, and roll up your sleeves and get to work," he said.

The son of Indian immigrants, Piyush Jindal nicknamed himself Bobby as a child, after a character on The Brady Bunch. He converted to Catholicism as a teenager; in 1994, he described an exorcism he had witnessed for the Catholic journal New Oxford Review.

Jindal earned his bachelor's degree from Brown University and a master's degree from New College, Oxford, specializing in health policy. He turned down offers to attend medical schools at both Harvard and Yale to pursue public service.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He became Louisiana's secretary of Health and Hospitals at age 24. He served as director of the National Bipartisan Commission on the Future of Medicare in Washington, as president of the Louisiana State University system, and as President George W. Bush's assistant health and human services secretary before making his first run for governor in 2003.

Jindal seemed an unlikely candidate, said Curt Anderson, now his chief presidential strategist, who vetted Jindal for Republican power broker Haley Barbour after Jindal approached Barbour about running for governor of Louisiana. Anderson said he initially thought the skinny young man was an intern: "I thought it was a Haley prank. This guy looks like he's 12 and he doesn't look anything like he's from Louisiana."

Anderson has been a Jindal adviser ever since.

Jindal lost in 2003. He won a Congressional seat the next year and the governor's office in 2007, at age 36.

As a non-white Southerner, a son of immigrants, an evangelical, and a data-driven technocrat, Jindal was seen as a rising party star.

His image suffered after he stumbled in his first high-profile role: the Republican response to President Barack Obama's first State of the Union speech. Critics said Jindal's sing-song delivery sounded like children's story time.

Since then, Jindal put himself forward as a national thinker with opinion pieces in major newspapers and speeches, and founded a policy think tank called American Next.

He released a plan for replacing Obamacare, advocated a strong response to Islamic State militants, and claimed there are European "no-go zones" ruled by Muslims, a contention dismissed by London Mayor Boris Johnson as "complete nonsense."

He also reinforced his religious credentials.

Jindal issued an anti-gay "religious freedom" order over the wishes of Republican legislators. He also supported national groups of home-schooling parents, which could help him against other social conservatives in Iowa and South Carolina, said Tim Echols, the Georgia founder of one of the groups.

"No one has been more supportive than Jindal, no one," he said.

Jindal was initially popular as governor. He tackled ethics reform in a state known for corruption, won kudos for handling the BP Plc oil spill, and delivered on a promise to shrink government. He privatized charity hospitals, cut 30,000 jobs, and reduced the budget by $10 billion. He won his 2011 re-election with about 66 percent of the vote.

He presided over a series of budget crises, caused by the loss of federal help for Hurricane Katrina recovery, the recession, statutory protections for spending, the cumulative effect of one-time budget fixes, and Jindal's hard line against raising taxes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By early this year, even Republican legislators were accusing him of spending too much time in Iowa testing the presidential waters and of using gimmicks to protect his tax-averse reputation.

Erick Erickson, a former Louisianan who runs the Red State blog, said Jindal was the governor Louisiana needed, but that his path to nomination is narrow. He predicted Jindal will shine in Iowa and then struggle for money and recognition.

Jindal will surprise people, said Anderson.

“He’s engaging,” Anderson said. “He seems real. People don’t realize, every time he goes to Iowa, people love him.”

Jindal left the rally to head to New Hampshire.

Louisiana Governor Jindal announces run for president in 2016 // Reuters // Emily Stephenson and Alistair Bell – June 24, 2015

Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal announced on Wednesday he was running for the U.S. presidency in 2016, giving himself a mountain to climb from the bottom of a full pack of Republican candidates.

"My name is Bobby Jindal and I am running for President of the United States of America," Jindal, who became the first person of Indian-American heritage to run for U.S. president, said on his website.

Jindal, 44, is scheduled to appear later on Wednesday in the New Orleans suburb of Kenner to formally announce his decision. His website featured videos of Jindal and his wife, Supriya, telling their three children that he was going to be a candidate and promising his daughter they would get a puppy if they moved to the White House.

Once seen as a rising Republican star, Jindal has struggled with a fiscal crisis and a slump in popularity in his home state and usually ranks near the bottom in polls of Republicans seeking the nomination for the November 2016 presidential election.

Jindal, a two-term governor who also represented Louisiana in the U.S. House of Representatives, joins 12 other Republicans in the race, including former Florida Governor Jeb Bush. Others, including Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker, are expected to join soon.

Jindal is popular with social conservatives and evangelical Christians, but his home state appeal faded as he tried to close a $1.6 billion shortfall in the state's budget, caused in part by falling oil prices, without breaking a promise not to raise taxes.

The MarblePort/Hayride poll in Louisiana released last week was especially embarrassing for Jindal, showing more Louisianans back Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton for president than Jindal by 44.5 percent to 42 percent.

Republicans in the state complain Jindal spent too much time trying to court national attention while his state floundered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jindal is in last place in a Reuters/Ipsos online poll of 15 Republicans, drawing less than 1 percent. It could be difficult for him to be among the top 10 Republican candidates in national polling who will join the party's first debate in Ohio in August.

Jindal, a Christian who converted from Hinduism as a teenager, jumped into a fight in May over religion and gay rights.

He signed an executive order to allow businesses to refuse service for same-sex weddings, even though Louisiana's House of Representatives had rejected a similar measure.

Jindal also annoyed business leaders by proposing the elimination of more than $500 million worth of corporate tax rebates this year as part of his effort to balance the budget.

In 2009, Jindal delivered the Republican response to the President Barack Obama's first State of the Union address, and many in the party hoped he could be a young counterweight to the new president. But his speech was mocked as amateurish and awkward.

Bobby Jindal faces an uphill fight in the crowded 2016 field // CNN // Rebekah Metzler and Ashley Killough – June 24, 2015

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, once a Republican rising star who passed on an opportunity to seek the White House in 2012, announced his candidacy on Wednesday under much more trying circumstances.

Jindal announced his bid over social media, just hours before hosting a kickoff rally.

"I'm running for President of the United States of America. Join me," Jindal tweeted, with a link to his website's announcement page.

At his rally in Kenner, Louisiana, Jindal sought to promote himself as a bold leader who not only talked the talk but walked the walk as governor of Louisiana.

"The big government crowd -- they hate what I have done," Jindal said to the crowd of about 500. "I am guilty as charged, and our state is better off for it today. We have had enough of talkers, it's time for doers. I'm not running for president to be somebody, I'm running for president to do something."

But if he wants to compete in the expansive Republican field, he'll have to resurrect a reputation that has fallen significantly in recent years. Jindal is now polling toward the bottom of the field, registering at just 1% in the latest CNN/ORC poll.

Jindal's popularity in his own state has suffered -- a recent poll has his approval at 32% -- thanks to budget troubles and perhaps a preoccupation with playing to a national audience. His refusal to raise taxes to help balance the state's books has resulted in deep cuts to popular programs and areas of government spending such as health care and education.

His wife introduced him on stage, the only speaker before he took to the podium. The roll out also featured a couple of biographical videos.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jindal, the country's first Indian-American governor, is likely best-known nationally for his flip-flop on Common Core educational standards -- from support to opposition, a move many saw as opportunistic as he marches toward a presidential bid.

In 2010, his state implemented the standards. By 2014, he was blasting them. In the interim, many conservatives fearful of government takeover of schools had begun to protest the standards across the country, pushing Republican politicians to rethink their support.

Jindal's reversal marked a watershed moment for the politician, who following Romney's 2012 loss, pushed for the GOP to represent something other than being the "party of no."

The Brown University graduate and Rhodes scholar went even further, chastising his peers for verbal gaffes and unforced errors when politicking leading up to the presidential election.

"It's not going to be the last time anyone says something stupid within our party, but it can't be tolerated within our party," he said. "We've also had enough of this dumbed-down conservatism. We need to stop being simplistic, we need to trust the intelligence of the American people and we need to stop insulting the intelligence of the voters."

But his flip on Common Core marked Jindal as a man willing to play to his base -- similar to those pols he had condemned in 2012.

America may also recall the 44-year-old for his Republican response to Obama's first joint address to Congress in 2009 -- a performance most remembered for Jindal's awkward delivery than anything else.

Though initial polling shows Jindal is a longshot, he has carved out a niche of vibrant support among evangelical Christians and the anti-Common Core activists.

He's also positioned himself as a top opponent of "political correctness" and has at times led his party's charge in railing against radical Islam, while also straying into the controversial territory.

In an hour-long briefing with reporters Wednesday in New Orleans, Jindal's soon-to-be presidential campaign advisers stressed that the Louisiana governor will highlight his record as an executive as he focuses on an early state strategy.

"We're going to hunt where the ducks are," said chief strategist Curt Anderson, a Jindal adviser since 2003 and former Republican National Committee political director.

Jindal's four main objectives as president would be securing the border, replacing Obamacare, growing the private sector and increasing defense, his aides said. He will also be "aggressive" on calling for the destruction of radical Islam and that containment is a strategy for losers.

The Louisiana governor will likely fight for space on the right of the so-far 13 person GOP field, alongside Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, neurosurgeon Ben Carson and former Pennsylvania Sen.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rick Santorum.

Aides argue that Jindal hasn't been on the trail like other candidates, so naturally his name recognition will be low.

"Half these people don't know who their own damn governor is, let alone the governor of Louisiana," Anderson said, referring to voters nationwide who aren't plugged into presidential politics as much as reporters and operatives.

Jindal was a political wunderkind when he first burst onto the scene helping shape health care policy. In 1996, at the age of just 24, Jindal was appointed as head of Louisiana's department of health policies.

Later, he served under President George W. Bush in the Department of Health and Human Services as a top adviser to then-HHS Secretary Tommy Thompson.

Raised in a Hindu household, Jindal converted to Catholicism in high school.

He first cut his own political teeth in 2003, surprising many to force a run-off election in the Louisiana gubernatorial race. Though he lost, he set himself up for a successful congressional run in 2004, serving until finally winning the governor's mansion in 2008.

Jindal's first stop after his speech Wednesday night will be New Hampshire on Thursday, followed by Iowa on Friday. He holds a fundraising event in Baton Rouge on Saturday — the only fundraising event that will appear on their financial reports for the period that ends on June 30, they say.

Bobby Jindal's kids were unaware of announcement video taping // CNN // Theodore Schleifer – June 24, 2015

Bobby Jindal aimed for creative -- and likely hoped for buzz -- when he announced his presidential campaign via video on Wednesday.

He may have gotten more than what he wished for.

The Louisiana governor became the 13th Republican presidential candidate, unveiling footage recorded by a hidden camera seemingly lodged in a tree that showed how his three young children reacted after hearing he planned on running for the White House.

"Mommy and Daddy have been thinking and talking a lot about this, and we have decided we are going to be running for president this year," Jindal said, to decidedly muted reaction from his kids, as shown by the video, which Jindal subsequently placed on Facebook.

The homemade film, with shaky audio quality and Jindal himself obscured by a tree branch, was largely mocked on social media as a smart idea that didn't quite land.

A Jindal spokeswoman, Shannon Dirmann, later confirmed what appeared to be the case: Jindal's children weren't aware they were being taped at the time.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The footage was shot over the weekend at the governor's mansion and the kids were eventually shown the video before it was made public. The intent was to get their "natural" reaction. Dirmann said the children were fine with the tape and added that criticism of the video came largely from "liberals."

Those tactics may be necessary for Jindal, who sits at the rearguard of the Republican field and has low name identification nationwide.

Many Republican candidates have announced their plans to run first on social media, followed shortly thereafter by rally-type events ranging from Ted Cruz's preacher-like sermon at Liberty University to Jeb Bush's lengthy roster of surrogates in Florida who testified to his record.

Jindal gave his own speech hours after releasing the film online.

"The big government crowd -- they hate what I have done," Jindal said to the crowd of about 500 gathered in Kenner, Louisiana.

"I am guilty as charged, and our state is better off for it today. We have had enough of talkers, it's time for doers. I'm not running for president to be somebody, I'm running for president to do something," he said.

Gail Montelaro, a woman from New Roads, Louisiana, who has known the new presidential candidate for 21 years, watched the two-minute video at his announcement rally just outside of New Orleans. She said that the unusual video concept of the video was characteristic of Jindal's way of thinking.

"That's Bobby," Montelaro said. "He thinks outside of the box. And he cares about his children and likes doing things with them and their future in mind. That is not unusual about him."

5 Things You Should Know About Bobby Jindal // NPR // Jessica Taylor – June 24, 2015

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal is expected Wednesday evening to become the 13th major Republican candidate to enter the race for president.

Once seen as a rising star in the GOP, the 44-year-old Indian-American now faces long odds in a crowded primary. He's mired at the bottom of most polls, a situation that threatens to keep him off the main debate stage in first GOp presidential primary debates in August.

That wasn't always the outlook for the former congressman. Seen as a policy wunderkind, who quickly moved up the ranks from state and federal administrations to lead his state, he was mentioned as a 2012 presidential candidate, but eventually passed on the race. Though his approval ratings in the Bayou State have dropped dramatically amid budget fights, he has still tried to keep a high national profile by hitting the cattle-call circuit to build up his White House chances.

Jindal's best shot at catching fire in 2016 is to appeal to religious conservatives, especially in the early states of Iowa and South Carolina. But that's a crowded space this time around. Though he's a Roman Catholic, he has said he considers himself an "evangelical Catholic." At last week's Faith and Freedom Coalition gathering in Washington, he got a good reception from the crowd as he shared his personal journey to Christianity, and Iowa GOP observers have also said he's gotten positive marks on the trail there, too.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Here are five things to know about Bobby Jindal:

1. His real name isn't Bobby — it's a nickname inspired by "The Brady Bunch"

Jindal was born Piyush Jindal in Baton Rouge in 1971 to parents who had immigrated just months earlier from India. When he was 4, he asked to be called "Bobby" after one of the brothers on the popular family sitcom.

Raised Hindu, Jindal converted to Christianity in high school after a friend shared his faith with him. He would read his Bible with a flashlight in his closet, hiding his conversion from his parents.

"I read the words of Jesus Christ, and I realized that they were true," Jindal said in a 2014 commencement address at Liberty University. "I used to think that I had found God, but I believe it is more accurate to say that He found me."

2. He's a Rhodes Scholar — and had a young start in government and public policy

Jindal graduated at just 20 from Brown University with degrees in both biology and public policy. He was admitted to both Harvard Medical School and Yale Law School, but would turn both down to attend Oxford University as a Rhodes Scholar.

There, he studied health policy and eventually returned to his native state to serve as Secretary of the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals — all at the young age of 24. Four years later, at just 28, he was appointed the youngest-ever president of the University of Louisiana system.

In 2001, President George W. Bush appointed him to be Assistant Secretary for the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, acting as the chief policy adviser to the director of HHS.

3. Jindal lost his first run for elective office, but has won every one since Jindal left his role with HHS in 2003 to run for governor. Louisiana has an open primary system where all candidates are on the ballot regardless of party. In that first vote, Jindal topped the field, easily besting the second-place finisher, Democratic Lt. Gov. Kathleen Blanco. But in that November's runoff, Blanco narrowly prevailed despite Jindal getting some Democratic support, including an endorsement from then-New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin. Some believed racism was to blame for his close loss.

Jindal went on to be elected to Congress the following year, though, and was reelected in 2006. Under fire for her handling of 2005's devastating Hurricane Katrina, Blanco decided not to run for reelection. Jindal ran again and, this time, he easily beat state Sen. Walter Boasso, who had switched from the GOP just that April to run for governor. In 2011, Jindal won outright in the primary, winning with more than 65 percent of the vote.

4. One of Jindal's biggest moments instead drew comparison to "Kenneth, the Page"

In 2009, the young Louisiana governor was tapped to deliver the GOP response to newly elected President Obama's first address to a joint session of Congress. The plum post was supposed to launch him onto the national stage — and showcase a Republican Party badly in need of diversity.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But following Obama, Jindal, normally fast-talking, looked halting and timid, as he awkwardly delivered an attempt at a folksy speech. Both Republicans and Democrats panned the address, and many unflatteringly compared him to 30 Rock's bumpkin "Kenneth the Page."

5. He has the "Duck Dynasty" seal of approval

One TV comparison Jindal is happy to feed is his relationship with the Robertson family, stars of the popular A&E series "Duck Dynasty." The show chronicles the camo-clad, bearded family that runs a booming duck-call business. It is popular among conservatives and those in the Bible Belt, where family members are seen praying each episode and talking openly about their faith.

But that hasn't been without controversy. The family patriarch, Phil Robertson, came under fire for comments he made about people who are gay. Jindal, though, stood behind him and criticized Robertson's suspension from the network. And when Jindal began to explore a White House run, the Robertson family had his back as well.

"I'm the kind of guy who really likes smart people...and that guy's one of the smartest people I've ever met in my life," son Willie Robertson said on Fox News earlier this year, throwing his support behind Jindal. "He's young, but he's got the values; he's got the intelligence to do it."

Bobby Jindal's Plan To Stop Being A Punchline And Actually Win // Buzzfeed // McKay Coppins – June 24, 2015

The most viral headline this year with the Louisiana governor's name in it was published in The Onion: "Bobby Jindal Not Sure He Willing To Put Family Through 2-Month Presidential Campaign."

The article on the satirical news site — which included fictional quotes from Jindal fretting about how his young kids would cope with having a dad "spend dozens of days running for president" — was perfectly tuned to the sniggers and skepticism that pervade the political world when it comes to Jindal's 2016 prospects. When the article was published in January, several reporters (including this one) forwarded the link to the governor's advisers in hopes of goading them into responding. The strategists laughed it off at the time, joking that at least expectations were low.

Now, Jindal's small team of campaign aides and operatives is embarking on a plan to confound those expectations and transform their candidate from a punchline into a president. When he officially announces his bid for the Republican nomination here Wednesday evening, Jindal will be launching a campaign with little money, virtually no grassroots organization, and a principal who sits at around 1% in national polls. The most generous pundits call him an "underdog." The less generous ones call him a "dumbed-down" self-parody who "will never catch fire."

In multiple conversations with BuzzFeed News — as well as a candid, on-the-record briefing with reporters ahead of the announcement Wednesday, complete with a PowerPoint presentation and an expansive Q&A — Jindal's top strategists laid out their theory of the race and what they view as their candidate's most plausible path to victory.

Camp out in Iowa

Jindal's team conceded that their campaign is not starting out with the sort of war chest that will enable rivals like Jeb Bush and Scott Walker to crisscross the country and launch national ad campaigns.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It wouldn’t be bad to have $100 million dollars,” said Curt Anderson, Jindal’s chief campaign strategist. “I’ll be honest about that.”

But for now, he said, all they really need is enough cash to buy roundtrip plane tickets from Des Moines to Manchester. Jindal’s advisers repeatedly stressed that they’re running an “early-state campaign,” and that the first “signs of life” for the Jindal candidacy will likely register with improved polling in Iowa.

Anderson pointed to the last two Republican victors in Iowa — grassroots favorites Mike Huckabee and Rick Santorum — as proof that the first-in-the-nation caucuses “can’t be bought” by well-funded establishment frontrunners. And he said in this election’s crowded field of 14 candidates and counting, the winner of the Hawkeye State will probably only need about 20% of caucus-goers, or 26,000 votes. Jindal will spend the bulk of the next six months trying to win those voters over one handshake at a time in diners and county fairs across the state.

Of course, it’s been 15 years since the winner of the Iowa caucuses in a contested race went on to be the Republican presidential nominee. But as Anderson put it, “If you win Iowa, you’re a serious contender for the nomination.”

Harness the power of Duck Dynasty

Jindal will hardly be the only Republican candidate pinning his hopes on a strong showing in Iowa. Ted Cruz, Rick Perry, Carly Fiorina, Ben Carson, and Huckabee will all likely be pursuing similar strategies, and they will have to compete for attention with Donald Trump’s high-profile political torch-juggling act. But one Jindal adviser noted that their candidate has something none of his rivals have: the Duck Dynasty endorsement.

Indeed, Jindal was perhaps the most outspoken defender of the Robertsons — the bearded, duck-hunting stars of A&E’s hit reality TV show — when the family patriarch came under fire in 2013 for crude anti-gay remarks he made in a magazine interview. Jindal has known the family of Louisiana natives for years, and he used the flare-up in the culture wars to warn of a triumphalist secularism in American society that aims to bully conservative Christians like the Robertsons out of the public square.

The family rewarded Jindal’s loyalty by featuring him in the most recent season premiere of their show, and Willie Robertson has said he would support the governor if he ran for president. The background photo on Jindal’s Twitter feed shows him and his family posing with the Robertsons.

To many in the political class, Jindal’s close alliance with a cast of goofy reality TV stars scans as pandering. But a senior adviser to the candidate pointed out that the show has been tremendously popular with the sort of religious conservatives who dominate the Iowa caucuses, and that Willie’s endorsement could be a real selling point.

“The governor and Willie have been good buddies for a long time,” he said. “And having somebody who folks know and trust, who can say, ‘Hey look, I know this guy and he’s a good man, and a great governor’ — that’s a big deal.”

More substantively, Jindal’s campaign says he has been out front on the debate over religious freedom dating back to a speech he gave in early 2014 at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library, when he prophesied of a “silent war” between people of faith and their antagonists in government and media. With the Supreme Court now poised to legalize same-sex marriage nationwide, they predict the issues he’s been discussing could be central to the 2016 race. Helping him shape that message and take it to grassroots Christian voters is Family Research Council president Tony Perkins, a key power-broker on the religious right who has been informally advising the Louisiana governor.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jindal, who was raised Hindu before converting to Catholicism, refers to himself in his 2009 book as an "evangelical Catholic." According to Anderson, "He's going to talk a lot about his faith on the campaign trail, and he's not going to apologize for it."

Straddle the line between culture warrior and policy wonk

At the same time, Jindal's aides said they wouldn't pigeonhole him as the social conservative candidate. Anderson argued one reason Huckabee and Santorum ultimately flamed out after winning in Iowa was because they "had only one gear and were stuck in the evangelical lane."

Jindal, by contrast, is a Rhodes scholar who is well-versed in public policy. One slide in their presentation called Jindal "the sharpest knife in the Republican drawer."

"You hear this stuff about, 'Oh, so-and-so has assembled a team of experts — he's got Henry Kissinger who he had lunch with,'" Anderson said. "But Jindal actually is a policy expert. It might not be a bad idea to have the head guy be a policy guy."

Anderson also rejected the premise that a governor is automatically less qualified to handle foreign policy than a member of Congress. "This is one of the things that makes me laugh the most, when reporters or somebody says we have some freshman senators who have great foreign policy experience," he said. "Yeah, the government paid them to take a few trips. It's just a joke. I don't know that we have anybody [in the GOP field] who's a foreign policy [expert.].. I don't see a former secretary of state."

Win the trolling primary

Jindal's penchant for hurling barbed, intentionally provocative one-liners at Democrats is often derided by pundits, who note that this is the same politician who not long ago called for the GOP to "stop being the stupid party" and talk to voters like "adults."

But Jindal's campaign suggested the charged rhetoric won't let up anytime soon, arguing that early-state voters are eager to support candidates who are "truth-tellers."

"He's not gonna sugar-coat anything," Anderson said, as a PowerPoint slide appeared on a projector screen that read, in part, "Clinton and Obama are leading America toward socialism."

While Jindal's trolling does little to earn the respect of political elites, it does earn him media headlines — and with TV networks using national polls to select the candidates who will participate in their debates, Jindal needs all the national attention he can get.

Own his polarizing Louisiana record

The campaign pointed to polls that show the vast majority of the Republican electorate would prefer to nominate a governor instead of a member of Congress. Jindal's own record in Louisiana, though, has been the subject of much debate recently.

According to the campaign's talking points, Jindal has cut the state budget by 26% while in office; reduced the number of government workers by 30,000; pushed through bold ethics reforms; reversed the decades-long trend of out-migration in the state; and done it all without raising taxes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Jindal's critics argue he is leaving out some key facts. The reduction in the government payroll, for example, was largely made possible by privatizing nine hospitals in the state — and it's unclear how much money Louisiana is actually saving with the overhaul. Timmy Teepell, a longtime Jindal adviser who will serve as his campaign manager, countered these claims by saying credit agencies have shown their approval of his administration's handling of the budget with several rating upgrades for Louisiana.

Anderson griped about the "rash of national reporters who knew nothing about what's going on in Louisiana" but nonetheless wrote stories saying Jindal's polarizing record and low approval ratings would ultimately sink his presidential aspirations. He said Jindal would eagerly tout his record on the campaign trail as a way of contrasting his competence with his rivals' lack of executive experience.

"We have a stunning crop of great talkers in the race right now," Anderson said. "But very few doers."

Take advantage of Jindal's low name recognition

At one point in their presentation Wednesday, the Jindal campaign presented a chart with two axes: one that mapped the Republican presidential contenders ideologically from "moderate" to "conservative," and the other from "insider" to "insurgent."

"This will really offend the other candidates, so we're not handing it out," Anderson said.

Nonetheless, he argued that the best positioned candidates in this race were those in the conservative/insurgent quadrant. According to the Jindal campaign's chart — which didn't appear to be based on any scientific data, but rather their own perception of the field — those candidates included Perry, Walker, Marco Rubio, and Jindal. (Huckabee, who seems like a logical rival for Jindal was placed on the "moderate" end of the ideological axis, presumably because of his stances on fiscal issues like entitlement reform.)

The Jindal campaign also eagerly pointed to a poll that showed 62% of the primary electorate said they had "no opinion" of Jindal. At this point in the cycle, Anderson argued, most poll respondents are basing their answers on name recognition, which explains why "a reality TV star" is currently polling in second place in New Hampshire.

They attributed Jindal's low standing in the polls to the fact that he has been busy with his "day job." Because he isn't part of a political dynasty and hasn't spent as much time as other candidates appearing on cable news, many voters simply don't know what to make of him, they said. "Half these people don't even know who their own damn governor is," Anderson said. He said at this point the popular perception of Jindal is largely colored by stereotypes, joking that because Jindal is Indian-American, people probably think he's "good at math."

Teepell said they plan to take advantage of voters' lack of familiarity with Jindal by defining him as "the youngest candidate with the longest resume" — a line several of the candidate's strategists have been using in recent days.

Anderson said at this point in the cycle, he would rather have a blank canvas to draw on than a widely unpopular caricature to erase — as in Bush's case. As he put it, "You don't want to have 100% name ID and 11% in the polls."

Bobby Jindal Is Running For President // Buzzfeed // Kyle Blaine – June 24, 2015

Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal announced Wednesday that he will seek the Republican nomination for president in 2016.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A video posted on Facebook shows Jindal telling his his wife and children “we have decided we are going to be running for president this year.”

Once a rising star in the Republican party, Jindal is now struggling to stand out in a crowded primary field. Jindal is the 13th Republican to enter the race so far, and other candidates are expected to announce in the coming weeks.

The first Indian-American governor, Jindal has a strong appeal with social conservatives. He issued an executive order earlier this year protecting those who opposes same-sex marriage for religious reasons.

KASICH

John Kasich Appeals to Iowa as He Ponders Whit e House Bid // NYT // Trip Gabriel – June 24, 2015

“Does anybody remember me?” John Kasich asked Iowans on his first visit to the state since an inglorious presidential bid in 1999, when he barely made an impression before dropping out.

Throughout Wednesday, as he hop-scotched between events, Mr. Kasich, the two-term Ohio governor, sought to disarm skeptics of his late-to-the-party exploration of a second White House run.

“I was giant television star. Do you remember that?” he asked a roomful of under-40 professionals from the Bull Moose Club. There were many blank looks. “I was only at Fox News for 10 years,” he said, breaking into a grin.

In an interview with The Des Moines Register that ran Wednesday morning, Mr. Kasich even tutored Iowans on how to say his name. “It rhymes with basic,” he said.

But with blunt talk about his policy departures from conservative orthodoxy, Mr. Kasich appeared to make new friends in Iowa.

“I was taken aback by how straight a shooter he was,” said Tyler De Hahn, chairman of the Dallas County Republican Party, who heard him at the Bull Moose luncheon. “He’s kind of like a Christie lite.”

A moment earlier, Mr. Kasich had been pushed about why Ohio was not a right-to-work state. “Because we don’t have a reason to be one,” he said.

Like all candidates who come to Iowa, Mr. Kasich, 63, recounted well-rehearsed chapters of his biography and trumpeted his successes:

* Working with President Clinton while a member of the House to craft “the first balanced budget since man walked on the moon.”

* His decade in the private sector. “I just loved it,” he said, skipping over the role his employer, Lehman Brothers, played in contributing to the financial crisis.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

* His election as Ohio governor “at exactly the right time,” in 2010, when “things couldn’t have been much worse.”

“I took a lot of the lessons I had learned in Washington to Ohio,” Mr. Kasic said, a line no other Republican candidate is likely to utter this cycle.

Mr. Kasich, who said he was still weighing whether to enter the race, is barely registering in Iowa polls. His formidable hurdles in the state include a lack of time visiting it, and a list of center-right policies he has supported that conservative caucusgoers are likely to reject, from expanding Medicaid under the Affordable Care Act to voting for an assault weapons ban while in Congress.

“The hurdle he’d have to get over is the strong religious right,” said James Gilson, a retired stockbroker who heard Mr. Kasich address the Greater Des Moines Partnership, a business and civic group.

But balancing out those negatives is the potential appeal of the straight-shooting, even gnarly, Kasich persona. Despite the state’s reputation for Iowa Nice, its voters welcome a candidate who can cut through the political catchphrases.

“He tells it like it is, and I think that’s going to be huge,” said Mike McInerney, the Bull Moose president. “Iowans really respect that.”

GOP’s Kasich opposes deporting millions in US illegally // AP // Thomas Beaumont – June 24, 2015

Ohio Gov. John Kasich says it's not practical or humane to deport the millions of immigrants who are in the United States illegally.

"I'm not for putting them on a school bus, driving them to the border, opening the door and just telling them to get out," Kasich told reporters.

The governor was on his first trip to early-voting Iowa as a potential Republican presidential candidate, and tried to draw distinctions with his would-be rivals on immigration and more. He favors fines for those here illegally but said Republicans need to show more compassion toward immigrants and minorities, as well as more sensitivity on the environment.

Plain-spoken, but with deadpan wit, Kasich drew applause and timely laughs from an audience of about 200 during a question-and-answer session in Des Moines.

"People are looking for someone to really speak plainly and openly to them," said Iowa state Rep. Mary Ann Hanusa, who said she is considering supporting Kasich, among others, in the Iowa caucuses in February.

Kasich also said he is open to sending U.S. fighting forces into direct combat in Iraq against the Islamic State group, which has overtaken cities that U.S. troops fought to seize from insurgents after the 2003 U.S.-led Iraq invasion.

"We should have a coalition and, if we have to, put boots on the ground and start destroying these people," Kasich later told a group of about 50 Republican professionals in Des Moines. "I think we have to be careful about where we go. But when we go, we have to mean business."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Among other GOP presidential prospects, South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum have called for sending combat troops to Iraq.

Kasich says he'll decide soon whether to enter the 2016 race. Three other governors and four ex-governors either have joined the contest or are expected to soon.

Among them, Kasich also has extensive experience in Congress, with 18 years in the House, including time on the Armed Services Committee. He argues that background gives him an expertise few in the field share.

The challenge of being a Wall Street candidate // MSNBC // Steve Benen – June 24, 2015

There was a point late last year in which Mitt Romney clearly wanted to run once again for president. Romney and his aides kept telling reporters about his interest, and just as importantly, they told Republican donors to wait before rallying behind a 2016 favorite.

Team Romney realized that Jeb Bush was well positioned to be the GOP establishment's candidate of choice, but Romney and his staff also saw Bush as vulnerable. "You saw what they did to me with Bain [Capital]," Romney reportedly told allies behind closed doors. "What do you think they'll do to [Bush] over Barclays?"

The argument may have lacked self-awareness, but it raised a legitimate point. Jeb Bush's his work with the investment banks Lehman Brothers and Barclays would likely be a problem if he wins the Republican nomination.

But perhaps no candidate would be as closely associated with Wall Street as Ohio Gov. John Kasich (R). The Democratic National Committee circulated this clip today of the Ohio Republican talking about his private-sector background.

"My military reform activities were basically completed, so I decided to leave Washington [in 2001]. So, I went out and spent 10 years in the private sector and I just loved it. I never thought that I would be back in politics."

Kasich made similar comments to Time magazine just last week. Asked whether he has any regrets from his time in the private sector, the Ohio Republican was incredulous.

"It was fantastic," Kasich told Time. "Are you kidding? Regrets? I thought it was a fantastic time. I traveled all over the country. I got an incredible education. I worked my tail off. It was great."

As much as I appreciate the governor's enthusiasm, there's a small problem with his "fantastic" experiences in the private sector.

After leaving Congress, Kasich went to work at Lehman Brothers. In fact, he was there in 2007 and 2008 – which you may recall was a particularly unpleasant time for Lehman and the global economy that was falling off a cliff.

I'm not prepared to say working at Lehman is necessarily a disqualifier, but Kasich makes it sound as if he was at summer camp – he "just loved" his time at the firm. It was "fantastic." It was "great."

Asked about possible regrets – remember, he was there when Lehman made the biggest bankruptcy filing in the history of the United States – Kasich responded as if the question itself was ridiculous.

We'll learn soon enough whether Kasich runs for president, whether he'll be competitive, and what kind of message he'll present to voters. But my suggestion for any former managing director at Lehman seeking national office is simple: try a little contrition. Don't make it sound like working at imploding Wall Street firm was a barrel of laughs.

John Kasich: George W. Bush was a 'steamroller' in 2000 // Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 24,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2015

Ohio Gov. John Kasich, who is scheduled to be in the early caucus state of Iowa Wednesday, says former President George W. Bush was a “steamroller” during the 2000 presidential election cycle, when Mr. Kasich ran briefly but dropped out.

Asked by the Des Moines Register what made him drop out early in 2000, Mr. Kasich said: “Because I couldn’t win. I didn’t have any money, and I was just a young congressman at that point. George Bush was a steamroller, and he steamrolled all the way through. And I didn’t want to be pursuing something that I didn’t think I could win.”

Mr. Kasich said a few weeks ago in New Hampshire that he didn’t think he was going to be back up there again because of former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, “the brother of the 43rd president,” who officially entered the presidential race last week and is expected to be a formidable fundraiser.

“I didn’t think I was going to be back up here again because frankly, I thought Jeb was just going to suck all the air out of the room, and it just hasn’t happened,” Mr. Kasichtold a group of business leaders before quickly adding “no hit on you, Jeb!”

Mr. Kasich, who is laying the groundwork for another possible White House run, told the Register it’s yet to be decided how much he’ll put into Iowa.

“But I’m coming to Iowa because I want to show respect to the people of Iowa,” he said.

OTHER

Univision, Washingto Post to host Republican candidates forum // Politico // Hadas Gold – June 24, 2015

Univision News and The Washington Post are teaming up to sponsor a Republican candidates' forum as well as a series of polls, the two companies announced on Wednesday.

The move is significant since Univision wasn't given the opportunity to host an official Republican debate. Telemundo, Univision's main competitor in the Spanish-speaking American market, is hosting one in February.

“This important alliance with The Washington Post brings together two media giants with tremendous audience reach, leveraging Univision News’ undisputed leadership among the Spanish-speaking population and The Post’s unmatched political reporting and expertise,” Isaac Lee, president of News and Digital, UCI, and CEO of Fusion said in a statement. “The collaboration will allow us to enhance and expand our coverage of the 2016 presidential elections and provide both our audiences with the most comprehensive and reliable profile of the U.S. Hispanic electorate available to date.”

The candidates' forum will take place some time in March, after the four early states have completed their contests. The exact date and location will be determined based on the state of the race.

In addition to the forum, the two organizations will collaborate on a series of polls and reporting efforts focusing on Hispanic and minority populations. Spanish-speaking Washington Post reporters will also begin to appear more frequently on Univision networks.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Hispanics are the fastest-growing electorate in America today and will be crucial in deciding the next U.S. president,” Washington Post Managing Editor Kevin Merida said in a statement. “We are thrilled to partner with Univision. Our goal is to produce together the most authoritative, innovative coverage of Hispanic voters ever seen during a presidential campaign cycle. We will delve into their lives, how they relate to the candidates and how the candidates relate to them.”

The Post/Univision forum is the second such event announced in the last few weeks. Earlier this month, the New Hampshire Union Leader announced that it would host its own Republican primary forum on C-SPAN on Aug. 6, in order to combat what its publisher described as Fox's "threat to the first-in-the-nation primary." Fox News, which is hosting the first primary debate is also hosting a candidates forum for those candidates who don't make the cut for their debate stage. Candidates can participate in forums without being disqualified from sanctioned RNC debates as long as the forum follows a certain format, candidates taking turns speaking to an audience, rather than engaging with one another.

Mitt Romney seeks role as Republican kingmaker // The Hill // Jonathan Easley – June 25, 2015

Mitt Romney is asserting himself as a leader of the Republican Party at a time when the GOP lacks a true standard-bearer.

As the huge field of Republican contenders begins the long slog to the party’s 2016 nomination, Romney is working to connect select candidates with his vast political network, urging the party to learn from his past mistakes, attacking Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton and taking forceful stances on controversial issues.

Last week, the former Massachusetts governor was the first major Republican to call for the removal of the Confederate flag from the grounds of the South Carolina Capitol after the shooting deaths of nine African-Americans at a black church in Charleston.

GOP presidential contenders were far more cautious about entering the debate. Now, many of the candidates face criticism for their hesitancy.

“You’re going to see more of this unvarnished Mitt than the Mitt that seemed so calculated when he was running for president,” said Tom Rath, a GOP strategist in New Hampshire and senior adviser to Romney’s 2012 campaign.

“He’ll pick his fights carefully, but he won’t be reluctant to speak up when he believes an issue needs to be framed a certain way, or to provide cover to the candidates,” Rath said. “He might step on some toes, but you’ll see him be more aggressive.”

While past presidential losers have tended to fade into the background, Romney went about the business of repairing his political image after his humbling defeat at the hands of President Obama in 2012.

It’s a renaissance that first came to fruition in 2014, when Romney crisscrossed the country in support of Republican candidates. He endorsed early in the primaries and quickly earned a reputation for backing rising stars, such as now-Sen. Joni Ernst (R-Iowa), who fought through a crowded primary field with Romney’s help.

The former Massachusetts governor ended the cycle, which saw big Republican gains in the House and Senate, as the most sought-after GOP surrogate — a position that had seemed nearly unthinkable just two years before.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I think a lot of people questioned what his role was going to be going forward, but he proved to be critical to Republican efforts in 2014, raising millions of dollars and helping electable conservatives win in the primaries,” said Ryan Williams, a former Romney spokesman who now works for a firm that does consulting work for Jeb Bush.

“Our party has not had a national leader for some time. We haven’t been in the White House since 2008,” Williams said. “Gov. Romney has stepped up.”

There had been some speculation Romney would make a third bid for the presidency in 2016, but that faded with his announcement in January that he had “decided it is best to give other leaders in the party the opportunity to become our next nominee.”

Those who know him best say he’s not likely to endorse a GOP candidate during the primaries. But they expect him to steer resources and attention to those candidates he believes best represent the party’s interests.

In an appearance on “Meet the Press” this month, Romney said there are about a half-dozen GOP candidates he believes could be effective presidents. He mentioned former Florida Gov. Bush, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, Sen. Marco Rubio (Fla.) and Ohio Gov. John Kasich by name.

In June, Romney hosted all of those candidates except for Bush, who was traveling in Europe at the time, at a retreat in Park City, Utah. Various GOP donors and power players were also in attendance.

“He sees an opportunity to shape the debate and be somebody the donors look to for wisdom and guidance on who they should support,” said Katie Packer Gage, Romney’s deputy campaign manager in 2012.

“I don’t think he’s looking to give any specific candidate a leg up, but he’ll point it out when he thinks candidates are showing strength and leadership,” she said. “He also may call people out when he thinks they’re being petty, in an effort to elevate the debate.”

Romney hasn’t shied away from addressing his own campaign missteps in an effort to make sure the next nominee doesn’t repeat them.

On the same “Meet the Press” appearance, Romney said the biggest mistake he made in 2012 was not focusing enough on the plight of minorities. Romney urged Republicans to reach out to impoverished minority groups to make the argument that conservative principles will help elevate their condition.

“He definitely has an eye on making sure the eventual nominee is well-positioned in the general election to beat Hillary,” said Williams.

Republicans expect Romney will emerge in the general election as a top surrogate for whoever ultimately wins the nomination. In particular, they see an opening for him to go on the attack against Clinton on the issue of foreign policy.

Many Republicans believe Romney has been proven right on a host of international issues that were a drag on him in 2012. During one debate, Romney called Russia the U.S.’s primary geopolitical foe, a declaration that was met with derision by Democrats.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But with Russian President Vladimir Putin challenging U.S. leadership at every turn, some Republicans believe Romney is the perfect messenger to highlight what they see as Clinton's failures as secretary of State.

"Our job is to defeat Secretary Clinton, and part of doing that is making sure we discredit her time as secretary of State," said Colin Reed, the head of the GOP opposition research group America Rising. "Given what Romney has said on Russia, he could be the best person speaking out on those issues."

Influential conservative radio host Hugh Hewitt is pushing Romney for vice president, and other Republicans say Romney would be a natural fit for a prominent Cabinet position, such as secretary of Treasury.

But Romney's supporters don't see it. They say he's content at this point in his life to play loyal foot soldier for the GOP, while remaining free to pursue other challenges that might catch his interest.

"I talked to him a few weeks ago, and it's very clear that my prayers won't be answered, and he won't be running for president," said Rath. "But this is a great role for him to play. He's contributing and bringing reason and perspective to the party. He'll always find something to do."

Marco Rubio and Jeb Bush: How the Presidential Campaign Is Testing a Friendship // ABC // Veronica Stracqualursi – June 24, 2015

Now that they've both announced they are running for president, Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio have officially turned a 15-year friendship into a rivalry.

Bush, the former Florida governor, and Rubio, the junior U.S. senator from the Sunshine State, share a number of similarities besides both being interested in moving into the White House. They both got their start in Florida politics. They own homes in Florida less than three miles away from one another. And they both have ties to Latin America: Rubio is Cuban American, and Bush lived in Venezuela, speaks Spanish fluently and married a Mexican woman.

But they have their differences, too.

Bush, 62, is 18 years older than Rubio, 44. One is a self-made man who comes from humble beginnings, the other is from a well-known political dynasty that boasts two previous presidents. One is still in office, the other hasn't been in office since 2007 and hasn't run for political office in more than a decade.

Their friendship will surely be tested by the rigors of the presidential election, and here's a look back at the two Florida politicians' history together:

Jeb Bush Announces 2016 Presidential Campaign: 'I Will Run To Win'

Why Jeb Bush Isn't Keeping Marco Rubio Out Of 2016 Presidential Race

Marco Rubio Running For President in 2016: 'I Can Lead This Country' (EXCLUSIVE)

1998 - First Encounters

While Jeb Bush was running for governor, he wrote a $50 campaign check for Rubio's first campaign for West Miami city commissioner. It was a winning year for both men; Bush won the governor's seat and he called Rubio to say congratulations when Rubio had clinched the election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2004 - The Golden Years

Bush won a second term as Florida's governor in 2002 and Rubio won election into Florida's House of Representatives in 2002. Gov. Bush had a GOP-led legislature to work with, including Rep. Rubio, and to help push his policies.

Rubio had worked his way from majority whip up to Florida's house speaker. On Sept. 13, Bush decided to commemorate this special moment in a rather unusual way.

"I rely on Chang with great regularity in my public life. He has been by my side and sometimes I let him down. But Chang, this mystical warrior, has never let me down," Bush said, referring to a sword with a name derived from a Bush family saying. "I'm going to bestow to you the sword of a great conservative warrior," Bush said to Rubio.

Rubio began flirting with the idea of running for U.S. Senate in 2009, but said he wouldn't run if Bush decided to. Things turned out to Rubio's liking -- Bush didn't want to be senator, encouraged Rubio to run and ended up playing a behind-the-scenes booster to Rubio throughout his campaign. Bush was at Rubio's election watch party as they were waiting for the election to be called.

Jeb was turning 59 years old and so Rubio wrote his friend a birthday tribute, revealing a tactic of his: "Often in the Senate when faced with a tough choice, I ask myself: WWJD. What would Jeb do?"

Rubio also wrote that when he first sought the Senate seat, "'The Gov' was one of the only ones who actually thought I could win. He has been a huge influence on me."

2012 - Bush Believes in a Romney-Rubio Ticket

GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney was in need of a running mate, and before he chose Rep. Paul Ryan, R-Wisconsin, Romney was being coaxed by Bush into picking Rubio. "Marco Rubio is my favorite [choice], because we have a close relationship," Bush said in an interview with PBS. "I admire him greatly."

In an interview with NPR, Rubio said the old friends chatted about everything from the Masters, to the Paleo diet (Jeb Bush is on it), the Miami Dolphins and about the presidential campaign, though "not in great detail."

April 2015 - Rubio Announces

Just before announcing his candidacy in April, Rubio told ABC News' George Stephanopoulos that this would not have any effect on their relationship.

"Jeb is my friend. He's still my friend. ... We'll still continue to be friends. I have tremendous admiration for him," Sen. Rubio said. Rubio went on to explain: "I think it's important to understand I'm not running against Jeb Bush. And I hope he's not running against me. We are competing for the same job."

June 2015 - Bush Announces

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Shortly after throwing his hat into the presidential ring in early June, Bush called Marco Rubio a "good friend" and "real talent." But he added that he's definitely more prepared than Rubio to become President of the United States.

"There's no question of that at all," Bush told ABC News' David Muir when asked if he's more experienced than Rubio. "And that's not disparaging my good friend, who I think is a real talent."

Fox News Poll: Bush, Trum p score post-announcement bumps // Fox // Dana Blanton – June 24, 2015

There's been a lineup change in the race for the GOP nomination, as businessman Donald Trump moves up after declaring his candidacy. He's now second in the order after former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who also got an uptick in support after his formal announcement.

For Democrats, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton is still -- by far -- the team leader, according to a new Fox News national poll on the 2016 presidential election.

Bush tops the list of GOP contenders with 15 percent support among Republican primary voters. That's up from 12 percent last month and his best showing yet. Support for Trump more than doubled since his announcement and that catapults him into the top tier at 11 percent. He's followed by retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson at 10 percent. No one else receives double-digit backing.

Bush officially kicked off his campaign June 15 and Trump launched June 16. It's common for candidates to see a bump in their numbers in the days following their formal announcement and the media coverage that comes with that.

The bad news for Trump is that only 29 percent of GOP primary voters consider him a serious candidate. More than twice that many -- 64 percent -- think he's a side show. Among all registered voters, nearly 8 in 10 say Trump is a side show (77 percent).

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, who has not announced whether he will run, comes in at nine percent. That's down from 12 percent a month ago and the first time Walker has been in single digits since January.

The poll finds support for Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul (9 percent), Florida Sen. Marco Rubio (8 percent) and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (6 percent) holding steady among GOP primary voters.

Texas Sen. Ted Cruz receives 4 percent, and businesswoman Carly Fiorina and former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum get 3 percent apiece.

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, who announced his candidacy June 24, gets 2 percent.

Clinton remains in command on the Democratic side, with 61 percent of Democratic primary voters backing her compared to 15 percent supporting Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders. Another 11 percent go for Vice President Joe Biden and three percent for New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo -- both of whom are undeclared.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley garners one percent and former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee gets less than one percent support. Former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb, who has announced an exploratory committee but is still undeclared, gets two percent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(Note to political junkies: Previous Fox News polls included Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren as an option, so compare these results to the previous results at your peril.)

Part of Clinton's appeal among Democratic primary voters is that 81 percent believe she really would be a fighter for the middle class. Overall, 44 percent of voters think she would fight for the middle class, while a 51-percent majority sees that as just a campaign slogan.

Honest and Trustworthy

What do Donald Trump and Hillary Clinton have in common? (No, not hair spray.) Majorities don't trust them.

More than twice as many say Trump is not honest and trustworthy as think he is (64 percent vs. 30 percent). That gives him an honesty score of negative 34.

Clinton's honesty score is negative seven. Less than half of voters -- 45 percent -- rate her as honest. That's unchanged from earlier this year, but down from a record 54 percent who said she was honest in 2014. A 52-percent majority says Clinton is not honest.

Bush's honesty score is negative two (45 percent honest vs. 47 percent not). In April it was 46 percent honest vs. 42 percent not.

Fully 79 percent of Democrats think Clinton is honest, while just 63 percent of Republicans say the same of Bush.

Rubio's honesty score is a positive four, although nearly a third of voters are unable to rate him. Over half of Republicans, 57 percent, think Rubio is honest.

Hypothetical Head-to-Heads

Clinton tops each of the GOP candidates tested in 2016 presidential match-ups -- except Bush.

The two dynasty candidates tie with 43 percent apiece. Bush had a one-point edge in May and also tied Clinton in March.

Clinton bests Rubio by just one point, Paul by four, Carson by five and Cruz, Fiorina and Walker by six points each. In each of these match-ups the results are within the margin of sampling error.

Despite Trump's recent jump into the top tier in the GOP nomination preference, Clinton fares best against him -- winning by 17 points.

Clinton's edge over Fiorina (45-39) is just half the 12-point edge she had in May (49-37). Among women, Clinton led by 23-points in May. That's down to a 14-point advantage today.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Despite Clinton's current advantage in almost all of the potential match-ups, most Republicans like their odds of winning in 2016 if she's the Democratic nominee: 22 percent think they have an "excellent" chance and another 58 percent say a "good" chance.

Many Democrats see Clinton as vulnerable as well. Just under half, 46 percent, think the GOP has a chance of defeating her (49 percent disagree).

By a 67-28 percent margin, independents think Republicans have at least a good chance of winning in 2016 if Clinton is their opponent.

Three GOP candidates have never held public office (Carson, Fiorina and Trump). So what experience do you need before going to the White House? Overall, voters give roughly equal weight to a president having a business background (48 percent "very" important) as they do to having previously held elected office (49 percent "very" important).

Partisans prioritize in the opposite direction. A 55-percent majority of Democrats says having experience in public office is "very" important, while a 58-percent majority of Republicans feels that way about having a proven track record of working in business.

Pollpourri

Most voters think Hillary Clinton is her own person. By a wide 72-21 percent margin, voters say if Clinton wins the White House they would see it as her first term rather than another term for her husband, former President Bill Clinton. In addition, a 54-percent majority would see her win as a fresh start and not a continuation of Obama's policies (38 percent).

Majorities of Democrats and Republicans agree that a Clinton win would be her first term instead of a third term for Bill. But most Republicans think it would be a continuation of Obama's administration, while most Democrats say it would be a fresh start.

The Fox News poll is based on landline and cell phone interviews with 1,005 randomly chosen registered voters nationwide and was conducted under the joint direction of Anderson Robbins Research (D) and Shaw & Company Research (R) from June 21-23, 2015. The full poll has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus three percentage points. The margin of error is higher among the subgroups of Democratic and Republican primary voters (+/-5%).

Univision Is Going To Hold A Republican Presidential Candidates' Forum After All // Buzzfeed // Adrian Carrasquillo – June 24, 2015

Univision News is poised to announce a Republican presidential candidates' forum ahead of "crucial" March 2016 primaries in partnership with The Washington Post, after missing out on the initial batch of debates sanctioned by the Republican National Committee.

According to a draft of a press release obtained by BuzzFeed News, the Spanish-language giant will co-host the forum after the four early states have completed their contests and during the run-up to March primaries in Texas, Florida, Ohio, Virginia and Michigan.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Republican Party has had a complex, at times painful, relationship with Univision — knowing it needs to be represented on one of the largest networks in the country and a critical connection to Hispanic homes in the U.S., but also a place it often feels slighted by.

In January, RNC chairman Reince Priebus told BuzzFeed News, “It’s highly questionable whether we’re treated fairly on Univision.”

And the RNC was criticized in January when its initial slate of debates didn’t include Univision. New York City council speaker Melissa Mark-Viverito, said the RNC was likely “scared to debate” on the most-watched Spanish-language network, calling the decision “shameful.”

But a Republican source with knowledge of the issue told BuzzFeed News that Univision never submitted a request to hold a debate, something that was not reported at the time.

The RNC says it sought to limit the number of debates so that candidates could focus on engaging voters instead of preparing and traveling for debates. But now Univision is moving forward with its own forum, which doesn’t violate RNC rules but is not sanctioned by them, either.

“We encourage our candidates to engage with all voters and to share their vision for the future. We hope this forum complies with RNC rules,” said Ruth Guerra, RNC director of Hispanic media.

The state of the race will determine the date and location of the candidates’ forum, according to the release, and invitations to the leading candidates will be extended then. It is unclear what the structure would be and the exact date still has not been decided.

The release says the forum would happen once the field of candidates has been “winnowed down by the early contests and as party rules begin to allow state-by-state distribution of delegates on a winner-take-all basis.”

The announcement also serves as the beginning of a partnership between the two news organizations, which will include a series of polls and joint reporting efforts.

“The collaboration will allow us to enhance and expand our coverage of the 2016 presidential elections and provide both our audiences with the most comprehensive and reliable profile of the U.S. Hispanic electorate available to date,” said Isaac Lee, the president of Univision News, according to the release.

The first Republican debate is slated for August 6 in Cleveland, Ohio.

Spanish-language networks Telemundo and CNN en Español were both included in the announced debates. Telemundo’s debate will be done with sister organization NBC News, along with National Review, in Houston, Texas on Feb. 26.

In March, Priebus spoke about the debates on Spanish-language networks at an event held by the U.S. Hispanic Chamber of Commerce, making it sound like he was OK with Univision not being part of the initial slate of debates.

“I’m proud to say that one of our partners is Telemundo,” he said. “With NBC, they will host a debate, which is important, because together, NBC and Telemundo reach 91 percent of Hispanic households. In addition to that, every debate that airs on CNN will also air on CNN Español.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

OTHER 2016 NEWS

Campaign swag and "Made in America" in the 2016 election // CBS News // Jenna Sakwa - June 25, 2015

The selling of presidential campaign swag is a fundamental part of nearly every major political campaign. It helps bring in money, build donor databases, and swag also makes a statement about the candidate.

One question some campaigns wrestle with is whether every piece of merchandise sold with their names writ large needs to be stamped "Made in America." For many, the answer is, in essence, not necessarily.

"All of our products are either made in America, or printed in America," a spokesman for the Paul campaign said. "The [campaign] store was built and is run in the heartland of America. Unfortunately, not all products sold in the US are American made, but we are continually looking for products to offer that are."

Bella + Canvas, the company who manufactures the t-shirt says it does, in fact, have a "Made in the USA" collection as part of its full line. However, the shirt sold on Paul's website is not part of it.

Candidates on both sides of the aisle are pledging American-made products this cycle. Democrat Hillary Clinton's store advertises that her campaign's items are both American-made and union-made.

And spokespeople for the campaigns of Republicans Ted Cruz and Marco Rubio tell CBS News all of their merchandise is made in the USA.

In 2012 both Mitt Romney and President Obama's presidential campaigns sold exclusively made-in-America swag.

Romney's former digital director Zac Moffatt, who oversaw the campaign's e-commerce store, explained that sourcing all of a campaign's products in the U.S. can present some challenges.

"You would be surprised how hard that can be," Moffatt said. "We were often running out of inventory."

Meaghan Burdick, who was in charge of marketing and merchandising for Obama's 2008 and 2012 campaigns, said American-made goods can also be more expensive, but the campaign products set the tone.

"You're running for President of the United States, so I think it should be made in the U.S.," Burdick said of the products she ordered. "We felt extremely strongly about it. We tried to have everything union-made, so it was made in the U.S. and union printed."

Many of the Republicans running are more flexible than Democrats on the origins of their candidate bobble-heads or bumper stickers. They largely support trade initiatives, as their congressional votes on trade suggest (Democrats are divided), and they say that the wares on their websites reflect this attitude.

"We live in a global society," explains Sean Spicer, communications director for Republican National Committee. "We are a party that welcomes and believes in free trade."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So, it depends on the message candidates want to send. The lengths to which campaigns will go to ensure every product is made in America, Spicer says, are the decisions of each individual candidate.

TOP NEWS

DOMESTIC

Federal Hate Crime Charges Likely in South Carolina Church Shooting // NYT // Matt Apuzzo, Michael S. Schmidt and Richard Pérez-Peña – June 24, 2015

The Justice Department will likely file federal hate crime charges against the man suspected of carrying out a massacre at a storied black church in South Carolina, federal law enforcement officials said Wednesday.

Dylann Roof, 21, already faces nine counts of murder and could receive the death penalty in state court. But there is widespread agreement among officials at the Justice Department and Federal Bureau of Investigation that the shooting at Emanuel A.M.E. Church in Charleston was so horrific and racially motivated that the federal government was obligated to address it, law enforcement officials said.

F.B.I. analysts have also concluded "with a high degree of certainty" that Mr. Roof posted a racist manifesto online, which could be a key to any federal charges, a law enforcement official said. The website was registered in February under Mr. Roof's name, but the name was made anonymous the following day.

In cases involving violations of both state and federal law, the Justice Department often refrains from bringing federal charges, particularly when suspects face long state prison sentences. But South Carolina does not have a hate crimes law, and federal investigators believe that a murder case alone would leave the racial component of the shooting unaddressed.

"This directly fits the hate crime statute. This is exactly what it was created for," one law enforcement official said.

The law enforcement officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak publicly about the investigation. They said no decision had been made on the timing of the charges because many details remained unresolved, such as how federal charges would supplement the state case.

Emily Pierce, a Justice Department spokeswoman, said the federal investigation was continuing. Attorney General Loretta E. Lynch said last week that, "We will do everything in our power to help heal this community and make it whole again."

Two federal public defenders in South Carolina have also been assigned to defend Mr. Roof, a sign that federal charges are expected. That development was first reported by The Post and Courier.

"I have no choice," read a portion of the 2,500-word manifesto posted online. "I am not in the position to, alone, go into the ghetto and fight. I chose Charleston because it is most historic city in my state, and at one time had the highest ratio of blacks to Whites in the country. We have no skinheads, no real KKK, no one doing anything but talking on the internet. Well someone has to have the bravery to take it to the real world, and I guess that has to be me."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

State workers removed a Confederate battle flag Wednesday from the grounds of the Alabama State Capitol in Montgomery. Credit Martin Swant/Associated Press

The site also showed 60 photographs, including one of Mr. Roof holding a Confederate flag in one hand and a handgun in the other. Other photos of Mr. Roof appeared to have been taken at Confederate heritage sites and slavery museums.

Analysts at the F.B.I. laboratory in Quantico, Va., are also analyzing a computer and phone that Mr. Roof had used, officials said. The agents and analysts are piecing together Mr. Roof's communications and uncovering any information that may have been deleted.

When federal and state prosecutors each bring charges, they typically coordinate their cases so one does not undermine the other. The death penalty could be a factor. South Carolina's murder law carries a possible death sentence, while a violation of the federal hate crime law carries up to life in prison. Nikki Haley, the governor of South Carolina, has called for Mr. Roof to face the death penalty.

Historically black churches have long been targets for racial violence. One of the most notorious examples was the 1963 bombing of the 16th Street Baptist Church in Birmingham, Ala. The Ku Klux Klan set off a bomb under the steps of the church, which was a center of the African-American community at the time. Four young girls were killed and more than 20 other people were injured.

With memorial services beginning Wednesday for victims of last week's massacre, the campaign to remove long-venerated Confederate symbols from public grounds in the South picked up momentum on Wednesday.

Gov. Robert Bentley of Alabama ordered four Confederate flags taken down from a monument to Confederate soldiers outside the state Capitol in Montgomery.

"He does not want the flags to be a distraction from other state issues so he ordered them removed," said Yasamie R. August, the governor's press secretary.

Senator Roger Wicker of Mississippi joined other officials in urging a redesign of his state's flag, the last to still include the Confederate battle flag,an image many see as a symbol of slavery and oppression.

"As the descendant of several brave Americans who fought for the Confederacy, I have not viewed Mississippi's current state flag as offensive," he said. "However, it is clearer and clearer to me that many of my fellow citizens feel differently and that our state flag increasingly portrays a false impression of our state to others."

Crowds began gathering at the South Carolina State House in Columbia to pay respects to one victim of the Charleston shootings, the Rev. Clementa C. Pinckney, a state senator, who will lie in state there beginning Wednesday. The first of the funeral services, for Sharonda Coleman-Singleton and Ethel Lance, will be Thursday.

The memorial to Senator Pinckney came two days after Governor Haley called on lawmakers to remove the battle flag from the Capitol grounds, and a day after both houses of the state's General Assembly voted overwhelmingly to take up the matter. Alabama's governor concluded that he could remove the flags there on his own authority, but in South Carolina, the battle flag's position near a Confederate monument was enshrined in law in 2000, so a new law would be needed to remove it.

In past generations, while blacks and liberal whites have objected to government displays of Confederate pride, particularly a battle flag that has been embraced by white supremacists, southern conservatives have often defended them as symbols of heritage, not bigotry.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But in recent days, many Republicans like Mr. Bentley, Mr. Wicker and Ms. Haley have joined the sudden groundswell of officials calling for removal of Confederate flags and statues, and the rechristening of places named for Confederate heroes. Some conservatives have said that the Charleston shooting had changed their views.

Trade battle ends as Dems wills supports workers aid bill // Politico // Lauren French and John Bresnahan – June 24, 2015

The trade battle is over.

Democrats have labored for weeks to stop President Barack Obama's request for expedited authority to negotiate trade deals but now that a fast track is all-but-ready to become law, even the most ardent trade critics are reversing course and backing a bill designed to help workers who lose their jobs because of globalization.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) announced Wednesday that she planned to vote in favor of the bill. Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) and Vice Chairman of the Democratic Caucus Joe Crowley (D-N.Y.) also announced their support — signaling that the aid bill will pass, despite weeks of drama within the Democratic caucus over trade.

The legislation, called Trade Adjustment Assistance, got jammed up in the legislative process as Democrats tried to stop fast track earlier this month — even though progressives have long supported the aid bill.

But that opposition appears to be clearing. At a closed-door Democratic meeting on Wednesday, lawmakers that led the opposition movement against fast track pledged to support TAA, which has been attached to a bill focused on trade in Africa.

Rep. Sandy Levin (D-Mich.), the top Democrat on the Ways and Means Committee, told reporters after the caucus meeting that it makes no sense to oppose TAA now that pro-trade Democrats and Republicans are on the verge of sending fast track to Obama's desk.

"The vast majority of Democrats are going to vote for TAA and I think so because TAA was being used as a bargaining chip for TPA and that's why we very much resisted but now TPA is going to become law," Levin said. He added that Democratic opposition to trade will now turn to the Trans-Pacific Partnership, a massive 12-country trade deal between the U.S. and Pacific Rim countries.

Rep. Rosa DeLauro (D-Conn.), who led the charge against fast track in the House, also announced that she planned to support the aid bill, which is expected to come to the House for a vote Thursday after the Senate passes the measure this week.

In reversal, Wicker calls for removal of Mississippi Confederate flag // Politico // Burgess Everett – June 24, 2015

Sen. Roger Wicker (R-Miss.) reversed himself on Wednesday and called for the removal of the Mississippi's state flag, which contains a depiction of the Confederate flag.

As of Monday, Wicker, who leads the GOP's Senate campaign arm, was deferring to his state's legislature and citizens on the matter. But on Wednesday he issued now says that the "stage flag should be put in a museum and replaced by one that is more unifying to all Mississippians."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“As the descendant of several brave Americans who fought for the Confederacy, I have not viewed Mississippi’s current state flag as offensive. However, it is clearer and clearer to me that many of my fellow citizens feel differently and that our state flag increasingly portrays a false impression of our state to others,” Wicker said. “The flag should be removed since it causes offense to so many of my brothers and sisters, creating dissention rather than unity.”

Conservative commentator Rush Limbaugh speaks during a secretive ceremony inducting him into the Hall of Famous Missourians on Monday, May 14, 2012, in the Wicker joins a swelling bipartisan chorus of officials now calling from removal of the Confederate flag from statehouses and license plates after nine black people were shot and killed in South Carolina. However, the GOP senator also said Wednesday that the ultimate decision is up to the state legislature, not officials in Washington. Mississippi’s state House Speaker Phillip Gunn said flag needs to be removed and urged the state to debate the matter.

Mississippi’s senior senator, Republican Thad Cochran, hasn’t joined the burgeoning effort to remove the flag. Cochran said in an interview this week that the flag shouldn’t be changed “just because it’s creating controversy in other states.”

“It’s up to the state legislature to decide which flags adorn the state capitols. So I’m not trying tell them what to do or how to do it,” Cochran, who was recently reelected in a divisive primary against a conservative state senator who removing the flag, said on Monday. His office did not immediately say whether he agreed with Wicker’s change of position.

Conservative Groups Bracing Republicans for Obamacare Ruling // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur – June 24, 2015

Republican tensions over Obamacare rose Tuesday after Heritage Foundation President Jim DeMint ramped up pressure on the party not to extend health insurance subsidies—even temporarily—that the Supreme Court could erase within days.

In an op-ed titled "Let the subsidies die," the former senator and conservative kingmaker took aim at Republicans who are eyeing a backup plan that temporarily preserves the subsidies to avoid massive disruptions and loss of coverage for millions of Americans.

"It would be uncaring and unfair for Congress to force taxpayers to continue funding Obamacare's subsidies," DeMint wrote in the Washington Examiner. "Extending the subsidies would be political malpractice, not just a mere Band-Aid upon an infected wound." He argued that it would be "far better" to simply repeal the entire law.

The essay throws an intriguing wrinkle into the congressional politics surrounding the imminent Supreme Court decision, which recently has seen Republican opponents of the health care law scrambling to come up with answers for an estimated 6 million Americans likely to lose health insurance tax credits if the justices rule against the Obama administration. A decision in the much-watched case, King v. Burwell, is expected in the next few days.

DeMint's missive could give some of them pause. The outspoken South Carolinian occupies a bully pulpit as the head of the Heritage Foundation, a conservative brain trust with an active political arm, Heritage Action For America.

Dan Holler, a spokesman for Heritage Action, dropped a broad hint that there could be political consequences for Republican lawmakers who try to create a subsidy patch. "It will be difficult for a Republican to go home and explain how saving a key plank of Obamacare helps ensure Obamacare is repealed in 2017," Holler said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In addition, a DeMint-founded super-PAC has specialized in taking aim at Republicans it deems insufficiently conservative. In the 2014 election cycle, the Senate Conservatives Fund spent more than $7 million helping favored candidates—and torpedoing those out of favor, according to figures compiled by the non-partisan Center for Responsive Politics.

Ken Cuccinelli, the president of Senate Conservatives Fund, was blunt about threatening to support primary challenges against Republican lawmakers who back an extension of Obamacare subsidies.

A Not-So-Veiled Threat

"If the Supreme Court strikes down the Obamacare subsidies and mandates, Republicans in Congress should not extend them," Cuccinelli told Bloomberg in a statement. "Republicans should fight for full repeal, as they promised time and time again. SCF supports conservative candidates and a lawmaker's position on Obamacare is one of the most important issues we will examine when deciding whether to support a primary challenger."

But the potential political consequences of not backing subsidies also are worrying to Republicans, who don't want to be blamed for millions of Americans losing their coverage. At issue in King v. Burwell is whether the text of the Affordable Care Act restricts premium tax credits to Americans enrolled through state-run insurance exchanges, rather than those in three-quarters of states who use the federal exchange. Many Republicans have called on the Supreme Court to void the subsidies; the White House and Democrats say the law clearly makes those subsidies available in all 50 states.

Republican Senator Ron Johnson of Wisconsin, who faces a tough reelection fight next year, is the author of a bill with 31 cosponsors that would extend the subsidies if the Supreme Court overturns them.

"Obviously I disagree with Senator DeMint's position on that," Johnson said in an interview Tuesday. "My main goal is to make sure no Americans are further harmed by this sloppily written—and what would be then unlawfully implemented—law. And I think we have a responsibility to do that."

A Tricky Rhetorical Balance

Senator John Barrasso of Wyoming, the leader of the Republican effort to craft a contingency plan, responded to the criticisms Tuesday. "We are not going to protect the law," he said. "We are going to protect people."

Republican senators in blue and purple states—Susan Collins of Maine, Kelly Ayotte of New Hampshire, and Rob Portman of Ohio—told Bloomberg they support a temporary subsidy extension. Like Johnson, Ayotte and Portman face potentially difficult reelection races in 2016.

"I do support taking care of those people, including almost 200,000 people in Ohio who are getting subsidies under our federal exchange," Portman said, adding that "there's different views on the length of time" to keep the subsidies.

Presidential Candidates

Standing against a subsidy extension are two senators running for president. Both, like DeMint, are ideological purists. Senator Ted Cruz of Texas told Politico this month that the "best legislative option is to allow states to opt out" of Obamacare. Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky told the paper he wants a new law that would "legalize inexpensive insurance policies."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Of the two other presidential candidates, Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina has signaled support for a subsidy extension by signing on to Johnson's bill. Senator Marco Rubio of Florida has been mum on the subsidies, calling for a "transition to a replacement" for Obamacare; his office referred Bloomberg to a recent op-ed in which he sketched out broader health care changes he wants to see.

Other Republican senators—including Cory Gardner of Colorado and Thad Cochran of Mississippi—declined to say if they would support a subsidy extension.

"I'm not that closely involved in the minutiae that you are," Cochran, the chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, told Bloomberg. He added, "I'll consider my vote very carefully before I cast it." Last year, Cochran narrowly beat back a Republican primary challenge from Chris McDaniel, a candidate endorsed and underwritten by the Senate Conservatives Fund.

There are competing proposals—one by Senator Ben Sasse of Nebraska and another Bill Cassidy of Louisiana—to offer fallback options for those who lose their subsidies.

Republican leaders in the House and Senate last week presented a contingency plan to members, based on Johnson's bill, to ease disruptions if the Supreme Court grants them their wish and guts the Affordable Care Act.

Unravelling Obamacare

According to a senior House Republican aide, it would allow the law's subsidies to continue through 2015, while repealing the individual mandate to buy insurance and the requirement that large employers provide it. In 2016, the proposal would let states opt out of Obamacare's regulations and instead receive a "block grant" equal to the amount of subsidies coming in their direction. It would also push the next president to take on the task of replacing Obamacare in 2017. The aide said the plan wasn't final.

It's far from clear Republicans will be able to pass such a plan, and DeMint's new push further complicates that task. Outside conservative activists are working to portray any extension of subsidies as a vote in favor of Obamacare, which further dims the prospects in the House, where many Republicans are already cold to the idea.

To that end, Representative Paul Gosar of Arizona last week introduced a bill ahead of the Obamacare ruling that would eliminate insurance regulations—including mandates on benefit coverage mandates and premium levels—in states that might lose their subsidies. The bill, which currently has six co-sponsors, was hailed by DeMint on Tuesday as preferable to extending the subsidies.

"With the verdict of King v. Burwell looming, the healthcare reform conversation has focused on the fate of federal subsidies for insurance premiums initiated by the Affordable Care Act," Gosar said in a statement. "However, this puts the focus on the symptoms of our ailing healthcare system and ignores the root cause."

Unlikely to Become Law

Even if the Republican-led Congress were able to pass its emerging proposal, President Barack Obama has made clear he will veto any bill that undermines core components of Obamacare, such as a repeal of the individual mandate. In other words, it's extremely unlikely to become law, and serves mostly as a political vehicle to spread blame for the chaos that could result from a Supreme Court decision.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Privately, some Republican aides who work on health policy confess that they'd prefer to see the subsidies upheld, seeing few, if any, options to get a health care bill past Obama's desk and fearful their party will be blamed for the fallout.

The Supreme Court is set to deliver the final decisions of its term on Thursday, Friday and Monday—it's unclear which day the Obamacare decision will come, or how the justices will rule. The House has canceled votes on Friday and Congress is scheduled to be out of session next week for July 4 recess.

INTERNATIONAL

The Many Miseries of Yemeni Families // NYT // Hanna Ingber - June 24, 2015

As the civil war in Yemen continues, many families say they are living in constant fear. Parents say that their older children have been wetting their beds at night, and that younger ones are so traumatized that they are sent running for cover by the sound of a door slamming.

The fighting between Houthi rebels and Saudi-backed government forces has displaced a million people, destroyed cultural heritage sites and terrorized the population. The situation has worsened since a Saudi-led bombing campaign began in March, and a de facto blockade has caused shortages of food and fuel for many of the nation’s 26 million people.

The New York Times asked Yemenis and their relatives abroad how their families have been affected by the worsening conflict. Close to 350 people submitted responses in English and Arabic. Most said they needed food, fuel, electricity — and an end to the fighting. Many wrote that it has been civilians who have suffered.

“The airstrikes target civilian places, and so there is nowhere safe now,” wrote Hani Yahya who lives in Sana, the capital, with his extended family. “We basically might die any day, and if we don’t, we will just suffer.”

They described destruction to cities they love and their own homes, airstrikes shattering their windows and blowing out doors. Some have tried to make repairs. Others said the damage to their houses and the continuous fear of bombings had forced them to leave.

Uprooted, Yemenis wrote that they had moved in with extended family members or friends. One man described how all the young cousins hide in the basement of their house. And even the safer areas, they wrote, still face shortages.

Families have also been divided, with some members fleeing the country. Others have tried to flee, but have been stopped. A young woman said she and her husband had taken their baby boy and made two trips to the border. Once they were turned away by the Saudis, and once by the Houthis.

Yemenis said they felt ignored, and they pleaded for those outside of the country to pay attention.

The following is a selection of the responses, expanded in additional interviews, and edited and condensed for clarity.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Helmi al-Hamadi, 39, originally from Taiz in southern Yemen, has been living in Sana since 1997. He has three children, and his wife is seven months pregnant.

My 6-year-old daughter is the most affected person in the family. She can't sleep, always alert to any sounds; even the sound of a door closing terrifies her. If a door slams, she thinks it's an attack on us or an airstrike. She is losing weight. If anyone wants to go outside, if I have to go get groceries, she says: "I don't want to lose you, father. I don't want you to die."

They have been out of school since March 26. When the airstrikes started, everything kind of stopped here. None of the residents of Sana can go to school.

My pregnant wife is in a bad condition, especially, because she is diabetic and at risk that we could run out of insulin at anytime. She can't receive proper medical care.

My children wish that they could go back to school; my pregnant wife dreams of a peaceful night to sleep without one of our children screaming in their sleep every time there is an airstrike. I pray every day that when I go to the markets I can still find food for my family; this is decreasing on a daily basis.

Arwa Naaman Saiid, 23, is a teacher and information technology student. Her family fled a rented house in Sana and moved to Taiz and then to the village of Moaser.

The children in our family are terrified even by the sound of thunder, thinking it is from airplanes coming to bomb them. Their fear and continued crying forced us to leave our house. We paid $50 per person to leave Sana. I sold my jewelry just to escape.

We have been affected materially, morally and psychologically because of airstrikes and earthshaking explosions that prevent us from sleeping.

We are six members in the same house, including my sick mother who broke her back more than two months ago. We couldn't afford paying her treatment expenses. Now she's home and can't move. We have no food, no potable water, no electricity. We are denied the most basic rights.

We need to put an end to this flagrant aggression. We need the blockade to be lifted. Leave us alone! We are not associated with any political party. We are just Yemeni citizens. We need to be able to sleep, to eat and to drink what God bestowed upon us, without blockade and without killings.

Maali Jamil, 25, moved to Michigan as a young child before returning to Yemen as a teenager. She and her husband, who were both working as English teachers in Sana before the airstrikes began in March, have a 2-month-old son, Yusuf.

My husband and I let our apartment go because all the windows shattered in the Faj Attan bombing. And since we are now both unemployed, rent was too high, so we're living with family. My 9-year-old cousin vomits when the explosions are too loud.

With the problems and everything, nobody is working. Everybody is at home. Who is going to pay for classes? It's not important right now. People need to eat.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

My father has heart disease and is very ill. Every few days, he needs to run some blood work so the doctor can adjust his dose. When there is no fuel, he cannot go. If there is fuel, but no power, the labs don't operate. When he doesn't get the blood work done, the doctor can't adjust the dose, so my mom is usually at a loss and ends up guessing what he needs.

We tried to leave and were stranded at the Yemeni-Saudi border near Haradh twice, once for five days and once for two days.

The Yemeni people are barely breathing. My family and I are doing really well compared with most Yemenis.

My mom is from Aden, and the horror stories we hear are heartbreaking. One of my mother's cousins says all they have to eat is cookies. Her children keep asking her when are they are going to have real food, and she just broke down and cried.

Hussam Alshami, 37, lives in Sana with his wife, their daughter and his extended family.

My 2-year-old daughter is oversensitive to any sound now, running to hug anyone in front of her when hearing even a door knock. Some other children in my family now urinate while sleeping.

Despite almost every glass in our house having broken, we stay and will stay. We have no other choice. We've been raised in Sana. We don't know another place to live. And moving would cost money that's not available at this time. But more than money, we love Sana very, very much!

We have only one hour of electricity every three to five days. On the other hand, airstrikes are horrible, indiscriminate. More painful is that the world keeps silent.

Feel our pain, because Saudi Arabia cannot do this to us unless you, the United States, allow it. The blockade must be lifted. Airstrikes must be stopped.

Tarad Abdul Aziz Ahmad al-Samawy lives in Sana in a house with 29 other people, including 15 children ages 2 to 10.

Our children are overwhelmed with fear when they hear airplanes. They cry continuously when they hear the sounds of antiaircraft guns. Sometimes we convince them that there is a wedding outside.

The war is choking us financially at the individual level and for all Yemenis. Our neighbors can't find food. We offer them some from time to time. All of Yemen is living under siege.

Lift the Saudi sea blockade of Yemen because trade is the source of income for many Yemenis.

Rawan S. al-Aghbari, 22, was born in Yemen and raised in London. An explosion in Sana in mid-April badly injured her brother and destroyed their home. She returned to Yemen last month to help him get out of the country for treatment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

During the explosion he was inside the house trying to repair a window. The explosion ripped off the top half of the house, and parts of the window cut through his neck. There were shards everywhere; he was bleeding extensively. He basically flew from one side of the room to the other, and he had a concussion. He couldn't form proper sentences. He wasn't in good health, so we wanted to get him out.

At the time there was no electricity and barely any generators running for the hospitals. Generators need fuel, and there was practically none at that time. There were fuel lines that would extend for kilometers.

Yemen is suffering from a myriad of problems. At the front line are ordinary civilians, who are paying the price for this unforgiving war.

Hani Yahya lives in Sana with his extended family. He was working for an international democracy-building organization, but the fighting forced it to shut down. He is now unemployed.

We live in fear all the time. There is no electricity. No fuel. Food is becoming scarce, and prices are increasing.

I managed to get my wife and two children out to Egypt after the Faj Attan attack. But my nephews and nieces are still here, and all of them are affected.

They keep asking: "When will this end? Why do they want to kill us?" They are wetting their beds at night; they are depressed all the time and want to leave the country.

I speak to my daughter every day in Egypt. She wants to go back home. When she is in Egypt, she keeps asking, "When will this end?" They just don't understanding why this is happening. We just tell them: "We pray it will end soon. We pray to God that it will be over."

Mahdy Abdul Hakeem Mahdy Saleh al-Mutairy is from the western coastal city of Al Hudaydah.

We are terrified and suffered the tragic loss of life of members of our family. My cousin was 23 years old when he died; he was a student. He was walking in the street when jets bombed the area. Dozens of bodies were found on that day.

We don't have electricity because of the siege, but the hospital is still functioning and receiving patients, especially those suffering from dialysis, from other provinces. But I'm concerned that the only hospital here might close soon if this siege and blackout continue.

What we need is for the bombing to stop and the blockade to be lifted so that shipments of food, medicine and petrol products could be brought into the country.

Fuad Shaif Ali al-Kadas runs a tour company in Sana. He lost thousands of dollars in plane tickets after a tourist group canceled an April trip. After the area near his home was bombed, he moved in with his extended family in another area of Sana.

Even if the war ends soon, and if tourists come back, I don't know if we can refund this large sum. So my business is defunct. One brother works in the airport — he's lost his job. Another brother works in an area constantly bombed by the Saudis — Faj Attan — and he now has lost his job. So while my family is alive and well, thank God, we, like most people, are struggling and out of work.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Imagine if this continues and we'll have an entirely uneducated generation. Plus when the planes fly overhead, or children hear the airstrikes, they cry, and they can't sleep at night. Now, if a father wants his kids to do something, he says, "Go or I'll call the planes," and they move right away.

Assaad Lutf Albarty and his family, who live in Sana, have been affected by the shortages of food, fuel and medicine. His father has not been able to secure his blood pressure medication or get the treatment he needs. He is hoping to travel to Jordan for heart surgery.

Many times we live without electricity for days or weeks. There is a lack of gasoline, which is used for transportation, and diesel, which is used to transport goods and operate factories. We have returned to the Stone Ages by using firewood and charcoal to cook at home. I'm not exaggerating — we're doing this on a daily basis.

We can't get water without electricity or diesel, and we can't get the basic things such as flour and wheat, because of the inability to distribute them to consumers and our inability to go to distribution centers. Also because of the blockade, no merchants can import any new food, fuel or medicines.

Bakil Muttee Ghundol had been taking a course in teaching English in Aden, but he moved to Ibb, where his family lives, shortly before the airstrikes began.

Hundreds of displaced families from different cities come to Ibb because it's considered a safe place as there are no airstrikes as there are in Aden, Sana or Taiz. But all the people here in Ibb are suffering as there is a huge lack of fuel, water and food. In addition, the electricity has been cut off for months. Only rich people have generators. Sometimes we go to their homes to charge our phones, our laptops.

My family is all safe, but some neighbors were killed in an airstrike. One was a close friend of my brother.

Hanan Ahmed al-Mansor, 23, attends Jinan University in China. Her immediate family is still in Sana, but her extended family managed to escape to Egypt.

Far from everything, I am still affected as badly as my family. I've had sleepless nights, nightmares, continuous anxiety and multiple visits to the doctor. My academic level has dropped, and every day, I am either crying or senseless.

My mother is my superhero. She has worked her way through a couple of failed businesses, but she finally was able to stand on her own two feet in her mid-50s and created a successful restaurant in Yemen. This restaurant was recently completely damaged after an airstrike hit a building in front of it. Our dream and our only way to eat and live with dignity was shattered. All I can think of now is, how am I going to finish university?

The children in my family sleep covering their ears. They only speak of how much they fear death, and one of them told his mom: "I want to die before you. I don't want to see you die." And, "In heaven, can I ask for a TV to watch you because I'm going to miss you?"

My cousin told me this about her kids. She was writing and crying at the same time. It's very hard for me to keep in touch with my family since they usually only open the generator for emergencies, like to pump the water to the pipes. However, I buy calling cards to call them in emergencies, and if they have battery left, they respond.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I need to sleep knowing that I'll wake up and my family is safe. I need Saudi Arabia to leave Yemen alone.

No bailout deal yet for Greece as meeting cut short // AP // Derek Gatopoulos and Raf Casert - June 24, 2015

BRUSSELS — Crucial talks between Greece and its creditors to keep the country solvent and within the euro currency group became bogged down again Wednesday amid differences over what kind of reforms the country should make in exchange for loans.

The impasse forced euro-zone finance ministers to cut short a meeting, which they plan to resume Thursday. Concern over the lack of progress weighed on financial markets, with stock indexes falling in the United States, where trading was still going on.

Earlier in the day, Greek Prime Minister Alexis Tsipras held long talks with key creditors, but the sides argued again over the nature of the reforms Greece should undertake if it is to secure loans.

Greece has promised mainly tax increases to achieve budget savings, whereas the International Monetary Fund would like more spending cuts. Tsipras rejected the creditors' new suggestions, saying they put both sides further away from a deal.

"The Greek side is unable to agree on such a course," a Greek government official said after Tsipras assessed the proposals, which included fresh cuts in public-sector payrolls and a timetable to scrap a pension safety-net fund.

What you need to know about the Greek debt crisis

Greece may default on its debts if a deal for more funding in exchange for fiscal reforms is not made. Here's why that matters. (Jorge Ribas/The Washington Post)

"These are very tough negotiations," the official said. "But there is a common will to get somewhere." The official spoke on the condition of anonymity because the talks were ongoing.

Wednesday's meeting of finance ministers was meant to iron out the details on the reforms in time for leaders from the European Union to approve them at a summit they will hold Thursday. The finance ministers will meet again only hours before the summit.

After the ministers broke up their meeting, Tsipras again went into meetings with European and IMF top officials.

Greece has a $1.8 billion debt to pay Tuesday that it cannot afford unless the creditors unfreeze $8.1 billion in bailout money.

A Greek exit from the euro would be painful for the country. Some experts say it could be manageable for Europe and the world economy, but that remains unclear.

Elected on an anti-bailout platform in January, Tsipras's left-wing Syriza party had promised to scrap all austerity measures and demand forgiveness on a chunk of the country's bailout debt. Tsipras has had to partially backtrack on those pledges and now could have trouble persuading party lawmakers to back a new deal, which would have to be approved by Monday night.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Athens was forced into concessions by a punishing debt-repayment schedule and an economy gripped by troubles including a return to mild recession, ratings downgrades and a dramatic outflow of bank deposits that threatened to crash the country's financial system.

Greek Economy Minister Giorgos Stathakis said that so far, all sides had made concessions.

He said Greece had persuaded creditors to lower their demands for a primary surplus — the surplus when not counting interest payments on debt. As a result, that should help the Greek economy grow between 1 percent and 1.5 percent this year.

Meanwhile, Greece's banks remained under pressure as customers continued to withdraw money amid concerns over the country's financial future.

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS

Morning Plum: Hillary can't run from the trade debate forever // WaPo // Greg Sargent – June 24, 2015

Today the Senate is expected to cast the final vote granting President Obama "Fast Track" authority to negotiate the massive Trans-Pacific Partnership trade deal. With trade badly splitting Democrats, Hillary Clinton had avoided taking a meaningful position on Fast Track, only suggesting she might not support it if it didn't also include worker assistance (which may also move forward within days).

But if Clinton had hoped to leave the trade debate behind if Fast Track failed, its success now means she may have to take a position on the trade deal itself sooner or later.

Clinton's campaign has said that any trade deal must "put us in a position to protect American workers, raise wages and create more good jobs at home," and that the U.S. should "walk away from any outcome that falls short" of that. Obviously, this leaves room for Clinton to either support or oppose the deal later.

But if we do get a TPP, the debate will shift out of the process netherworld in which the Fast Track fight unfolded, and present us with specifics that can actually be evaluated in light of the test Clinton herself has articulated. Obama has vowed that the TPP will boost labor standards in participating countries like Vietnam, leveling the global playing field for American workers. But we still don't know what those standards will look like, and we still don't know how compliant with them such countries will be required to be before participating in the TPP.

Meanwhile, we still don't know what sort of "monopoly pricing power" the deal will contain for biologics, which some critics worry will amount to a giveaway to Big Pharma at the expense of global health. And we still have yet to see the details of the deal's mechanism for resolving disputes between international investors and other participating countries — which critics worry will give a special break to corporations that is denied to workers.

Clinton's camp is said to believe the trade debate will not create the lasting divisions among Dems that attended the Iraq debate. And some polling does indicate that there may not be rampant anger over it among Dem base voters.

But the calender here is worth considering. If a TPP deal is reached this summer, there will be months of debate over it until a Congressional vote next winter, when the primaries will be getting underway. Even if the Fast Track debate was a bitter defeat for the left, there may be another protracted opportunity to rally opposition. Bernie Sanders has already heaped scalding criticism on the deal in general, and he and other high profile Dems — such as Elizabeth Warren — will refocus their opposition on the deal's specifics, which will finally allow us to evaluate the deal's actual priorities. Clinton may have to address these specifics and priorities sooner or later.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Of course, if the deal is as good as Obama claims it will be, and the worst fears of the left look overblown in light of its details, Clinton may decide those specifics allow her to make a strong case for supporting it on the grounds that it comports with the test she articulated. And then things might get really interesting: we'd have a genuine Dem primary debate on our hands.

Hillary Clinton's dodginess is overpowering her message // WaPo // George F. Will – June 24, 2015

Hillary Clinton's reticence is drowning out her message, which is that she is the cure for the many ailments that afflict the United States during a second Democratic presidential term. Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) has called her "the most opaque person you'll ever meet in your life," but when opacity yields to the necessity of answering questions, here are a few:

Your first leadership adventure was when your husband entrusted you with health-care reform. Using a process as complex as it was secretive, you produced a proposal so implausible that a Democratic-controlled Congress would not even vote on it. Your legislation was one reason that in 1994 Democrats lost control of the House for the first time in 40 years. What did you learn from this futility and repudiation?

Three times in your memoir "Hard Choices" you say that as secretary of state you visited 112 countries. Do you think "peripatetic" is a synonym for "effective"? You tell readers that at a 2009 meeting with Chinese officials you said, "We need to build a resilient relationship that allows both of us to thrive and meet our global responsibilities without unhealthy competition, rivalry or conflict." Does it trouble your environmental conscience that trees died to produce the paper on which you recycled that thought?

President George W. Bush said that when he looked into Vladimir Putin's eyes he saw a "very straightforward and trustworthy" man. You looked into Putin's regime and saw an opportunity for a cooperative policy "reset." Were you or was Bush more mistaken?

In March 2003, Bush launched a war of choice to accomplish regime change in Iraq, mistakenly believing that it was developing weapons of mass destruction. In March 2011, Barack Obama and you launched a war of choice against Libya for the humanitarian purposes of preventing, it was said, as many as 10,000 deaths at the hands of Moammar Gaddafi. Since March 2011, in Syria, where the regime continues to use chemical weapons that it supposedly agreed to surrender, the civil war has killed more than 320,000. Why humanitarian intervention in Libya instead of Syria?

Bush sought, and you as a senator gave, approval for his war of choice. Obama and you, arguing that the thousands of airstrikes that killed thousands of Libyans did not constitute "hostilities," never sought approval for the Libyan war. Who was more lawful, Bush or Obama and you? What criteria suggest that the world is safer than before you became secretary?

In this month's Wisconsin Democratic convention straw poll, you defeated Bernie Sanders 49 percent to 41 percent. Sanders says he is a "socialist." Do you have fundamental differences with him? If not, are you a socialist? He does not think a 90 percent top income tax rate is too high. Do you? He says that "almost all of" the United States' wealth "rests in the hands of a handful of billionaires." Forbes magazine says the combined net worth of the United States' 536 billionaires is $2.566 trillion. Is it a grave problem that the 536 have 3 percent of the nation's $84.9 trillion wealth? Is it deplorable that the Waltons became a family of billionaires by creating Wal-Mart, the nation's largest private-sector employer? Do you regret that Apple products made Steve Jobs a billionaire? Are any of your however many phones iPhones?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders vows “to make tuition in public colleges and universities free.” Do you agree that the 68 percent of Americans without college degrees should pay the tuition for those whose degrees will bring them lifetime earnings significantly higher than the earnings of the noncollege graduates who will have paid much of the cost of the “free” tuition?

Another progressive goal is “debt-free college.” The average amount owed by the 69 percent of graduates with college debt is $28,400, which is $11,000 more than the difference between what a college graduate and a high school graduate earn in one year of employment. So, what exactly is the student debt “crisis”?

Sanders favors a $15 minimum wage. Do you? Why not $16? Democrats are — we know because they say so — respectful of science, including, presumably, economics. So, do you agree with Obama that ATMs and airport ticket kiosks cause unemployment?

Finally: Having said, “It is tempting to dismiss [the Charleston shooting] as an isolated incident,” you resisted that temptation and detected in the incident large social symptoms. Do you believe, as Obama now says, that racism is in America’s “DNA,” meaning it is encoded in our nation’s nature?

The Insiders: Hillary Clinton’s failure of diplomacy // WaPo // Ed Rogers – June 24, 2015

The Pentagon’s announcement that the United States will be sending troops to Europe – as well as additional stores of weapons and tanks – as part of a “reorientation of a NATO alliance” is the culmination of a series of foreign policy blunders. This is what failure of diplomacy looks like – and many of those failures can be laid at former secretary of state Hillary Clinton’s feet. She was the original architect of the Obama administration’s failed diplomacy with Russia. What started as a goofy botched photo-op declaring that U.S.-Russia relations would be “reset” has ended with the United States prepositioning weapons as a response to the growing possibility of war.

This isn’t a reorientation — this is a desperate move to try to impress Russian President Vladimir Putin, who has so far been unimpressed. After observing President Obama’s retreat from the “red line” he drew in Syria, the loss of Iraq, the losing of Afghanistan, the non-assistance to Ukraine and the quest to accommodate Iran’s nuclear program no matter what, Putin must be chuckling at this latest move by the Obama administration. There is no chance Putin believes any of the weapons being shipped overseas through this directive will ever be used to stop his intimidation, harassment and encroachment in Europe.

All the while, Americans have lost faith in our president’s ability to conduct foreign policy in a way that will keep our nation safe. An Economist/YouGov poll from last week shows that 50 percent of Americans disapprove of the president’s handling of foreign policy and only 35 percent approve. That’s not an outlier poll. Those numbers are about the same as the RealClearPolitics average on this issue.

So does any of this matter for Clinton’s election prospects? Will she pay a price for her failures as secretary of state or for the overall erosion of America’s national security posture during her party’s tenure?

Whatever foreign policy problems Obama and Clinton inherited when they came into office have obviously been made worse by their stewardship. I could be corrected, but our relationships appear worse everywhere. (Well, unless throwing in the towel and giving Cuba what every other president for the past 50-plus years refused to give the Castro regime counts as a success for America.)

Anyway, what will Clinton offer voters on the foreign policy front? Another reset? Will her defense of Obama and herself come with all manner of qualifiers and obfuscation? I guess the plan is to hope that some combination of Americans’ indifference and ignorance of foreign policy, along with some measure of denial and blame of George W. Bush, will allow her to skate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But I hope she doesn't get a free pass. It will be unfortunate if the 2016 campaign doesn't include a real debate about America's role in the world and an honest assessment of the problems that has grown in the last 6 1/2 years.

Can Hillary Clinton step forward on race without leaving white voters behind? // WaPo // Jannell Ross – June 24, 2015

When Hillary Clinton addressed an invitation-only group in Missouri on Tuesday, she repeated her call for work on American race relations to go far beyond a discussion about the future of the Confederate flag.

When she did, she affirmed what some of the nation's leading political prognosticators are beginning to say about Clinton's second bid for the White House. Clinton 2008 may have been leery of speaking overtly about gender, race or even the historic nature of her own campaign. But Clinton 2016 plans to put race and other issues of inequality front and center.

And with one group of strongly Democratic leaning voters -- African Americans -- that could help to rebuild the Obama coalition for Clinton. But Clinton, like every other candidate, also needs and wants white voters. They might be a shrinking part of the electorate, but they are still a strong majority of all voters and comprise many swing voters. So for candidate Clinton circa 2016, the question becomes just how far can she go on matters of race without running into the realpolitik of appealing to white voters.

A series of recent polls offer us some valuable clues.

Collectively, they point to an America deeply divided on matters related to race, such as faith that the police treat all Americans fairly and whether discrimination exists at all in other arenas. Both the share of black and white Americans concerned about the state of racial affairs in the United States is climbing, but even here a sharp divide remains. And these same polls indicate that Americans who lean left and have more education are far more likely to see some level of ongoing discrimination against people of color in American life than their more conservative, or less educated white peers.

Let's get down to the specifics.

Back in May -- four weeks but one apparently racially motivated mass shooting ago -- a CBS News/New York Times poll found 62 percent of whites feel that race relations are generally bad in this country and 65 percent of black Americans agreed. That's up considerably from the 35 percent of white Americans who said the same in in February.

So Americans agreed across racial lines that, when it comes to race, things are bad. Of course, that poll took place in the weeks after some of the details of Freddie Gray's fatal spinal cord injury while in police custody came to national attention, setting off protests and later riots in Baltimore.

And lest you think Americans emerged from May uniformly concerned about Gray and hundreds of others like him this year, consider this: In June, the share of Americans who told Gallup pollsters that race relations were the most important problem facing the country climbed from the sub-basement to the first floor of political concerns -- if American politics were a 30-story building.

One of the critical reasons for the difference between the share of black and white voters deeply concerned about race matters in the United States: Different perceptions of risk and unfair treatment.

In a December Washington Post/ABC News poll, a survey that took place before the events in Baltimore but after grand juries had refused to indict police officers in Ferguson, Mo., and New York City who killed unarmed black men, 63 percent of white Americans said they were somewhat or very confident that blacks and whites are treated equally by police. Only 10 percent of African-American respondents agreed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In that same poll, 42 percent of white Democrats and independents who lean left had confidence that police treat everyone fairly. But a whopping 78 percent of white Republicans said the same. And a full 55 percent of white Democrats who do not have college degrees told pollsters they were confident about police treatment, while just 25 percent of white Democrats with college degrees shared the same views.

The starkly different perceptions of discrimination do not stop there. In a 2013 Pew Research poll that asked respondents about discrimination in seven major areas of life, such as the criminal justice system, on the job, in schools, health care, voting and the experience of walking into a store or restaurant, half of white Americans told pollsters they do not believe that blacks face discrimination.

Half of white Americans do not see discrimination in health care despite a 2011 federal report that found significant differences in the quality of care provided to white and non-white patients. Half of white Americans do not believe that discrimination is a problem in voting despite studies showing that in the nation's two most recent federal elections black and Latino voters waited significantly longer than white voters in polling place lines because of the resources assigned to voting sites. Half of white Americans do not see discrimination in the job market despite a Princeton University study that suggests black applicants are less likely to be called for an interview.

What the Clinton camp should really find instructive here is the sharp difference in the way that Democrats and Republicans see race operating in the United States. About one-third of all Democrats reported seeing no discrimination in any area of American life, while a full 49 percent of independents and 61 percent -- way more than a majority -- of Republicans agreed.

So, what is Clinton 2016 to do?

If Clinton's public talk about race focuses largely on the South, she might not sacrifice much at all. That's because the South has been heavily Republican for some time. And despite the Republican Party's dominance in the region, Obama won election in 2008 and 2012 with comfortable margins after losing every Southern state except Florida.

And as we noted above, left-leaning white voters are more in-line with minority voters on issues of race than the broader white population -- though not completely.

But we also haven't seen a candidate press issues of race in an environment like the current one -- up to and including the first black president, Barack Obama.

It's surely a question that will keep the Clinton campaign busy.

Book Review – "The Hillary Doctrine: Sex & American Foreign Policy" // CFR // Micah Zenko – June 24, 2015

During her confirmation hearing to become secretary of state, Hillary Clinton told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in no uncertain terms, "I want to pledge to you that as secretary of state I view [women's] issues as central to our foreign policy, not as adjunct or auxiliary or in any way lesser than all of the other issues that we have to confront." A thoughtful and nuanced new book by Valerie M. Hudson and Patricia Leidl, The Hillary Doctrine: Sex & American Foreign Policy, evaluates to what extent Secretary Clinton has fulfilled this pledge.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Unsurprisingly, they find many examples where Clinton's rhetoric does not meet U.S. foreign policy reality. Rather than simply denounce the former secretary of state for this, they try to understand what explains this reoccurring disconnect. For example, the authors contend that a component of Clinton's hawkish support for intervening in Afghanistan, Iraq, and Libya was the belief that women's lives would be markedly improved. Hudson and Leidl disagree, noting, "Military action in and of itself against regimes violating human rights will not protect women. If anything, it unleashes new and usually even more vicious male-bonded groups intent on stripping them of even the most basic human rights." It is this sort of refreshing analysis that makes this book so important, and one that I highly recommend to anybody interested in elevating women's voices in world affairs, as well as the practicalities of day-to-day U.S. foreign policymaking.

The "doctrine" comes from a proposition that Clinton made at the TEDWomen Conference in December 2010: "The subjugation of women is, therefore, a threat to the common security of our world and to the national security of our country." In countries where women are chronically mistreated, or systematically excluded from leadership roles, there tends to be far greater state fragility, outbreaks and reoccurrences of conflict, and environments where extremists can flourish, including even terrorist organizations.

The quantitative and anecdotal evidence supporting Clinton's proposition has grown stronger over the past five years. For example, we now know that the participation of women's groups in peace negotiations increases the likelihood of reaching an agreement and implementing it, and the probability that it will last longer. When women were included in peace processes between 1989 and 2011, agreements were 20 percent more likely to last as long as two years, and 35 percent more likely to last fifteen years. Additionally, women's leadership and political participation enhances a community's ability to resist violent extremism, and women play the most critical family role in influencing young people who are susceptible to radicalization.

The first part of the book—based on interviews with government officials like Swanee Hunt, Andrew Natsios, Paula Dobriansky, and Melanne Verveer—consists of a helpful history of how women's issues became prominent in U.S. foreign policymaking during the 1990s. This included milestones like UN Security Council Resolution 1325, the first resolution to address the disproportionate and unique impact of armed conflict on women, as well as the role of women in conflict prevention and resolution; the publication of the first U.S. National Action Plan on Women, Peace, and Security; and the difficulties and haphazard manner that the military and USAID have experienced in incorporating women's issues into foreign operations. This is crystallized in an anecdote from Charlotte Ponticelli, the State Department's senior coordinator for international women's issues in the era after Iraqi President Saddam Hussein was toppled. Ponticelli received an email from an aide to Paul Bremer, director of the Coalition Provisional Authority: "If I gave you 15 minutes to tell me how you would spend $10 million on behalf of Iraqi women, could you send me an email in that 15 minutes?" Ponticelli quickly drafted something, sent it to Bremer's aide, and later received the $10 million.

The authors later struggle to square Clinton's "conspicuous silence" in the face of the brutal treatment of women by Saudi Arabia, or China's perpetration of sex-selective abortions among Tibetans. The authors write, "one possible interpretation is that the Hillary Doctrine is in fact merely a rhetorical stance on the part of U.S. foreign policy makers, including, apparently, Hillary Clinton herself—a position that may be jettisoned if its tenants would undermine 'real' American national interests in any particular case." The authors offer several potential explanations, including that Clinton expressing more public disapproval for the mistreatment of women might be counterproductive, draw unwanted attention to local NGOs, or result in current autocrats being replaced by worse and more backward-thinking leaders. However, the more plausible explanation comes from a quote provided by Verveer, who was Clinton's chief of staff and later led the development of the U.S. National Action Plan: "You know, they are sovereign nations under their own."

The authors later note that the most important and elusive ingredient for implementing the Hillary Doctrine "can only come from the White House itself." If a President Hillary Clinton is sworn into office on January 20, 2017, then there will be no more bureaucratic hurdles preventing the fuller implementation of the Hillary Doctrine. We would only learn if it is indeed a rhetoric, or the basis upon which U.S. foreign policy is developed and implemented.

Presidential wannabees ought to embrace, not fear, Hispanic conference in Kansas City // Kansas City Star // Mary Sanchez – June 23, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One would think that the Republican presidential candidates would clamor to appear in Kansas City at the national convention of the largest civil rights and advocacy organization for Latinos.

After all, the much ballyhooed Hispanic vote is the one to court, right?

That's what the GOP said. Mitt Romney captured only 27 percent of Hispanic voters in 2012. The statistical implosion caused Republicans to issue introspective papers on how the party needs to regain the 40 percent of the Latino vote totals that George W. Bush commanded in 2004.

But two weeks out from the July 11-14 National Council of La Raza's convention, former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley, a Democrat, is the only presidential candidate who has confirmed he will attend.

Most of the declared candidates cited scheduling conflicts as the rationale for saying no, although Hillary Clinton and Marco Rubio haven't completely shunned the possibility of showing up.

Here is the reason the Republicans will probably skip: The GOP candidates have to get past ultra-right primary voters. There is a fear of tea partiers, of being caught sounding reasonable on immigration.

What a pathetic, rudderless way to seek elected office. There is also the demographic reality of not enough Latino voters in key states.

Candidates could burnish their credentials by attending, not lessen them. Especially if they bear this in mind: As much as immigration dominates political discussions, polling repeatedly shows that it is not the top concern for Latinos. Education, jobs, health care and the economy are more regularly cited.

Jeb Bush would have the most to gain. He has held moderate views on immigration reform, he has a long history in Hispanic-heavy Texas and Florida, he is fluent in Spanish and his wife is from Mexico. Likewise, Rubio has had wide-ranging experiences outside his Cuban-American background in Miami, including a brief college stint in northwest Missouri and early school years in Las Vegas, a period that exposed him to Mexican-Americans.

Contrary to popularly exploited images, the vast majority of Latinos in the U.S. are native-born Americans. Nearly three in four are U.S. citizens.

"It's a surprise to me that they are reluctant to come and engage directly with the community," said Janet Murguía, president and CEO of NCLR.

The NCLR conference usually draws 10,000 to 20,000 people, depending on the city.

The presidential contenders' invitations, Murguía said, are still open.

Hillary Clinton, in a talk about race, hits a sour note // Kansas City Star // Steve Paul – June 24, 2015

Do black lives matter or do all lives matter?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That's a question left hanging disturbingly in the air after Hillary Clinton, the Democratic presidential contender, spoke at a Florissant, Mo., church on Tuesday. She made news by joining the call for removing the Confederate battle flag from the grounds of the South Carolina capitol, and for her sensitive and resonant reflection on the slaughter of nine innocent black souls in a historic Charleston, S.C., church: "Let us be resolved to make sure they did not die in vain — not to be overcome by evil, but to overcome evil with good."

But Clinton pushed some other buttons in a way that bears further examination.

The site of Clinton's speech, of course, is just down the road from Ferguson, where the fatal shooting of a black teenager by a white police officer erupted into street protests and launched a movement, linked by a Twitter hashtag, #blacklivesmatter.

That movement led to a backlash, especially among those who challenged what appeared to be a populist rush to judgment and who feared that white police officers don't get enough respect for putting themselves in harm's way. Thus: #alllivesmatter.

Here's the problem. Many people might assume that "all lives" includes "black lives." But if you're African American or have a real understanding of the course of America's shameful racial history, you know that for far too long and far too often "black lives" do not fully fit within the Venn diagram of "all lives." The hashtag #blacklivesmatter is meant to emphasize this point. It's not meant to suggest that other people's lives don't matter. It's a cry of civil rights. It's a chorus of "We Shall Overcome." It's a voice to stand up against the ache that blows in the wind among those Confederate flags.

So when Hillary Clinton faced a congregation of Florissant churchgoers, her intention was to talk frankly and smartly about race in the age of Ferguson, the era of Charleston and the nagging American struggle of identity.

"I know this is a difficult topic to talk about," she said. "I know that so many of us hoped by electing our first black president, we had turned the page on this chapter in our history. I know there are truths we do not like to say out loud or discuss with our children. But we have to."

So far so good. Then she made it personal.

"We should start by giving all of our children the tools and opportunities to overcome legacies of discrimination to live up to their own God-given potentials," Clinton said. "I just saw some of the young people attending camp here at church down in the basement. And I was thrilled to see that because that is the kind of commitment we need more of, in every church, in every place, until every child is reached. And I hope we can take that as a cause for action.

"I learned this not from politics but from my mother who taught me that everybody, everybody needs a chance and a champion. She knew what it was like to have neither one. Her own parents abandoned her. By 14, she was out on her own working as a house maid. Years later when I was old enough to understand, I asked her. What kept you going? Her answer was very simple. Kindness along the way from someone who believed she mattered. All lives matter."

There was faint applause. Then a Twitter storm. Clinton had stepped in it big time. ("All lives matter? Hillary...sit down now. You're embarrassing us" — this was one of the milder tweets by offended African Americans who weighed in.)

You would think that Clinton and her speech writers would have known how to parse the language of the moment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You would think they would have it down by now, this far into her second campaign for the presidency. But a nagging truth about Clinton lingers. She can come off as tone deaf. It's a sign of inauthenticity. And she needs to get a handle on it. A fleet-footed politician would have recovered instantly and voiced what the mostly African American audience before her would have expected to hear: Of course, black lives matter.

Words do matter. All words matter, even when it seems like, in the age of Twitter, words hardly matter any more at all.

When President Barack Obama voiced the N-word the other day, he knew exactly what he was doing and it was highly effective.

The conversation on race must continue. And it needs to take place in an atmosphere of respect and at decibel levels conducive to conversation. And people need to listen to one another and understand the meaning of their words and the meaning behind their words.

In a time of instant response, politicians are swiftly pilloried for slips of the tongue and rhetorical missteps. I know I can be guilty of hastily penning (old technology) the wrong word at the wrong time. But we expect more of those who would be our president. And in the minefield of racial politics, we can all agree that there is much work left to do, and many more lessons to learn.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Julius Genachowski" <julius@genachowski.com>
To:	vjarrett@habitat.com
Date:	11/6/2008 10:28:12 AM
Subject:	FW: my desire to help

Valerie – Larry Tribe sent me a copy of the email he sent you, with his idea for a White House position focusing on restoring constitutional governance – essentially undoing the Bush/Cheney damage. Sending to you in case you missed his original email in the flood I'm sure you're getting. Larry's a long-time enthusiastic supporter, as I'm sure you know…

Julius

From: Larry Tribe [mailto:larry@tribelaw.com]
Sent: Thursday, November 06, 2008 10:50 AM
To: Julius Genachowski
Subject: my desire to help
Importance: High

Hi Julius:

Wow! Wow!! How's that for articulateness?

As you'll see from my message below to Valerie, I've run out of language to describe my thrill at Barack's historic victory. I want to send the same message to you, hoping that you can help me help Barack.

I know you have your hands full during the transition, but I think the need I've identified is a real one, that I'm well suited to fill it, that my doing so would probably appeal to Barack, and that this shouldn't get put on a back-burner lest it get lost altogether.

I hope you agree and can do something to help make this happen.

With boundless congratulations and warm wishes,

Larry

From: Larry Tribe
Sent: Thursday, November 06, 2008 10:18 AM
To: 'Valerie Jarrett'
Cc: NOCHUCK@aol.com
Subject: how I can help
Importance: High

Good morning, Valerie:

The word "congratulations" is much too banal. The thrill hasn't remotely begun to wear off. I've never felt more hopeful about our political future. I want to dedicate all my talents and energies to helping Barack seize the arc of history. Nothing matters to me more. After this message, I've pasted in a short piece I published in Forbes.com (which appeared yesterday as the first item on www.realclearpolitics.com) that puts in personal terms how I felt yesterday.

When I saw Barack and Michelle briefly in the "surrogates" tent after Barack delivered his remarkable speech, he told me he had read my email (of several days earlier) offering to assist with legal/constitutional issues in whatever role he wanted me to play, and he indicated he'd want to take me up on that offer in some way.

I don't know, of course, whether Barack was just being sweet or whether he had something serious in mind. Given all the things on his plate at the moment, I can't expect him to focus personally on how I in particular could be most useful, so I'm reaching out to you (and am copying Tree) so that my interest and availability can be put on the relevant radar screens while the transition proceeds.

To cope with the challenge of restoring constitutional governance in light of all the damage the Bush/Chaney administration has done to the separation of powers and the rule of law, and to do so while his administration necessarily focuses its energies on such urgent matters as the economic crisis, Iraq, and Afghanistan/Pakistan, I think President Obama will need more than simply a White House Counsel's Office, which of necessity focuses on the President and his conduct of the chief executive's position, and more than simply an OLC in the Justice Department, which of necessity focuses on the Attorney General's direction of DOJ. To cope with the cross-cutting matters this challenge entails, I think the administration could benefit from a tightly-knit White House advisory apparatus touching on both domestic and international issues and overlapping the jurisdictions of DOJ and DOD, among other executive departments and agencies.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The group charged with this legal mission would address such related matters as the Bush/Chaney administration's abusive employment of "signing statements" predicated on bloated views of executive authority and improperly narrow views of congressional power; the difficult issues posed by the need to close the legal black hole at Guantanamo and figuring out what to do with the detainees there; deciding how to allocate responsibility between the civilian justice system and the military justice system in coping with terror-related offenses; considering various officials' possible accountability for torture and other violations committed in the recent past; replacing current uses of "enhanced interrogation" techniques with approaches more respectful of human rights; coping with the tradeoffs between security and liberty involved in electronic surveillance and other preventive techniques; rooting out the improper use of partisan considerations in the appointments process throughout the government; and otherwise rebuilding the constitutional framework. It seems evident that many of these matters overlap the responsibilities of, for example, DOJ and DOD.

One of the ways I think I might be most useful would be as an Assistant to the President heading up such a White House group, whose work might well be concluded within a year or two but might need to extend throughout the first term. Of course I'd also be prepared to take on any other and longer mission that Barack might want to assign to me and would certainly be willing to take as long a leave from Harvard as such a mission would demand.

Among other things, I'd be honored to serve as Barack's White House Counsel or even to take on a role requiring Senate confirmation, such as Solicitor General or Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Office of Legal Counsel, but I've been assuming that Barack already has others in mind for those more conventional posts, and I don't feel any need for the glitter that accompanies them or any eagerness to go through the confirmation process that they entail.

The main point I want to underscore is my eagerness to serve. Should it be helpful to talk in person, I'm still in Chicago following the events in Grant Park and will be here through Saturday evening. I have a couple of speaking engagements here relating to my latest book, one on Friday night and one on Saturday night.

I can be reached by email or on my cell, 617-512-7018. I'll be returning to Boston on Sunday morning.

Good luck in all that the transition involves.
Larry Tribe

Laurence H. Tribe
Carl M. Loeb University Professor Harvard Law School
Hauser Hall 420
1575 Massachusetts Avenue
Cambridge, MA 02138
617-495-4621

Here's what appeared in Forbes.com yesterday:

I am watching the sun rise over Lake Michigan in the land of Lincoln on this new day in America. This is the morning after a great divide in the biography of the United States. As a nation, we have come of age. I flew to Chicago Tuesday afternoon to witness history as the United States of America went to the polls on Election Day, 2008. Hours later, as President-elect Barack Obama spoke in Grant Park to claim his victory before a great throng of supporters and an eagerly listening world last night, almost exactly forty years after the chaos of 1968, I felt myself in the flow of time, a minor participant in a great saga punctuated by events that shaped my life as it shaped the lives of so many others.

The year 1968 was, for me and most of my friends, a time of tragedy and disillusion. Through the years that followed, years punctuated by Watergate and Vietnam and by decades of political polarization and paralysis, politics was the game that disappointed. Yesterday it was the game that delivered. The work of governing lies ahead, but the sun is rising and the challenges we face - in reconstructing a broken economy, restoring a threatened Constitution, ending a misguided war and waging a necessary one, starting to heal a wounded planet - look from here like opportunities to be seized, not obstacles to be feared.

How different this feels from the crazy election of 2000, brought to an abrupt and puzzling end by the Supreme Court's ill-starred decision to stop counting the ballots, when another new President was installed to preside over a nearly dysfunctional country. Having served as counsel before the Court to the losing candidate during that sad chapter in our democratic trajectory, I returned to ordinary life but wondered when, if ever, I could fully believe in the process again.

As the decade progressed, the most impressive student I had ever taught was quietly pursuing his own political trajectory. In 1989 I had met Barack Obama and hired him as my research assistant while he was still just a first-year Harvard law student. His stunning combination of analytical brilliance and personal charisma, openness and maturity, vision and pragmatism, was unmistakable from my very first encounter with the future President.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I thought about that encounter as he and his wife Michelle each gave me a hug in one of the off-stage tents in Grant Park last night. I recalled it as I found myself unable to express in words my sense of gratitude and of possibility. The President-elect and the First Lady-designate both thanked me for the part I had played in Barack Obama's education and his rise to power, but it was I, of course, who owed thanks to them, thanks for the journey on which they had embarked to reclaim America for all who dare to hope.

There will be countless efforts to dissect their improbable path from that cold winter morning in Springfield nearly two years ago - when a still-new Senator from Illinois announced his candidacy for the highest office in the land - to the unseasonably warm evening in Chicago when that quest reached its climax and when those who had led it confronted the daunting challenges of actually governing. This is not another attempt at such dissection. Nor is this another post-mortem on the failed efforts of President-elect Obama's more than formidable foes. It is simply a personal note to commemorate a milestone in a great nation's history.

As an immigrant to the United States, born in Shanghai to Russian Jewish parents who brought me with them when they settled in California in 1947, I have always felt great pride both in that ancestry and in the gift of citizenship conferred on me by the nation that went on to provide me with such extraordinary opportunities to thrive and to give something back for all that I have been given. My pride in that citizenship has never been greater than it is today. Truth to tell, I find myself unable to stop smiling, just as last night I found it difficult to stop crying.

Barack Obama's unique ability to explain and to motivate, coupled with his signature ability to listen and to learn and linked with the calm that marked his nearly flawless campaign, will serve him
- and all of us
- well as we grapple with as daunting a set of problems as the nation has faced in three-quarters of a century.

It is of course true that only time will tell just how successful this brave, brilliant, and caring man will be in charting a new course for the country, something that will depend only partly on decisions that Obama will make as President. But one thing is already certain: The very fact of Barack Obama's election at this defining moment - quite apart from the programs he pursues and the ways in which he pursues them
- already speaks volumes to everyone on the planet. His election in and of itself displays how dramatically America has moved to transcend the divisions of its past and bids fair to give us a new lease on life in a world that had come, and not without reason, to see us in an awful light
- a world that will now give this nation a fresh look and a second chance.

The sun is now high over Lake Michigan. It is a new day in America. We can do this. Yes, we can.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jake Sullivan" <jake.sullivan@gmail.com>
To: "Robby Mook" <re47@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 4/19/2015 2:40:38 PM
Subject: Re: NYT: Book Questions Clinton Donations

Yes - but if we want to have her express skepticism we can do so through a spox answer to question, using our QA.

On Apr 19, 2015, at 9:19 PM, Robby Mook <re47@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

The enviros may latch onto this going forward. Have we discussed when she will come out against Keystone? After POTUS vetoes?

and more than $1 million in payments to Mr. Clinton by a Canadian bank and major shareholder in the Keystone XL oil pipeline around the time the project was being debated in the State Department.

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: Josh Schwerin <jschwerin@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: Sun, Apr 19, 2015 at 9:08 PM
Subject: NYT: Book Questions Clinton Donations
To: hrcrapid <HRCrapid@googlegroups.com >

Book Questions Clinton Donations

By AMY CHOZICK APRIL 19, 2015

http://www.nytimes.com/2015/04/20/us/politics/book-questions-clinton-donations.html?_r=0

The book does not hit shelves until May 5, but already the Republican Rand Paul has called its findings "big news" that will "shock people" and make voters "question" the candidacy of Hillary Rodham Clinton .

"Clinton Cash: The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich," by Peter Schweizer — a 186-page investigation of donations made to the Clinton Foundation by foreign entities — is proving the most anticipated and feared book of a presidential cycle still in its infancy.

The book, a copy of which was obtained by The New York Times, asserts that foreign entities who made payments to the Clinton Foundation and to Mr. Clinton through high speaking fees received favors from Mrs. Clinton's State Department in return.

"We will see a pattern of financial transactions involving the Clintons that occurred contemporaneous with favorable U.S. policy decisions benefiting those providing the funds," Mr. Schweizer writes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

His examples include a free-trade agreement in Colombia that benefited a major foundation donor's natural resource investments in the South American nation, development projects in the aftermath of the Haitian earthquake in 2010, and more than $1 million in payments to Mr. Clinton by a Canadian bank and major shareholder in the Keystone XL oil pipeline around the time the project was being debated in the State Department.

In the long lead up to Mrs. Clinton's campaign announcement, aides proved adept in swatting down critical books as conservative propaganda, including Edward Klein's "Blood Feud," about tensions between the Clinton and the Obamas, and Daniel Halper's "Clinton Inc.: The Audacious Rebuilding of a Political Machine."

But "Clinton Cash" is potentially more unsettling, both because of its focused reporting and because major news organizations are expected to pursue the story lines found in the book.

Members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee have been briefed about the book's findings, which have already made their way into several of the Republican presidential candidates' campaigns.

Conservative "super PACs" plan to seize on "Clinton Cash," and a pro-Democrat super PAC has already assembled a dossier on Mr. Schweizer, a speechwriting consultant to former President George W. Bush and a fellow at the conservative Hoover Institute, to make the case that he has a bias against Mrs. Clinton.

And the newly assembled Clinton campaign team is planning a full-court press to diminish the book as yet another conservative hit job.

Mr. Schweizer and a spokeswoman for HarperCollins, which is owned by News Corporation and is publishing the book, declined to comment.

The timing is problematic for Mrs. Clinton as she begins a campaign to position herself as a "champion for everyday Americans."

From 2001 to 2012, the Clintons' income was at least $136.5 million, Mr. Schweizer writes, using a figure previously reported in The Washington Post. "During Hillary's years of public service, the Clintons have conducted or facilitated hundreds of large transactions" with foreign governments, he writes. "Some of these transactions have put millions in their own pockets."

Continue reading the main story

The Clinton Foundation has come under scrutiny for accepting foreign donations while Mrs. Clinton served as secretary of state. Last week, the foundation revised its policy to allow donations from countries like Germany, Canada, the Netherlands and Britain but prohibit giving by other nations in the Middle East.

Mr. Schweizer's book will be released the same day former President Bill Clinton and the Clintons' daughter, Chelsea, will host the Clinton Global Initiative gathering with donors in Morocco, the culmination of a foundation trip to several African nations. (A chapter in the book is titled "Warlord Economics: The Clintons do Africa.")

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There is a robust market for books critical of the Clintons. The thinly sourced “Blood Feud,” by Mr. Klein, at one point overtook Mrs. Clinton’s memoir “Hard Choices” on the best-seller list.

But whether Mr. Schweizer’s book can deliver the same sales is not clear.

Mr. Schweizer writes mainly in the voice of a neutral journalist and meticulously documents his sources, including tax records and government documents, while leaving little doubt about his view of the Clintons.

His reporting largely focuses on payments made to Mr. Clinton for speeches, which increased while his wife served as secretary of state, writing that “of the 13 Clinton speeches that fetched $500,000 or more, only two occurred during the years his wife was not secretary of state.”

In 2011, Mr. Clinton made $13.3 million in speaking fees for 54 speeches, the majority of which were made overseas, the author writes. Among the connections he tries to draw is a $750,000 speaking fee to Mr. Clinton by the Swedish telecom company Ericsson and a State Department list of new sanctions on Iran that did not include telecom.

Mr. Schweizer, president of the Government Accountability Institute, is the author of the 2013 book “Extortion: How Politicians Extract Your Money, Buy Votes, and Line Their Own Pockets,” and “Throw Them All Out” about elected officials receiving insider stock tips.

--
Josh Schwerin
Spokesperson
Hillary for America
@Josh Schwerin

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com.
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To:	CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date:	12/9/2014 8:24:26 AM
Subject:	Correct The Record Tuesday December 9, 2014 Afternoon Roundup

Correct The Record Tuesday December 9, 2014 Afternoon Roundup:

Tweets:

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: "[@HillaryClinton] is in high esteem with liberal Democrats," @GovHowardDean said today on @Morning_Joe . [12/9/14, 12:56 p.m. EST]

Correct The Record @CorrectRecord: .@GovHowardDean said on @Morning_Joe he will endorse @HillaryClinton . [12/9/14, 12:54 p.m. EST]

Headlines:

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: “Pelosi on shutdown: 'Do your job'”

“Pelosi also lauded former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton as almost a lock in her bid to become the first female president. ‘When she runs, she’ll win, and when she wins, she’ll be one of the best-prepared,’ she said.”

FROM MEDIA MATTERS FOR AMERICA: Media Matters for America: “Tumbling Down The Benghazi Rabbit Hole”

“There continues to be zero evidence that Benghazi stands as a major 2016 political hurdle for Hillary Clinton, who served as Secretary of State at the time of the attack.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New York Times: “MoveOn.org Looks to Nudge Elizabeth Warren Into 2016 Presidential Race”

“‘As Senator Warren has said many times, she is not running for president,’ said Lacey Rose, Ms. Warren’s press secretary, regarding the draft effort.”

CNN: “Liberal group MoveOn.Org ready to kick-off $1 million campaign to draft Warren in 2016”

“Sen. Elizabeth Warren may repeatedly say she isn't running for president in 2016, but don't tell that to the nation's largest liberal grassroots organization.”

Politicus USA: “Elizabeth Warren Rejects MoveOn’s Million Dollar Effort To Draft Her For 2016”

“MoveOn.org is trying to draft Sen. Elizabeth Warren to run for president in 2016, but Sen. Warren has already rejected their efforts and made it clear that she won’t be running against Hillary Clinton.”

Glamour: “Is America Ready for a Female President?”

“It's impossible to imagine 2016 and not see that the prospect of a woman president is a matter of ‘sooner, not later.’ No wise pundit would want to stand under that political glass ceiling.”

New York Times: Times Insider: “Inside the Clinton White House: An Oral History of the Administration”

NYT’s AMY CHOZICK: “Some people in the party and liberal media outlets have said she [Sec. Clinton] is too centrist. What surprised me was to see what a liberal firebrand she used to be.”

Washington Post blog: The Fix: Nia-Malika Henderson: “Hillary Clinton has made millions on speeches. But she’s still not a great speaker.”

“She has yet to master ‘the big speech,’ which is part of the toolbox of any major politician.”

MikeHuckabee.com: Mike Huckabee: “Hillary Clinton's Latest...”

“Over the weekend, Hillary Clinton made some comments about how ‘smart power’ requires that we understand our enemies, that we empathize with them, respect them and see things from their point of view. It might be one of the most asinine comments I've ever heard."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Articles:

[The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Pelosi on shutdown: 'Do your job'"]

By Ben Kamisar

December 9, 2014, 12:41 p.m. EST

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said Tuesday that shutting down the government would be a "dereliction of duty," and she accused Republicans of ignoring the consequences.

"There's a difference of opinion of how serious it is to shut down government," she said during Politico's "Women Rule" Summit. "Do your job, get it done, figure it out."

Lawmakers are scrambling to bring a bill to the floor to extend government funding before it expires this week. GOP members are expected to release a bill that would provide funding for most agencies until September but only fund the Department of Homeland Security for a few months as retribution for President Obama's recent immigration executive orders.

But the House hasn't yet brought the package forward, which is creating some skepticism that the shutdown will be avoided. With some Republicans and conservative groups threatening not to support the bill unless it defunds Obama's executive order, GOP leaders may need Democratic votes to pass their plan.

"If Democratic votes are required to pass the bill, the bill has to have a certain level of bipartisanship," Pelosi said.

The majority of Pelosi's comments centered on how to increase women's participation in politics. She noted that there were only 23 women in the House when she was elected in 1987. There are now 83, including 64 Democrats, according to numbers from Rutgers University.

"Our House Democratic caucus is a majority of women, minorities and LGBT members," she said. "That's a pretty remarkable thing for any political parliament in the world."

Despite the progress, Pelosi said that there should be a concerted, bipartisan effort to increase that number. She said that women could reach gender parity by 2050 with a motivated effort.

Pelosi also lauded former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton as almost a lock in her bid to become the first female president.

"When she runs, she'll win, and when she wins, she'll be one of the best-prepared," she said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I would like to be relieved of the title of the highest ranking women in politics in America, I want to have a women president of the United States.”

FROM MEDIA MATTERS FOR AMERICA: Media Matters for America: “Tumbling Down The Benghazi Rabbit Hole”

By Eric Boehlert

December 9, 2014

[Subtitle:] New Spin: Republicans Are In On The Cover-Up, Too

Like a pair of investigative bookends, two bipartisan congressional reports arrived this year -- one from the Senate Intelligence Committee released in January, the other by the House Intelligence Committee in late November. Both came to similar conclusions about the 2012 terror attack on the United States diplomatic compound in Benghazi. And both represented bad news for conservative cheerleaders of the Benghazi cover-up saga, as the tandem reports released enormous amount of air from the scandal balloons.

The Senate report in January did little to quench the political thirst of hardcore Benghazi believers. Its findings, which categorically demolished the most closely-held beliefs of Benghazi true-believers, didn't stop House Republicans from establishing a select committee in May to launch yet another investigation. (Six congressional committees and an independent State Department panel had already investigated the attack, for those keeping score.) That select committee holds its second hearing this week.

The more recent House report however, does seem to have produced a sense of creeping panic among dedicated partisans who remain committed to keeping the story alive through the 2016 presidential campaign. The House findings run so counter to what Benghazi promoters have claimed that they threaten the viability of that strategy.

And that's why, in a truly odd turn of events, the Republican-authored House report is now under withering attack from a cadre of Republicans and their allies in the right-wing media ("a classic Washington whitewash"!), who've logged thousands of hours over the last two years propping up the shaky cover-up tale and trying to turn it into a Barack Obama scandal brand.

"The House Select Committee on Benghazi has stated that it will reconvene on Dec. 10. Its work will be as important as ever," the Heritage Foundation's Daily Signal announced this week. (i.e. questions remain!) The Weekly Standard agreed, with its writers reporting that the latest Congressional report that debunked every major Benghazi conspiracy to date, simply confirms that Congress needs all the Benghazi investigations it can get.

Why? "This new Benghazi "intelligence" report is little more than a C.Y.A. attempt designed to protect incompetent politicians and government agents at the expense of justice for the victims of September 11, 2012," according to Sen. Rand Paul.

This, of course, is the language of dead-enders. It's the language of partisans with stunted capacity for reason and who won't concede the facts on the ground. Instead, they tumble further and further down into a rabbit hole of what-ifs, spending extraordinary time (and taxpayer money) trying to undermine the facts while proclaiming the next inquiry will get it just right.

In other words, a Republican-chaired committee report that debunks Benghazi conspiracies is now being used as a rallying cry for conservatives who are convinced the report raises more pressing questions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Do you see where this closed, hermetically sealed loop is designed to lead us?

In criticizing the report, note that since the release of the report from the House Intelligence Committee, conservative critics need to find an explanation for why its Republican chairman, Rep. Mike Rogers (R-MI), allegedly opted to tank his own committee's year-in-the-making report; why he would authorize a "messy," "bizarre and troubling" report. Did he do it protect the White House and Hillary Clinton?

Is Rogers now part of the cover-up, too?

But the ruse isn't going to work in the long run because the facts remain immovable. "A report released late Friday about the fatal 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya, left Republicans in the same position they have been in for two years: with little evidence to support their most damning critiques of how the Obama administration, and then-Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton, responded to the attacks," the New York Times reported late last month.

More (emphasis added):

Similar to five other government reports, the one released by the House Intelligence Committee on Friday said that the administration had not intentionally misled the public about what occurred during the attacks in talking points it created for officials to use in television appearances that turned out to be inaccurate. It also said that no order was given by the military to "stand down" in responding to try to save the four Americans killed in the attacks, a claim that Republicans have made based on the account of a member of the security team in Benghazi that day.

...

The report said the C.I.A. did not have an "intelligence failure" in the months before the attacks.

For a refresher from Media Matters research, what did the Senate report conclude in January?

-No Effort By Obama Administration To Cover-Up Or Alter Facts

-No Evidence Of A "Stand Down" Order

-No "Tactical Warning" Predicting An Attack

Talk about a Congressional one-two punch.

But when up becomes down, when evidence creates more "questions," when reports that debunk conspiracy theories are used by advocates as proof more inquiries are needed, it becomes impossible to reason about the established facts. Or in this case, it has become impossible to make sense of what conservatives pretend the facts to be.

Even back in the 1990s, when the entire Republican agenda seemed to revolve around ending President Bill Clinton's presidency via "scandal" investigation, I don't think we ever hit a phase during the Whitewater waste of money where Clinton's partisan foes were reduced to arguing that Republican members of Congress were in on the White House cover-up, and that's why the "truth" remained so well hid for years.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And by the way, there continues to be zero evidence that Benghazi stands as a major 2016 political hurdle for Hillary Clinton, who served as Secretary of State at the time of the attack. In fact, a new poll this week found "Americans overwhelmingly see her tenure as Secretary of State as an advantage," as the Washington Post's Greg Sargent noted.

No matter. Professional Benghazi promoters are so far underground at this point, dashing between scandal warrens, that they've lost sight of the reality. Everybody, it now seems, is on the cover-up.

New York Times: "MoveOn.org Looks to Nudge Elizabeth Warren Into 2016 Presidential Race"

By Jonathan Martin

December 8, 2014

WASHINGTON — Some Democrats are "Ready for Hillary." MoveOn.org is ready for Elizabeth Warren.

The liberal group is poised to spend $1 million on a campaign to draft Senator Warren, the Massachusetts Democrat, into the 2016 presidential race, an indication of an appetite among some activists for a more progressive alternative to Hillary Rodham Clinton.

MoveOn.org's executive director, Ilya Sheyman, said the group planned to open offices and hire staff in Iowa and New Hampshire, the states that kick off the presidential nominating process, and ultimately to air television ads in those states. The group will begin its push with a website, "Run Warren Run," allowing supporters to sign a petition urging Ms. Warren to pursue a White House bid and featuring a video about her.

"We want to demonstrate to Senator Warren that there's a groundswell of grass-roots energy nationally and in key states and to demonstrate there's a path for her," Mr. Sheyman said. He added that the effort was not being made in coordination with Ms. Warren and that the group advised her staff about it only last weekend.

Ms. Warren, who is entering her third year in the Senate, has fast become a favorite among liberal activists for her unapologetic brand of economic populism, but she has also repeatedly denied any interest in pursuing the presidency.

"As Senator Warren has said many times, she is not running for president," said Lacey Rose, Ms. Warren's press secretary, regarding the draft effort.

Such comments have not, however, dissuaded her admirers. MoveOn.org is set to survey its eight million members for one day starting Tuesday, with the expectation that they will affirm its support of the effort to nudge Ms. Warren into the race. She is well regarded by the group, having gotten its support in her 2012 race and joining members on conference calls during her time in the Senate on such issues as student loan debt.

Mrs. Clinton is a popular figure among Democrats and enjoys a wide lead in early polls, but some progressives are wary of her style of politics and believe that widening income disparities in the country call for a more confrontational figure.

Ms. Warren, a former Harvard law professor, is the most sought-after candidate among this liberal bloc, but others could fill the void if she remains on the sidelines. Former Senator Jim Webb of Virginia has already opened an exploratory committee, and Senator Bernie Sanders, a liberal independent from Vermont, and Gov. Martin O'Malley of Maryland have also discussed presidential bids.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Asked about Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Sheyman said the group's effort was unrelated "to any other candidate," but added that MoveOn.org members want a Democratic nominee who fits the moment.

"Voters are looking for bold solutions about how you fix a rigged system in which middle- and working-class families are falling behind," he said.

Whether there is significant energy behind the "Run Warren Run" effort may be known soon: MoveOn.org is planning a kickoff on next Tuesday in Des Moines.

CNN: "Liberal group MoveOn.Org ready to kick-off $1 million campaign to draft Warren in 2016"

By Dan Merica

December 9, 2014, 2:16 p.m. EST

Sen. Elizabeth Warren may repeatedly say she isn't running for president in 2016, but don't tell that to the nation's largest liberal grassroots organization.

MoveOn.org, an 8-million member liberal grassroots organization, is poised to kick off a $1 million campaign to draft Warren for president in 2016. The plan will be put to MoveOn members Tuesday morning, but because of the Massachusetts senator's popularity with the liberals, the plan is expected to easily pass.

The campaign includes MoveOn.org opening offices and hiring staff in Iowa and New Hampshire, two states that are critically important in the presidential nomination process, and "the assembly of a national volunteer army ready to go to work if Sen. Warren enters the race."

If passed, MoveOn will also begin producing "ads and media products that call attention to how Sen. Warren has stood up and fought for the middle class and her powerful vision for our country's future."

"There is too much at stake to have anything other than our best candidates in the debate," Ilya Sheyman, executive director of MoveOn.org Political Action, said in a statement. "We are prepared to show Senator Warren she has the support she needs to enter—and win—the presidential race."

Warren has said a number of times that she is not running for president, despite all the liberal excitement around her possible candidacy. Through her lawyer, Warren even disavowed Ready for Warren, a super PAC hoping to draft the liberal senator.

"As Senator Warren has said many times, she is not running for president," Lacey J. Rose, Warren's press secretary, said on Tuesday.

That said, should she decide to run, Warren would be far from the first presidential hopeful to backtrack on a pledge not to do so.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"This is a huge opportunity for MoveOn members, if they choose, to inspire Senator Warren as she has inspired so many of us," said Anna Galland, executive director of MoveOn.org Civic Action.

MoveOn's campaign is as much a boost to Warren as it is a slight to Hillary Clinton, the Democratic frontrunner for the 2016 nomination and someone who has failed to connect with some liberal activists.

MoveOn organizers won't fault Clinton directly, but they regularly talk about finding a nominee that fits the moment for Democrats, not someone associated with what they see as a longtime rigged political system.

Polling, however, has shown that self-identified liberals overwhelmingly back the former secretary of state.

In a July CNN/ORC International Poll, 66% of liberals said they would back Clinton over people like Warren, Vice President Joe Biden and New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo. In the same poll, only 13% of liberal backed Warren.

But in polls of strictly members of liberal groups, Warren fares much better. In a November poll of Democracy for America's one million members, Warren garnered 42% support, compared to 24% for Vermont Independent Senator Bernie Sanders and 23% for Clinton.

MoveOn is not the only liberal political group pushing for a Warren run. Democracy for America said Tuesday it would poll its members about joining the "Draft Warren" effort.

"Washington consultants can spout off a dozen reasons why Elizabeth Warren shouldn't run, but none of that beltway blather means a thing next to this one, simple truth: The Democratic Party and our country desperately need Warren's voice in the 2016 presidential debate," DFA Executive Director Charles Chamberlain said in a statement out Tuesday.

Politicus USA: “Elizabeth Warren Rejects MoveOn’s Million Dollar Effort To Draft Her For 2016”

By Jason Easley

December 9, 2014, 10:59 a.m. EST

MoveOn.org is trying to draft Sen. Elizabeth Warren to run for president in 2016, but Sen. Warren has already rejected their efforts and made it clear that she won’t be running against Hillary Clinton.

Via a press release, MoveOn announced their member vote to draft Warren,

For the first time in its 16-year history, the 8-million-member group is holding a nationwide membership vote on a presidential draft campaign. If the vote succeeds, the group will focus on persuading the Massachusetts senator, who has become known as a tireless, passionate advocate for middle-class and working families, to seek the presidency.

Voting is open to MoveOn’s full membership across the country until 10 a.m. Eastern time Wednesday morning. The result will be announced at 11 a.m. Eastern.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The campaign, if ratified by MoveOn's members, will include:

– offices and staff in early primary and caucus states like Iowa and New Hampshire,

– the assembly of a national volunteer army ready to go to work if Sen. Warren enters the race, – recruiting small-dollar donors who pledge their support,

– and ads and media products that call attention to how Sen. Warren has stood up and fought for the middle class and her powerful vision for our country's future.

The organization will invest at least $1 million in the first phase of the launch.

Warren's press secretary put an end to dream of drafting the senator in 2016 by saying for the billionth time, "As Senator Warren has said many times, she is not running for president."

Sen. Warren is not running because she supports Hillary Clinton in 2016. Warren has shown herself to be a tireless campaigner for Democratic candidates and a loyal party member. She seems like anything, but the go it alone type who would break with her party to launch and outsider bid for president.

There is a candidate that would be perfect for the left that groups like MoveOn continue to ignore. Sen. Bernie Sanders is serious about challenging Hillary Clinton in the Democratic primary, and he would welcome a million dollar investment in a primary campaign organization.

Whether progressives want to believe it or not, Elizabeth Warren is not running. She has made zero moves towards a bid for the presidency. If groups like MoveOn were smart, they would be lining up behind Sanders and stop wasting their time chasing the fantasy of Elizabeth Warren in 2016.

Glamour: "Is America Ready for a Female President?"

By Jeff Greenfield

December 9, 2014

Political analyst Jeff Greenfield asked that question in this magazine nearly 40 years ago. Now, as election watchers wait to see if Hillary Rodham Clinton will run again, he wonders: What's changed and what hasn't?

If those words sound hopelessly out- dated...well, they are. They were written by me for this magazine 39 years ago, when the impact of the women's movement was only beginning to be felt in politics. Today, nearly four decades later, polls suggest that a woman president is not just probable but imminent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Polls, no doubt, can be written in sand; Hillary Rodham Clinton, after all, was the "probable" and "imminent" next president nine years ago. But over the last 40 years, changes in our politics, our society, and our attitudes have eradicated nearly every obstacle that once blocked a woman's path to the White House. Whether Clinton (or another woman) is or isn't elected in 2016, the glass ceiling that kept a woman from becoming president—or even a presidential nominee—has been effectively shattered.

So as Clinton's much-anticipated announcement looms over the 2016 campaign, let me show you just how far we've come. Back in 1976, as I reported, 49 percent of men and a disturbingly high 40 percent of women said they would be less likely to vote for a woman presidential candidate than for an equally qualified male. Now? According to a Pew poll in May, a full 71 percent of voters said gender would make no difference, and 19 percent said they'd be more likely to vote for a woman.

Why this quantum leap? In that original Glamour piece, I argued the most powerful force on the side of female candidates would be "time—time for women to enter the ranks of government, in decision- making, pressure-filled, executive jobs."

And the years have delivered. Women have entered the "decision-making" ranks in government and across the board, in job after job once seen as the exclusive province of those with XY chromosomes. In 1976 not a single woman sat in the United States Senate. Of those who had served, all but one had "inherited" the job from her husband. No woman had ever sat on the U.S. Supreme Court or in one of the "big four" Cabinet positions (state, defense, treasury, attorney general). And beyond politics, you would have been shocked to find a woman in the corner office of a Fortune 500 corporation or sitting solo at a network news anchor desk.

In 2015, for the first time ever, more than 100 women will serve in Congress. While the number of female senators still stubbornly hovers at around 20 women, in three states—California, New Hampshire, and Washington—both senators are women. Over the past four decades, 22 states have elected female governors; Arizona has done it three times! Many of the so-called daddy arenas—diplomacy, war and peace, law enforcement, money—are also no longer "men only" turf. Three secretaries of state have been women; so have two national security advisers and three U.N. ambassadors. Until Clinton stepped down, in 2013, women held all these key posts in this administration. We are a long way from genuine equality—Rwanda and Afghanistan have a higher percentage of women in their national legislatures than the U.S.— but it's a sea change from 40 years ago.

What was once eye-opening is now totally familiar outside the political realm too: Women anchor the network news, run Yahoo and General Motors, direct war movies. Critics of National Football League Commissioner Roger Goodell like to raise the idea of replacing him with Condoleezza Rice. What's remarkable now is how unremarkable the idea sounds.

There is, of course, one other factor that has changed the idea of a woman president from long-range possibility to short-range probability: It almost happened.

Hillary Clinton's 2008 White House run is viewed by some as a failure: a combination of bad strategy, bad management, and bad tactics. Her loss is also seen by many of her sternest supporters as proof of the still powerful sexism that would burden any female candidate.

While looking back over the blizzard of comments about her 2008 campaign, I kept running across the same handful of examples of that sexism: dumb statements by cable news talking heads ("When she comes on television," said Tucker Carlson, "I involuntarily cross my legs"); two louts at a Salem, New Hampshire, rally yelling, "Iron my shirt!" at her; the Hillary Nutcracker on sale at novelty stores. But for all the sexism, for all her campaign's missteps, she came within a whisker (if that's not too male a reference) of winning the nomination. By the time the primaries ended in early June, she and Barack Obama each had more than 18 million votes. And it should not be overlooked that Obama was treated with exceptional deference by the political press, and Clinton suffered by comparison. (Maybe journalists in real life didn't act quite like those in the classic Saturday Night Live skit by providing the answers to the questions they were asking, but the disparity was obvious.)

Was the loss because Hillary Clinton is a woman? Or because she is this particular woman, whose ties to the forty-second president may have turned out to be a liability at the time? In the fall of 2007, when Clinton was dominating the polls, Republican strategist Mike Murphy cautioned me, "This is a 'change' election, and she can't run as a 'change' candidate."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Besides, Clinton's 2008 defeat will hardly hold her back: From Andrew Jackson to Ronald Reagan, candidates have come back to win nominations and elections after primary failures. Now, with her years as secretary of state added to her Senate service, her credentials are as strong as those of any potential president, past or present, especially in an election in which national-security issues such as ISIS, Ebola, and Russia's militancy promise to loom large. What seems clear is that the questions she will have to answer will have far less to do with her sex than with who she is, what she's done, and what she stands for (though the recent, ludicrous questions about her "grandmotherhood"—an issue never raised regarding presidential grandfathers—suggest she won't be immune to gender idiocy). There will, of course, be other questions, as there should be: Is she too old to run? Politicos asked that of Ronald Reagan, Bob Dole, and John McCain; it's a concern she, like them, will have to put to rest. Was her tenure as secretary of state a success, or was she naive about Russia's aggressiveness and Islamist extremism? Does she have real answers to the economic health of the middle class? These same questions would be asked if we were talking about Henry instead of Hillary Clinton.

Finally, and most significantly, the probability of our ultimately having a woman president does not depend on whether Clinton wins, or even runs, in 2016. There is now a wide range of potential presidents in both parties. On the left, Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren, New York Senator Kirsten Gillibrand, and New Hampshire Governor Maggie Hassan have great credentials. On the right, the bench includes Senator Kelly Ayotte of New Hampshire and New Mexico Governor Susana Martinez, who may be most intriguing if you're a Republican worried about the women's vote and the Hispanic vote.

As I've learned, making a political prediction can be dangerous. A woman might not make it to the White House in the next four or eight years—this is a steeply narrow pyramid; we elect only one person at a time to the very top. That's why, even when discrimination ends, there will be a lot of groups that will go a very long time before having a president who "looks like" them.

But it's impossible to imagine 2016 and not see that the prospect of a woman president is a matter of "sooner, not later." No wise pundit would want to stand under that political glass ceiling.

New York Times: Times Insider: “Inside the Clinton White House: An Oral History of the Administration”

By Erika Allen

December 9, 2014, 10:35 a.m. EST

[Subtitle:] In a front-page article last weekend, Amy Chozick and Peter Baker delved into an oral history of the Clinton White House, conducted by the Miller Center. As Hillary Clinton prepares for her own possible presidential run, the series of interviews with Clinton administration players ‘bears on the future as much as the past,’ the reporters wrote. Here, Ms. Chozick talks about what she found most fascinating in the trove of recently released transcripts.

Q.

When and why were the interviews conducted, and who was involved?

A.

The Miller Center at the University of Virginia has conducted oral histories of every presidency going back to Jimmy Carter. Historians interview key players in each administration and then seal those interviews away for years to come. In the case of the Clinton oral history, a lot of the White House aides who were interviewed did not realize when they sat for interviews, mostly more than a decade ago, that by the time their remarks were made public the first lady would possibly be running for president. That makes for some of the most candid remarks we’ve seen.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q.

How did you go about analyzing the collection of interviews?

A.

Peter and I divided up the transcripts. I jumped on the chance to read through the transcripts that were most revealing about Hillary Clinton, and Peter knows a lot more about President Clinton and the West Wing than I do. But we found that she was such an active first lady, involved in so much policy in the West Wing, that even interviews with domestic or economic policy advisers provided rich detail into Mrs. Clinton as well as the president.

Q.

Why were the interviews released now?

A.

They're typically released a decade later and made available in batches. This first batch coincided nicely with the 10th anniversary of the William J. Clinton Presidential Center in Little Rock, Ark., which includes a library and museum. The Clinton center arranged panel discussions with former White House aides and Miller Center academics to coincide with the project's release.

Q.

What surprised you most?

A.

As we look towards the 2016 presidential campaign, a lot has been made about whether Mrs. Clinton can appeal to the left wing of the Democratic Party. Some people in the party and liberal media outlets have said she is too centrist. What surprised me was to see what a liberal firebrand she used to be. The West Wing nicknamed her health care team "the Bolsheviks," and she was the one whispering in her husband's ear against policies like Nafta that are so unpopular with the liberal wing of the party.

Q.

Were there any great anecdotes that you'd never heard before?

A.

Most people know that Mrs. Clinton was the first first lady to have an office in the West Wing, but hearing Roy M. Neel, who was Al Gore's 1992 campaign manager and who went on to serve as the vice president's chief of staff, describe how that went down stood out for me. Shortly after Mr. Clinton won the 1992 election, Mr. Neel said Mrs. Clinton's friend Susan Thomases was in the West Wing checking out where everyone would sit. "The rumor," Mr. Neel said, "was that Susan had decided that Gore wouldn't have the traditional vice president's office in the West Wing, that that would go to Hillary."

Q.

Whose interview were you most looking forward to reading and why?

A.

I was looking forward to reading Ms. Thomases' transcripts. She was one of Mrs. Clinton's closest friends and most devoted defenders and is a political legend. She's the inspiration for the character Lucille Kaufmann in the 1996 political novel "Primary Colors." She has multiple sclerosis now and, sadly, had to retire. It was a special gift to get to read her thoughts about the White House years.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q.

Any other gems?

A.

Man, was Ms. Thomases tough. At one point, she makes fun of George Stephanopoulos, whom she calls “the squeamish guy of the century.” She made fun of him on the 1992 campaign: “‘Ooh, ooh, I can’t stand this campaign.’ I said: ‘Then quit. Your theatrics are just adorable, but quit. If you can’t handle it, quit.’”

Q.

What, if anything, do you feel is missing from the collection?

A.

What’s missing? Bill and Hillary Clinton’s interviews, of course.

Washington Post blog: The Fix: Nia-Malika Henderson: “Hillary Clinton has made millions on speeches. But she’s still not a great speaker.”

By Nia-Malika Henderson

December 9, 2014, 12:29 p.m. EST

MoveOn.org is lining up for Elizabeth Warren — the latest sign of her strength among progressives — by kicking off a $1 million effort to draft her for president in 2016, according to an article in the New York Times:

“MoveOn.org’s executive director, Ilya Sheyman, said the group planned to open offices and hire staff in Iowa and New Hampshire, the states that kick off the presidential nominating process, and ultimately to air television ads in those states. The group will begin its push with a website, ‘Run Warren Run,’ allowing supporters to sign a petition urging Ms. Warren to pursue a White House bid and featuring a video about her.

“‘We want to demonstrate to Senator Warren that there’s a groundswell of grass-roots energy nationally and in key states and to demonstrate there’s a path for her,’ Mr. Sheyman said. He added that the effort was not being made in coordination with Ms. Warren and that the group advised her staff about it only last weekend.”

And with every Warren story, the question becomes just how worried Hillary Clinton should actually be. And it's this question that reminded me of a sentence in my colleague Anne Gearan's article about all the potential "not-Hillarys" who might run in 2016:

“Bill Clinton admires Warren’s stemwinder speaking style, and Hillary Clinton echoed parts of Warren’s sticking-up-for-the-little guy economic message during midterm speeches this year.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's this speaking style that has powered Warren to her position, leading my colleague, David Farenthold, to call her the master of the stump speech. She can bring a huge crowd to its feet in a way that almost no politician can at this point. And she is also a pitbull at congressional hearings, the very kind of appearances which will likely go into whatever video that MoveOn.org will make about her.

As for Clinton, what would be on her highlight reel of speeches? Her attempted echo of Warren's brand of populism in Massachusetts fell flat. Take a look at Clinton addressing the recent incidents involving white police officers and black men which have particularly inflamed progressives (at the 2:00 mark):

[VIDEO]

"I know that a lot of hearts are breaking and we are asking ourselves, aren't these our sons? Aren't these our brothers?" she said, adding that "each of us has to grapple with some hard truths about race and justice in America" when it comes to disproportionate treatment in sentencing.

Here is a review from the Boston Globe of that portion of the speech, in which Clinton talked about the country needing to "find balance" again:

“The remarks, delivered with a slow, deliberate cadence at the Massachusetts Conference for Women as Clinton stood on a wide stage, came not long before she is expected to telegraph her political intentions.”

Uninspiring, cautious, careful. "Trite" might be another way to describe Clinton's riff, which was far from the kind of rousing style that her husband so admires in Warren.

Granted, race and policing is a tough issue, not given to rah-rah speeches — especially as federal investigations are still ongoing. But this knock on Clinton's delivery style goes for many of her speeches. Given that she has been in public life since 1992, it's a bit incongruous to consider that her speaking style is often so lacking. She has yet to master "the big speech," which is part of the toolbox of any major politician.

Yes, there are some hits — the Beijing speech from 1995 on women is still quoted today, as is the "18 million cracks" riff from 2008. But those speeches succeeded because the content was so compelling, and it's hard to point to a big Hillary speech moment. Her announcement in 2007 came via a soft-lit video rather than a big speech ala Obama).

The "big speech" doesn't have to be a candidate's warhorse, but it certainly helps. Clinton makes as much as $300,000 per speech, and will likely give them up until the time she announces. Those kinds of speech settings (corporate types) won't likely help her move beyond her slow, deliberate cadence, and in the meantime, Warren seems like she's just warming up.

A number of Clinton's potential opponents on the GOP side seem like they've had a crash course in public speaking (Sen. Marco Rubio especially) and have a sort of natural charisma and command of the stage (Sen. Ted Cruz).

Clinton has previously echoed the Mario Cuomo line that candidates "campaign in poetry and govern in prose" —dismissing Obama's rhetorical gifts way back when it was a liability for her. And similar to 2008, Warren will function as a sort of stalking horse come 2016 — unlikely to run, but very much a presence in the campaign, a constant reminder of a basic political skill that Clinton is still trying to master.

MikeHuckabee.com: “Hillary Clinton's Latest...”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Mike Huckabee

December 8, 2014

Friday in Yemen, US commandos attempted a raid to free American journalist Luke Somers and South African Pierre Korkie, who were being held hostage and threatened with death by al-Qaeda. But one of the terrorists spotted the commandos and raised an alarm. There was a firefight that killed six al-Qaeda fighters. No American soldiers were harmed, but the terrorists executed both hostages in cold blood. Over the weekend, Hillary Clinton made some comments about how “smart power” requires that we understand our enemies, that we empathize with them, respect them and see things from their point of view. It might be one of the most asinine comments I’ve ever heard. How can we empathize with terrorists who think nothing of beheading innocent men, women and children? America is a free nation today because previous leaders had the sense to understand that knowing your enemy meant understanding their weaknesses and exploiting them to win. It didn’t mean reaching out your hand to monsters who cut hands off.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Eizenstat, Stuart" <seizenstat@cov.com>
To: "Daniel Kurtz-Phelan" <dkurtzphelan@gmail.com>
Date: 6/29/2015 11:09:07 AM
Subject: RE: HRC Iran statement

Dear Dan and Jake,

I am sorry for the delay, but I only landed this morning from Israel via JFK. Please see my comments below. Of course, we do not know the details at this time.
Stu

From: Daniel Kurtz-Phelan [mailto:dkurtzphelan@gmail.com]
Sent: Sunday, June 28, 2015 8:52 PM
To: Eizenstat, Stuart
Cc: Jake Sullivan
Subject: HRC Iran statement

Dear Stu,

Jake asked that I share with you the current draft of HRC's statement on the Iran deal. It's pasted below. Some of this could of course change depending on the details of a final agreement, but it would be great to have your feedback at this stage,

Many thanks,
Dan

**

I applaud President Obama and Secretary Kerry for securing a nuclear agreement that offers the strongest chance to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon. With vigorous enforcement, unyielding verification, and swift consequences for any violations, this deal will make the United States, Israel, our Arab partners, and the region safer and more secure than if there were no agreement.

At the same time, there are aspects of the agreement that are a cause for concern, and a basis for special diligence. has not been required to answer questions about the Possible Military Dimensions (PMD), including allowing the IAEA to inspect sites, interview key scientists and officials, and review documents that would shed light on their past and current PMD activities. In addition, clarity is required on what limits are imposed during the term of the agreement and thereafter to preclude Iran's work on advanced centrifuges. It is also critical that sanctions relief must come only when Iran has demonstration to the satisfaction of the IAEA that they have complied with their obligations. Sanctions for terrorism and other non-nuclear sanctions must remain in place. I want to make sure as President that any violation of the agreement by Iran would trigger a reimposition of sanctions, without an Iranian veto over the findings, and in ways that assure the US can act if we feel there is a violation. Most important is monitoring and verification. The IAEA inspectors must have timely and effective access to all sites in Iran, including military sites. It is unclear if this is the case.

Despite these concerns, it is critical in assessing this agreement to ask what alternatives exist. We already have in place the most effective, broad-based sanctions ever imposed on a country in peacetime. While they have brought Iran to the negotiating table, they have not stopped the continued expansion of their nuclear program. It is difficult to see what other sanctions would lead to greater Iranian concessions. Without an agreement, there would be no two-thirds reduction in their number of centrifuges; no dismantlement of their plutonium plant at Arak; no 24/IAEA inspections; no dilution of their 20% enriched uranium. Their capacity to "break-out: would be far more likely without this agreement, than with it. We also have to consider it we could maintain the partnership with the European Union, which has made the sanctions most effective.

Today's agreement is the culmination of an effective strategy executed over many years. By the end of the Bush administration, Iran was rapidly expanding its nuclear centrifuge capacity despite unilateral American sanctions and ineffective saber rattling. The Obama administration took a different approach, working with Congress and our allies and partners around the world. As Secretary of State, I logged tens of thousands of miles and twisted a lot of arms – especially in Moscow and Beijing – to build a global coalition to impose the most crippling sanctions in history against Tehran. That unprecedented pressure shattered Iran's economy, halted the progress of its nuclear program (NB. BE CAREFUL THEY HAVE SUBSTANTIALLY INCREASED THE NUMBER OF CENTRIFUGES AND AMOUNT OF ENRICHED URANIUM SINCE OBAMA TOOK OFFICE), and forced its leaders to the table to negotiate a deal that puts a nuclear weapon out of reach.

As President, I will use every tool in our arsenal to compel rigorous Iranian compliance. The response to any violation will be clear, immediate, and devastating -- starting with the return of sanctions but taking no options off the table, including, if necessary, the use of force. The message to Iran must be loud and clear: We will never allow you to acquire a nuclear weapon; we will never allow you permit you to produce sufficient fissile material or otherwise acquire it, sufficient for a nuclear weapons; not just during the term of this agreement – never.

Going forward, we have to be clear-eyed when it comes to the broader threat Iran represents. Even with an agreement that limits its nuclear ambitions, Iran still poses a direct challenge to the United States and our allies, especially Israel. The funds it will receive with sanctions relief will provide billions of dollars more for Iran to use to support terrorism. It continues to destabilize countries from Yemen to Lebanon, while exacerbating conflict in Syria. And it fuels terrorism throughout the region and beyond, including through direct support to Hamas and Hizballah. We have to aggressively oppose and raise the costs for Iran's destabilizing activities, insist on the return of U.S. citizens being held by the Iranian government, and strengthen cooperation with our allies and partners. This agreement under my Administration will not see this agreement as the beginning of an American-Iranian partnership. Our allies in the Middle East deserve to have this assurance, and they will have it if I am elected President.

Israel should be confident that now and in a Hillary Clinton Administration, the United States will always defend its security and ensure its military edge in the region. Our two countries have to be on the same page when it comes to the threat posed by Iran, so I would invite the senior Israeli leadership to Washington for early talks on further strengthening our crucial alliance. I will provide Israel with all the military means it requires to defend itself against an Iranian threat, and support its actions to defend itself. We should also deepen our security relationship with Arab partners who are threatened by Iran's ambitions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ultimately, this agreement is the best way to protect our country and our allies. To walk away from a deal that will stop Iran from getting a nuclear weapon, or to bomb Iran as long an agreement offers an alternative, [as some Republican candidates for President suggest,] would be both dangerous and shortsighted – fracturing our global coalition, raising the risk of regional war, and ultimately bringing Iran closer to a nuclear weapon.

So we should proceed with wisdom and strength in implementing a deal born out of effective diplomacy and strong American leadership.

**

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Cammie Croft" <ccroft@progressivemediausa.org>
To:	"big campaign" <bigcampaign@googlegroups.com>
Date:	5/12/2008 9:52:29 AM
Subject:	[big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Speech On Climate Change in Portland, OR

Just off the phone with our tracker Jessica who made it into today's event. Here are the notes from our call:

Background Details:
- Press Outlets included: Local News - Channels 2, 6, 8, 9 and 12, Oregonian; Major national networks - CNN, FOX, MSNBC; Usual traveling/embedded press; Glen Johnson from the AP; Johnathan Martin from the Politico
- Event held at Vestas Wind Energy Training Facility in Portland, OR
- Approximately 100 in audience; though a bunch of those were campaign staffers and press; most of audience men, middle-aged, mix of blue and white collar workers of the company
- Current Governor of Oregon spoke, the president of the company spoke and then introduced McCain
- Event was closed to the general public
- Secret Service at event
- McCain used a gigantic teleprompter (we got footage of it)
- Staffers were wearing badges to identify themselves
- McCain did not answer questions after the event -- and did not hold a media availability

Speech - Transcript
Link: http://www.johnmccain.com/Informing/News/Speeches/0b381abd-e573-459d-8716-fbd83ab62d8d.htm

Remarks By John McCain on Climate Change Policy

May 12, 2008

ARLINGTON, VA -- U.S. Senator John McCain delivered the following remarks as prepared for delivery at the Vestas Training Facility, in Portland, OR:

Thank you all very much. I appreciate the hospitality of Vestas Wind Technology. Today is a kind of test run for the company. They've got wind technicians here, wind studies, and all these wind turbines, but there's no wind. So now I know why they asked me to come give a speech.

Every day, when there are no reporters and cameras around to draw attention to it, this company and others like it are doing important work. And what we see here is just a glimpse of much bigger things to come. Wind power is one of many alternative energy sources that are changing our economy for the better. And one day they will change our economy forever.

Wind is a clean and predictable source of energy, and about as renewable as anything on earth. Along with solar power, fuel-cell technology, cleaner burning fuels and other new energy sources, wind power will bring America closer to energy independence. Our economy depends upon clean and affordable alternatives to fossil fuels, and so, in many ways, does our security. A large share of the world's oil reserves is controlled by foreign powers that do not have our interests at heart. And as our reliance on oil passes away, their power will vanish with it.

In the coming weeks, I intend to address many of the great challenges that America's energy policies must meet. When we debate energy bills in Washington, it should be more than a competition among industries for special favors, subsidies, and tax breaks. In the Congress, we need to send the special interests on their way -- without their favors and subsidies. We need to draw on the best ideas of both parties, and on all the resources a free market can provide. We need to keep our eyes on big goals in energy policy, the serious dangers, and the common interests of the American people.

Today I'd like to focus on just one of those challenges, and among environmental dangers it is surely the most serious of all. Whether we call it "climate change" or "global warming," in the end we're all left with the same set of facts. The facts of global warming demand our urgent attention, especially in Washington. Good stewardship, prudence, and simple commonsense demand that we to act meet the challenge, and act quickly.

Some of the most compelling evidence of global warming comes to us from NASA. No longer do we need to rely on guesswork and computer modeling, because satellite images reveal a dramatic disappearance of glaciers, Antarctic ice shelves and polar ice sheets. And I've seen some of this evidence up close. A few years ago I traveled to the area of Svalbard, Norway, a group of islands in the Arctic Ocean. I was shown the southernmost point where a glacier had reached twenty years earlier. From there, we had to venture northward up the fjord to see where that same glacier ends today -- because all the rest has melted. On a trip to Alaska, I heard about a national park visitor's center that was built to offer a picture-perfect view of a large glacier. Problem is, the glacier is gone. A work of nature that took ages to form had melted away in a matter of decades.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Our scientists have also seen and measured reduced snowpack, with earlier runoffs in the Pacific Northwest and elsewhere. We have seen sustained drought in the Southwest, and across the world average temperatures that seem to reach new records every few years. We have seen a higher incidence of extreme weather events. In the frozen wilds of Alaska, the Arctic, Antarctic, and elsewhere, wildlife biologists have noted sudden changes in animal migration patterns, a loss of their habitat, a rise in sea levels. And you would think that if the polar bears, walruses, and sea birds have the good sense to respond to new conditions and new dangers, then humanity can respond as well.

We have many advantages in the fight against global warming, but time is not one of them. Instead of idly debating the precise extent of global warming, or the precise timeline of global warming, we need to deal with the central facts of rising temperatures, rising waters, and all the endless troubles that global warming will bring. We stand warned by serious and credible scientists across the world that time is short and the dangers are great. The most relevant question now is whether our own government is equal to the challenge.

There are vital measures we can take in the short term, even as we focus on long-term policies to mitigate the effects of global warming. In the years ahead, we are likely to see reduced water supplies, more forest fires than in previous decades, changes in crop production, more heat waves afflicting our cities and a greater intensity in storms. Each one of these consequences of climate change will require policies to protect our citizens, especially those most vulnerable to violent weather. Each one will require new precautions in the repair and construction of our roads, bridges, railways, seawalls and other infrastructure. Some state and local governments have already begun their planning and preparation for extreme events and other impacts of climate change. The federal government can help them in many ways, above all by coordinating their efforts, and I am committed to providing that support.

To lead in this effort, however, our government must strike at the source of the problem -- with reforms that only Congress can enact and the president can sign. We know that greenhouse gasses are heavily implicated as a cause of climate change. And we know that among all greenhouse gasses, the worst by far is the carbon-dioxide that results from fossil-fuel combustion. Yet for all the good work of entrepreneurs and inventors in finding cleaner and better technologies, the fundamental incentives of the market are still on the side of carbon-based energy. This has to change before we can make the decisive shift away from fossil fuels.

For the market to do more, government must do more by opening new paths of invention and ingenuity. And we must do this in a way that gives American businesses new incentives and new rewards to seek, instead of just giving them new taxes to pay and new orders to follow. The most direct way to achieve this is through a system that sets clear limits on all greenhouse gases, while also allowing the sale of rights to excess emissions. And this is the proposal I will submit to the Congress if I am elected president -- a cap-and-trade system to change the dynamic of our energy economy.

As a program under the Clean Air Act, the cap-and-trade system achieved enormous success in ridding the air of acid rain. And the same approach that brought a decline in sulfur dioxide emissions can have an equally dramatic and permanent effect on carbon emissions. Instantly, automakers, coal companies, power plants, and every other enterprise in America would have an incentive to reduce carbon emissions, because when they go under those limits they can sell the balance of permitted emissions for cash. As never before, the market would reward any person or company that seeks to invent, improve, or acquire alternatives to carbon-based energy. It is very hard to picture venture capitalists, corporate planners, small businesses and environmentalists all working to the same good purpose. But such cooperation is actually possible in the case of climate change, and this reform will set it in motion.

The people of this country have a genius for adapting, solving problems, and inventing new and better ways to accomplish our goals. But the federal government can't just summon those talents by command -- only the free market can draw them out. A cap-and-trade policy will send a signal that will be heard and welcomed all across the American economy. Those who want clean coal technology, more wind and solar, nuclear power, biomass and bio-fuels will have their opportunity through a new market that rewards those and other innovations in clean energy. The market will evolve, too, by requiring sensible reductions in greenhouse gases, but also by allowing full flexibility in how industry meets that requirement. Entrepreneurs and firms will know which energy investments they should make. And the highest rewards will go to those who make the smartest, safest, most responsible choices. A cap-and-trade reform wi ll also create a profitable opportunity for rural America to receive market-based payments -- instead of government subsidies -- for the conservation practices that store carbon in the soils of our nation's farms.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We will cap emissions according to specific goals, measuring progress by reference to past carbon emissions. By the year 2012, we will seek a return to 2005 levels of emission, by 2020, a return to 1990 levels, and so on until we have achieved at least a reduction of sixty percent below 1990 levels by the year 2050. In the course of time, it may be that new ideas and technologies will come along that we can hardly imagine today, allowing all industries to change with a speed that will surprise us. More likely, however, there will be some companies that need extra emissions rights, and they will be able to buy them. The system to meet these targets and timetables will give these companies extra time to adapt -- and that is good economic policy. It is also a matter of simple fairness, because the cap-and-trade system will create jobs, improve livelihoods, and strengthen futures across our country.

The goal in all of this is to assure an energy supply that is safe, secure, diverse, and domestic. And in pursuit of these objectives, we cannot afford to take economic growth and job creation for granted. A strong and growing economy is essential to all of our goals, and especially the goal of finding alternatives to carbon-based technology. We want to turn the American economy toward cleaner and safer energy sources. And you can't achieve that by imposing costs that the American economy cannot sustain.

As part of my cap-and-trade incentives, I will also propose to include the purchase of offsets from those outside the scope of the trading system. This will broaden the array of rewards for reduced emissions, while also lowering the costs of compliance with our new emissions standards. Through the sale of offsets -- and with strict standards to assure that reductions are real -- our agricultural sector alone can provide as much as forty percent of the overall reductions we will require in greenhouse gas emissions. And in the short term, farmers and ranchers can do it in some of the most cost-effective ways.

Over time, an increasing fraction of permits for emissions could be supplied by auction, yielding federal revenues that can be put to good use. Under my plan, we will apply these and other federal funds to help build the infrastructure of a post-carbon economy. We will support projects to advance technologies that capture and store carbon emissions. We will assist in transmitting wind- and solar-generated power from states that have them to states that need them. We will add to current federal efforts to develop promising technologies, such as plug-ins, hybrids, flex-fuel vehicles, and hydrogen-powered cars and trucks. We will also establish clear standards in government-funded research, to make sure that funding is effective and focused on the right goals.

And to create greater demand for the best technologies and practices in energy conservation, we will use the purchasing power of the United States government. Our government can hardly expect citizens and private businesses to adopt or invest in low-carbon technologies when it doesn't always hold itself to the same standard. We need to set a better example in Washington, by consistently applying the best environmental standards to every purchase our government makes.

As we move toward all of these goals, and over time put the age of fossil fuels behind us, we must consider every alternative source of power, and that includes nuclear power. When our cap-and-trade policy is in place, there will be a sudden and sustained pursuit in the market for new investment opportunities in low-emission fuel sources. And here we have a known, proven energy source that requires exactly zero emissions. We have 104 nuclear reactors in our country, generating about twenty percent of our electricity. These reactors alone spare the atmosphere from about 700 million metric tons of carbon dioxide that would otherwise be released every year. That's the annual equivalent of nearly all emissions from all the cars we drive in America. Europe, for its part, has 197 reactors in operation, and nations including France and Belgium derive more than half their electricity from nuclear power. Those good practices contribute to the more than two billion metric tons of carbon dioxide avoided every year, worldwide, because of nuclear energy. It doesn't take a leap in logic to conclude that if we want to arrest global warming, then nuclear energy is a powerful ally in that cause.

In a cap-and-trade energy economy, the cost of building new reactors will be less prohibitive. The incentives to invest in a mature, zero-emissions technology will be stronger. New research and innovation will help the industry to overcome the well known drawbacks to nuclear power, such as the transport and storage of waste. And our government can help in these efforts. We can support research to extend the use of existing plants. Above all, we must make certain that every plant in America is safe from the designs of terrorists. And when all of this is assured, it will be time again to expand our use of one of the cleanest, safest, and most reliable sources of energy on earth.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For all of the last century, the profit motive basically led in one direction -- toward machines, methods, and industries that used oil and gas. Enormous good came from that industrial growth, and we are all the beneficiaries of the national prosperity it built. But there were costs we weren't counting, and often hardly noticed. And these terrible costs have added up now, in the atmosphere, in the oceans, and all across the natural world. They are no longer tenable, sustainable, or defensible. And what better way to correct past errors than to turn the creative energies of the free market in the other direction? Under the cap-and-trade system, this can happen. In all its power, the profit motive will suddenly begin to shift and point the other way toward cleaner fuels, wiser ways, and a healthier planet.

As a nation, we make our own environmental plans and our own resolutions. But working with other nations to arrest climate change can be an even tougher proposition. One of the greatest difficulties is to gain the cooperation of China. That nation today is dealing with a catastrophic earthquake and the loss of thousands of citizens, including many children and students. The United States government has offered to help in any way possible, and all of us hope that rescuers will be able to save more lives at a terrible time for the people of the Sichuan Province.

In addressing the problem of climate change, cooperation from the government of China will be essential. China, India, and other developing economic powers in particular are among the greatest contributors to global warming today – increasing carbon emissions at a furious pace – and they are not receptive to international standards. Nor do they think that we in the industrialized world are in any position to preach the good news of carbon-emission control. We made most of our contributions to global warming before anyone knew about global warming.

This set of facts and perceived self-interests proved the undoing of the Kyoto Protocols. As president, I will have to deal with the same set of facts. I will not shirk the mantle of leadership that the United States bears. I will not permit eight long years to pass without serious action on serious challenges. I will not accept the same dead-end of failed diplomacy that claimed Kyoto. The United States will lead and will lead with a different approach -- an approach that speaks to the interests and obligations of every nation.

Shared dangers mean shared duties, and global problems require global cooperation. The United States and our friends in Europe cannot alone deal with the threat of global warming. No nation should be exempted from its obligations. And least of all should we make exceptions for the very countries that are accelerating carbon emissions while the rest of us seek to reduce emissions. If we are going to establish meaningful environmental protocols, then they must include the two nations that have the potential to pollute the air faster, and in greater annual volume, than any nation ever in history.

At the same time, we will continue in good faith to negotiate with China and other nations to enact the standards and controls that are in the interest of every nation -- whatever their stage of economic development. And America can take the lead in offering these developing nations the low-carbon technologies that we will make and they will need. One good idea or invention to reduce carbon emissions is worth a thousand finely crafted proposals at a conference table. And the governments of these developing economic powers will soon recognize, as America is beginning to do, their urgent need for cleaner-burning fuels and safer sources of energy.

If the efforts to negotiate an international solution that includes China and India do not succeed, we still have an obligation to act.

In my approach to global climate-control efforts, we will apply the principle of equal treatment. We will apply the same environmental standards to industries in China, India, and elsewhere that we apply to our own industries. And if industrializing countries seek an economic advantage by evading those standards, I would work with the European Union and other like-minded governments that plan to address the global warming problem to develop effective diplomacy, effect a transfer of technology, or other means to engage those countries that decline to enact a similar cap.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For all of its historical disregard of environmental standards, it cannot have escaped the attention of the Chinese regime that China's skies are dangerously polluted, its beautiful rivers are dying, its grasslands vanishing, its coastlines receding, and its own glaciers melting. We know many of these signs from our own experience -- from environmental lessons learned the hard way. And today, all the world knows that they are the signs of even greater trouble to come. Pressing on blindly with uncontrolled carbon emissions is in no one's interest, especially China's. And the rest of the world stands ready to help.

Like other environmental challenges -- only more so -- global warming presents a test of foresight, of political courage, and of the unselfish concern that one generation owes to the next. We need to think straight about the dangers ahead, and to meet the problem with all the resources of human ingenuity at our disposal. We Americans like to say that there is no problem we can't solve, however complicated, and no obstacle we cannot overcome if we meet it together. I believe this about our country. I know this about our country. And now it is time for us to show those qualities once again.

Thank you.

--
Cammie L. Croft
Tracking/Media Monitoring Director
Progressive Media USA
ccroft@progressivemediausa.org
202-609-7679 (office)
206-999-3064 (cell)
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Cassandra Butts" <cbutts.obama08@gmail.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 9/24/2008 8:19:46 AM
Subject: Re: Energy and EPA names

Very helpful. Will add and subtract.

On Wed, Sep 24, 2008 at 3:18 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:

One more for epa dianna farrell of mckinsey global.

On 9/24/08, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:
> Gee, pershing are asst sec types not higher. Holstein maybe as deputy > not top job. Jackson has a good rep, AA woman, should be considered.
> Immelt seems impossible to me. Maybe commerce but very unlikely at > energy.
> I'd add Tom Steyer, Farallon Capital, Tim Wirth, maybe mayor > hickenlooper of denver.
> At epa 3 more katie mcginty, just left pa enviro office, ian bowles, > mass epa, dan esty at yale.
>
>
> On 9/24/08, Cassandra Butts <cbutts.obama08@gmail.com > wrote:
>> John, to follow are some of the names that have come us as we have >> consulted >> on top candidates for Energy and EPA. We'd appreciate your thoughts and >> additions. Needless to say, your name has come up repeatedly in our >> consultations. Best, Cassandra
>>
>> Energy
>>
>> -Frampton, George
>> -Gee, Robert W.: From 1997 to 2000 he served as Assistant Secretary for >> Policy and International Affairs and as Assistant Secretary for Fossil >> Energy of the U.S. Department of Energy; oversaw the operation of the >> Strategic Petroleum Reserve, and the national research program to develop >> and demonstrate advanced clean coal, natural gas, and petroleum >> technologies.
>> -Jackson, Shirley Ann: Former chair of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission; >> current president of Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute
>> -Holstein, Elgie
>> -Immelt, Jeff
>> -Pershing, Jonathan
>> -Schwarzenegger, Arnold
>> -Schweitzer, Brian
>>
>> EPA
>>
>> -Bloomberg, Michael
>> -Gregoire, Christine
>> -Grumet, Jason
>> -Hayes, David
>> -Learner, Howard: executive director of the Environmental Law and Policy >> Center, a Chicago-based environmental legal advocacy group that has been a >> key player in setting up the region's cap-and-trade program for global >> warming.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

>> -Sebelius, Kathleen
>> -Stern, Todd
>>
>
> --
> Sent from Gmail for mobile | mobile.google.com
>

--
Sent from Gmail for mobile | mobile.google.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	5/10/2015 2:13:58 AM
Subject:	News Clips 5.9-10.15
Attachments:	H4A Clips 5.10.15.docx

H4A Press Clips

May 9-10, 2015

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS

This weekend Hillary Clinton attended a fundraising event in San Francisco where she was "She was on fire," said one Democratic donor who joined the crowd of about 200 at a $2,700 per person fundraiser at the home of eBay CEO John Donahoe and his wife, Eileen, a former ambassador. "She was erudite, compassionate, funny...I came away saying, "Bring on the f#4%ing debates."

Canada based CHAI disclosed the names of 21 of its largest donors after facing scrutiny for keeping the names of its donors secret. Friday, Giustra released a new analysis from a Canadian law firm supporting his position that he cannot disclose his group's donors without their written permission, the second such advisory notice he has publicized

There is some speculation on what the outcome of the House vote on the 20-week abortion limit will be and suggest it will draw another line in the sand for the 2016 election and will be the "defining abortion issue of the 2016 elections.". Polls indicate that American voters support a ban on late-term abortion by a wide margin. A Quinnipiac poll from November 2014 found 60 percent supported the bill passed in 2013 that "would ban virtually all abortions nationwide after 20 weeks of pregnancy, except in cases of rape and incest that are reported to authorities "

Hillary Clinton's appearance before the House select committee investigating the 2012 terrorist attacks in Benghazi will likely be delayed if the panel does not gain access to U.S. Department of State emails.

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS..... 1

TODAY'S KEY STORIES..... 3

Canadian Clinton Foundation affiliate discloses some donors // WaPo // Brendan McDermid - May 8, 2015.. 3

Hillary "on fire" at Portola Valley fundraiser, Dems say // SF Chronicle // Carla Marinucci - May 9, 2015.... 4

House to Vote on 20-Week Abortion Limit Next Week // The Weekly Standard // Michael Warren - May 8, 2015 5

Hillary Clinton's Benghazi testimony likely to be delayed // POLITICO // Lauren French - May 8, 2015..... 8

The surprising strategy behind Hillary Clinton's liberal moves // Vox // Jonathan Allen - May 8, 2015..... 9

SOCIAL MEDIA..... 10

Dan Merica (5:32pm) May 9, 2015 @danmericaCNN: David Axelrod says Clinton campaign will start to feel pressure on access when it becomes a "meme in the press." "I think you do feel that."..... 10

Maggie Haberman (11:59) May 9, 2015 @maggieNYT: Jeffrey Sachs criticizes "ad hoc" nature of Clinton

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Foundation work nytimes.com/politics/first … 10

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 11

Why Hillary Clinton's Democratic Opponents Only Throw Softballs // TIME // Sam Frizell - May 8, 2015 11

Clinton campaign moves in on the metro while Republicans prepare for multiple candidates // Indianola Record-Herald // Paige Godden - May 8, 2015 13

Democrats Relish Hillary Clinton's Embrace of Cultural Issues // NYT // Maggie Haberman - May 8, 2015 15

Inside the 'Clinton Cash' war room // POLITICO // Annie Karni - May 8, 2015..... 16

Top Economist Sees Clinton Money Machine as Problematic // NYT // Alan Rappeport - May 8, 2015..... 19

Hillary Clinton Caps L.A. Fundraising at Home of Haim Saban // Variety // Ted Johnson - May 8, 2015... 20

Three Areas Where Hillary Clinton Is Running Against Her Husband's Legacy // BuzzFeed News // Andrew Kaczynski and Christopher Massie -May 8, 2015 21

Debunking Hillary Clinton's liberal 'problem' // WaPo // Chris Cillizza - May 7, 2015..... 26

Bush nods to early states and general election battlegrounds, Clinton sticks to primary path // AP // Thomas Beaumont and Julie Pace - May 7, 2015 27

Hillary's State Dept. aides consulted on Bill's speeches // POLITICO // Josh Gerstein - May 8, 2015..... 29

Rancor marks Benghazi panel's first year of work // Greenville Online // Mary Troyan - May 8, 2015..... 34

Hillary Clinton's Hill Whisperer // National Journal // Sarah Mimms - May 8, 2015..... 37

Hillary Clinton to attend Chicago fundraisers in late May // CNN // Dan Merica - May 9, 2015..... 40

Why Character Attacks on Hillary Won't Work // Daily Beast // Jeff Greenfield - May 9, 2015..... 41

Hillary Clinton under fire in South Carolina for being 'old, white and rich' as Republican presidential hopefuls pile on the Democratic front-runner // Daily Mail // David Martosko - May 9, 2015..... 42

Chelsea Clinton is no longer off limits // The Telegraph // Peter Foster - May 10, 2015..... 44

GOP slow-plays Benghazi investigation // The Hill // Scott Wong and Martin Matishak - May 9, 2015..... 46

British Election Good News For Hillary Clinton, Cameron Aide Says // BuzzFeed News // Ben Smith - May 8, 2015 49

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 50

Deval Patrick: The Man Who Isn't Running For President // BuzzFeed News // Darren Sands - May 8, 2015 50

Lincoln Chafee Is Trying to Re-Run Obama's 2008 Playbook // TIME // Tessa Berenson - May 8, 2015.... 57

The exception to Bernie Sanders' liberalism // MSNBC // Steve Benen - May 8, 2015..... 58

Josh Earnest is wrong; Obama's job on immigration not over // The Hill // Cesar Vargas - May 8, 2015..... 59

De Blasio's National "Contract With America" Strategy Leaks // Daily Beast // May 8, 2015..... 60

GOP..... 62

Chris Christie got into an epic shouting match with a radio host who compared him to Bernie Madoff // Business Insider // Colin Campbell - May 8, 2015 62

The Big Issue Haunting Top Republican Presidential Hopefuls This Weekend // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur - May 8, 2015 63

Ohio Governor John Kasich's positive politics, even with Hillary Clinton // Boston Globe // Scot Lehigh - May 8,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2015 64

Scott Walker heads to Israel // Washington Examiner // Ryan Lovelace - May 8, 2015..... 65

Mike Huckabee's Message Is As Formidable As Jeb Bush's Money // National Journal // Josh Kraushaar - May 8, 2015 67

For Sen. Marco Rubio, a question of friendship vs. politics // WaPo // Ben Terris - May 8, 2015..... 68

NBC/Telemundo Republican Debate Set For Feb. 26 // NBC News // Mark Murray - May 8, 2015..... 72

Obama Calls Elizabeth Warren 'Absolutely Wrong' on Trade Deal // NYT // Peter Baker - May 9, 2015.... 72

Bernie Sanders perfectly sums up why elites love apathetic voters // Salon // Zaid Jilani - May 9, 2015..... 73

Jeb Bush Casts Wide Net on Religious Liberty in Address // TIME // Zeke J Miller - May 9, 2015..... 74

Jeb Bush's $100M May // POLITCO // Alex Isenstadt - May 8, 2015..... 75

Fiorina Promises to Restore Possibilities // Iowa Public Radio // Kathleen Perkins and Dean Borg - May 8, 2015 78

Bobby Jindal Offers Rare Praise for Hillary Clinton // NYT // Nick Coransanti - May 9, 2015..... 79

Ben Carson on God, Country, and His Ailing Mom // NYT // Nick Coransanti - May 9, 2015..... 79

Billionaire Lifts Marco Rubio, Politically and Personally // NYT // Michael Barbaro and Steve Eder - May 9, 2015 80

Scott Walker Woos South Carolina G.O.P. With Tough Talk on Terror // NYT // Nick Corasanti - May 9, 2015 84

Walker: I'd end sequester, not cut military // McClatchy // David Lightman - May 9, 2015..... 85

Republican Hopefuls Push a Muscular Foreign Policy // NYT // Nick Corasanti - May 9, 2015..... 87

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS..... 88

The Beauty of a Big GOP Field // Real Clear Politics // Senator Joe Lieberman & Governor Jon M. Huntsman, Jr. - May 9, 2015 88

The Battle for DuPont // NYT // Joe Nocera - May 8 2015..... 90

TOP NEWS..... 91

Domestic..... 91

At least 1 death reported after tornadoes hit northern Texas // AP // May 9, 2015..... 91

Suspects in Freddie Gray Case: A Portrait of Baltimore Police in Miniature // NYT // Cheryl Gay Stolberg and Richard A. Oppel, Jr. - May 9, 2015 93

US created 223,000 jobs in Apr vs. 224,000 expected; unemployment rate at 5.4% // CNBC // John Melloy - May 8, 2015 97

Justice Department Launches Civil Rights Probe Of Baltimore Police // Reuters // Julia Edwards - May 8, 2015 98

State Legislatures Put Up Flurry of Roadblocks to Abortion // NYT // Frances Robles - May 8, 2015..... 99

Frustrated Jury in Etan Patz Trial, but No Rancor for the Holdout // NYT // Russ Buettner - May 8, 2015 101

International..... 104

In Liberia, Ebola outbreak is declared officially over // WaPo // Peter Halley - May 9, 2015..... 104

Gunfire, explosions in Macedonia as police battle 'armed group' // Reuters // Ogenen Teofilovski - May 9,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2015 106

Liberia, Ravaged by Ebola, Faces a Future Without It // NYT // Norimitsu Onishi - May 8, 2015..... 108

A Dark Election Day for U.K.'s Pollsters // WSJ // Charles Forelle - May 8, 2015..... 112

VE Day anniversary: Party leaders join in Cenotaph ceremony // BBC// Sarah Campbell - May 8, 2015.... 115

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Canadian Clinton Foundation affiliate discloses some donors // WaPo // Brendan McDermid - May 8, 2015

A Canadian charity affiliated with the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation on Friday disclosed the names of 21 of its largest donors after facing scrutiny for keeping the names of its donors secret.

Officials with the Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership, which is based in Vancouver, B.C., said they were keeping with Canadian law in refusing to release names of donors without written permission. But the lack of disclosure appeared to conflict with the Clinton Foundation's 2008 pledge to make annual disclosures of all of its donors.

The disclosure issue with the previously obscure Canadian group has proven to be just one foundation-related headache that has faced the Clintons as Hillary Rodham Clinton has launched her presidential candidacy.

The Canadian group was founded in 2007 by Frank Giustra, a Canadian mining magnate who pledged $100 million to help the Clinton Foundation spark economic development in impoverished regions of the world. The group transfers much of its annual revenue to the Clinton Foundation in New York. A spokeswoman for Giustra said earlier this month that 1,100 people had donated to the group, though most were one-time small-dollar donors who contributed as part of a major 2008 gala for the charity. Giustra had said earlier this month that he was seeking permission from his largest donors to reveal their names.

Donors whose names were posted to the Web site of the group Friday included Ian Telfer, a Giustra friend who formerly chaired the company Uranium One. A recent New York Times story recounted how the State Department under Hillary Rodham Clinton signed off on the sale of Uranium One to a Russian state-owned company. Her aides have said she was not personally involved in the decision, which involved multiple government agencies.

Other Giustra colleagues from the mining industry are also on the list, including Sergey Kurzin, who worked with Giustra on a deal to buy uranium in Kazakhstan in 2005. The deal closed days after Giustra had dinner with Bill Clinton and the country's president. Giustra has said Clinton was not involved.

Also Friday, Giustra released a new analysis from a Canadian law firm supporting his position that he cannot disclose his group's donors without their written permission, the second such advisory notice he has publicized.

But here's the full list of donors made public so far:

Frank Giustra

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

B2Gold Corp.

Stephen Dattels

Endeavour Mining Corp.

Fernwood Foundation

Fiore Management & Advisory Corp.

GMP Securities

Gran Colombia Gold Corp.

Griffiths McBurney Canada Corp.

Gord & Katherine Keep

Sergey Kurzin

Alison Lawton

Sam Magid

Pacific Coal Resources Ltd.

Pacific Rubiales Energy Corp.

Ian Telfer

The Dragon Group of Companies

The Radcliffe Foundation

Anna Wallner

Trevor Wilson

Neil Woodyer

Hillary “on fire” at Portola Valley fundraiser, Dems say // SF Chronicle // Carla Marinucci - May 9, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton talked about foreign policy, joked about dying her hair, and spoke about the passing of David Goldberg, the husband of Facebook COO Sheryl Sandberg, during her stop in Portola Valley today, according to an insider on the scene.

“She was on fire,” said one Democratic donor who joined the crowd of about 200 at a $2,700 per person fundraiser at the home of eBay CEO John Donahoe and his wife, Eileen, a former ambassador. “She was erudite, compassionate, funny…I came away saying, “Bring on the f#4%ing debates.”

The donor at the fundraiser didn’t want to be named for publication, and is a longtime Democrat — one who backed Barack Obama over Clinton in the 2008 election.

The backer said that Clinton’s appearance in Portola Valley included a wide-ranging discussion of issues, and questions from the audience, and even a joke about what would happen if she made it to the White House. To laughs from the crowd, she quipped: “Let me just tell you, I have been dying my hair for decades..you will never see me go gray.”

Both she and Donahoe referenced the passing of Goldberg, 47, an event that stunned Silicon Valley last week.

But the most memorable moment came when Clinton got an emotional question from a high school girl, who asked her to address the pressures that teens are under — and the epidemic of teenage suicides, said the donor.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's "very impressive" detailed response showed both compassion and knowledge of the issue, and included "referencing programs around the world that have been successful" in dealing with the devastating issue, including one in Israel, the guest said.

Clinton stayed until the very end in Portola Valley, and "even in the hot sun, she stopped and greeted every single person there and took a picture with all of them — including the wait staff," the backer said.

Asked if there were any doubts in the monied donor crowd about Clinton in the wake of recent headlines about emails and the Clinton Foundation donations, the supporter said, "If she had been unpolished, unprepared," or too scripted at the Portola Valley event, some of the Silicon Valley insiders might have been feeling shaky.

But "she was amazing…she did it in a way that just brought us in," on issues ranging from foreign policy to income inequality, the donor said. "It was as if it was a month before the election and she had had six months of debate prep…she was at the top of her game."

House to Vote on 20-Week Abortion Limit Next Week // The Weekly Standard // Michael Warren - May 8, 2015

The House of Representatives will vote on a bill next week that would ban nearly all late-term abortions, House majority leader Kevin McCarthy tells THE WEEKLY STANDARD. The legislation would establish a national limit on abortion at 20 weeks after conception—five months into pregnancy—which is the gestational age at which infants can of feel pain and survive long-term if born prematurely.

"Life is precious and we must do everything we can to fight for it and protect it," said McCarthy, a California Republican. "Our commitment for the House to consider this important legislation has been steadfast and I am proud of the work of our members to prepare this bill for House consideration next week."

In 2013, the House passed the bill, called the "Pain Capable Unborn Child Protection Act," which included exceptions in the cases of rape, incest, and when a physical health issue endangers the life of the mother. But an effort to pass identical legislation in the new Congress was scrapped in January on the eve of the annual March for Life because some GOP members, led publicly by Rep. Renee Ellmers of North Carolina, objected to the bill's reporting requirement for late-term abortions in the case of rape. The bill required the crime to be reported to law enforcement officials at any point prior to performing a late-term abortion.

According to House Republicans, that requirement has been removed from the bill. Instead, the legislation requires abortion doctors to ensure that victims have received either medical treatment or licensed counseling at least 48 hours prior to the late-term procedure. With that change, the bill has assuaged the concerns of those Republican members while still garnering strong support of national pro-life groups, including the National Right to Life Committee and the Susan B. Anthony List.

"I'm proud we've gotten to a point where we found a consensus between our members and the pro-life groups out there," said Rep. Diane Black of Tennessee.

"We will have even stronger support than we did in the last Congress," said Rep. Chris Smith of New Jersey, a leading pro-life advocate in the House. "It will be good to have a truly unified pro-life conference."

National Right to Life Committee president Carol Tobias worked closely with Republican leadership staff members and met Thursday with McCarthy. “I felt very comfortable working with leadership staff,” said Tobias. “We were working as allies.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We are thankful to our pro-life allies on the Hill, including House GOP leadership and the Congressional Pro-Life Women’s Caucus, who have tirelessly worked to bring this bill to a vote," said Marjorie Dannenfelser, president of the Susan B. Anthony List. "This process has yielded a strong bill which we expect to pass next week with enthusiastic bipartisan support."

Smith suggested up to three pro-life House Democrats could support this bill:Dan Lipinski of Illinois, Collin Peterson of Minnesota, and Henry Cuellar of Texas, all three of whom voted for the 2013 legislation. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina is sponsoring related legislation in the Senate. President Obama vowed earlier this year to veto a pain-capable abortion ban, saying the legislation "disregards women’s health and rights, the role doctors play in their patients’ health care decisions, and the Constitution."

The new House bill also has some added provisions that Republican sources say aim to protect the lives of infants and the well-being of mothers. These include protections for infants born alive in the process of an abortion, an informed consent form for those women seeking an abortion that describes the law and the gestational age of the child in the womb, and empowerment of women with a civil right of action against abortion providers who fail to comply with the law.

Many of these provisions address issues raised during and after the investigation and trial of Philadelphia abortionist Kermit Gosnell, who was convicted of murder for killing born-alive infants.

The Gosnell story, with its gruesome details of unsanitary conditions and the routine killing of infants with scissors, has greatly influenced the legislation. The House will vote on the bill on or around the two-year anniversary of Gosnell’s May 13, 2013, conviction.

“The bill does fit in well with the conviction of Kermit Gosnell,” said NRLC's Tobias. “If he had done the abortions before he killed [the babies], he wouldn’t be in jail right now.”

"What we need to learn from the Gosnell case is that late-term abortion is infanticide," wrote liberal columnist Kirsten Powers in 2013. "Legal infanticide."

Prominent Democratic opponents of legal limits on abortion, including Nancy Pelosi and Wendy Davis, have been unable to explain the difference between the Gosnell killings and late-term abortion.

Representatives Black and Smith both pointed to a Thursday New York Times article citing a new scientific study published in the New England Journal of Medicine showing some premature infants are "surviving earlier outside the womb than doctors once thought possible."

“Forty years ago, we had a lot of arguments about where life begins,” says Black, who was once a registered nurse. “Now we have knowledge about what babies look like in the womb. It has changed the hearts and minds of people.”

"I'm here because it's easy for me to imagine these babies at 20 to 24 weeks post-fertilization age because they are my patients in the [neo-natal intensive care unit]," Dr. Colleen Malloy of Northwestern's Feinberg School of Medicine testified before Congress in 2012.

Polls indicate that American voters support a ban on late-term abortion by a wide margin. A Quinnipiac poll from

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

November 2014 found 60 percent supported the bill passed in 2013 that “would ban virtually all abortions nationwide after 20 weeks of pregnancy, except in cases of rape and incest that are reported to authorities ” Only 33 percent opposed the legislation, according to Quinnipiac. Polls conducted in 2013 by Washington Post/ABC and Huffington Post/YouGov both similarly found 2-1 support for the legislation. "One of the clearest messages from Gallup trends is that Americans oppose late-term abortion,” according to a report by the Gallup polling firm in May 2013.

Every declared or likely Republican presidential candidate has already voiced support for a 20-week limit on abortion. Dannenfelser, whose organization promotes and supports pro-life candidates, said the debate over terminating late-term pregnancies will be the "defining abortion issue of the 2016 elections."

"Already, the entire Republican presidential field has rallied behind this popular legislation while Hillary Clinton remains elusive on her late-term abortion position," said Dannenfelser. "The national conversation on this bill will force Clinton to choose between the American people or her uncompromising, deep-pocketed friends in the big abortion industry who accept no limits to abortion on-demand."

Hillary Clinton’s Benghazi testimony likely to be delayed // POLITICO // Lauren French - May 8, 2015

A highly-anticipated appearance this month by former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton before the House committee investigating the 2012 terrorist attacks in Benghazi may be postponed if the panel does not gain access to State Department emails, the panel chairman indicated on Friday.

Republican Rep. Trey Gowdy, the chairman of the House Committee on Benghazi, signaled in an interim report that the panel is not yet ready to question Clinton because it has not been given access to documents from her tenure as secretary. The South Carolina Republican previously asked Clinton to testify the week of May 18.

But a hearing that week appears unlikely based on the language in the report. “The Committee will call Secretary Clinton to testify once it is satisfied that all the relevant information has been provided by both the State Department and her,” it stated.

In the report, Gowdy criticized the Obama administration for the slow pace of turning over documents to the panel. He noted that dozens of subpoena requests have not been answered — making it hard, Gowdy argued, to effectively question Clinton.

Gowdy said last month he wanted Clinton to answer questions at two public hearings starting the week of May 18 — an offer Clinton’s lawyer David Kendall rejected. Kendall told lawmakers earlier this week that Clinton only intended to appear before the panel one time.

Gowdy has not officially countered that request.

“The State Department has told the Committee that it cannot certify that it has turned over all documents responsive to the Committee’s request regarding the former Secretary’s emails. Absent access to the server that housed the former Secretary’s private emails, the Committee has no way to verify the assertions: (1) the former Secretary has produced the full universe of emails related to Benghazi and Libya; and (2) the server has been wiped clean and is currently void of any data that may reflect any email sent or received during her tenure as Secretary of State, including during the relevant time frame….,” the report said.

Rep. Elijah Cummings, the top Democrat on the panel, accused Gowdy of moving the goalposts for the investigation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“At every turn, the Select Committee comes up with a new excuse to further delay its work and then blames its glacial pace on someone else,” Cummings said. “Republicans are desperately trying to validate the $3 million in taxpayer funds they have spent over the past year, but they have nothing to show for it other than a partisan attack against Secretary Clinton and her campaign for president.”

Gowdy also outlined the next phase of the panel’s investigation, which includes obtaining emails from and interviewing top aides to Clinton and officials from the Obama administration, including Cheryl Mills, Jake Sullivan, Huma Abedin, Susan Rice and Patrick Kennedy. The panel is also planning to interview former National Security advisors Tom Donilon and Dennis McDonough — now Obama’s chief of staff — and former chief aides Ben Rhodes and Tommy Vietor.

Gowdy said the committee has identified 60 Obama administration officials to interview.

The panel has held more than two dozen private briefings with the Obama administration, according to the report, which provided an update on the committee’s work a year after it was created by Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio).

The surprising strategy behind Hillary Clinton's liberal moves // Vox // Jonathan Allen - May 8, 2015

There's a counterintuitive reason for Hillary Clinton's recent shift to the left: it could help her win the general election.

First there was her embrace of same-sex marriage in a video for the Human Rights Campaign shortly after she left the State Department in 2013. Then she started talking tough on corporate tax dodgers. And in just the past couple of weeks she's said she would protect more undocumented immigrants from deportation, reverse elements of her husband's 1994 anti-crime law, and equip police departments across the country with body cameras.

Separately, each item is a small but significant step toward a core Democratic constituency: gays and lesbians, African Americans, Latinos, and unions. Taken together, they're a giant leap to the left.

The quickly gathering conventional wisdom about Clinton's hop, skip, and jump to the left is that she's thinking about the Democratic primary — specifically, how to avoid getting blindsided like she did in 2008, when Barack Obama took her out in the trial heat. But there aren't any Barack Obamas on the Democratic horizon, and Clinton's commanding lead in the Democratic primary field — fueled by numbers that are highest among self-described liberals — makes it hard to believe she's really looking over her shoulder.

The truth is that her move to the left is a general-election strategy that has the benefit of working well in the primary, too.

Clinton allies say one of the lessons she learned from 2008 was to follow her gut — to be herself — rather than mold her platform to the politics of the moment. That's what she's doing now, they say. While that may be true, it's also the self-serving part of the picture.

The fuller view shows a tactical decision to update her positions in areas where the country has become more progressive since her last run for the White House, and to play up the parts of her agenda that appeal to core Democratic voters. If the moment were right to talk about her muscular approach to US foreign policy — and surely that time will come — there's little doubt her team would be doing just that.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Here's the gamble Clinton's taking: targeted policy shifts will activate key Democratic voting constituencies early in the campaign without alienating swing voters. If it works, African Americans, Latinos, gays and lesbians, and straight white men (the group that seems to like her the least among Democrats) will see her as a true champion and remain energized through the general election. Her campaign views the risk of pushing away independents as minimal compared with the advantage of rallying Democrats.

"Over time, the landscape has shifted on so many of these issues that now Democrats don't have to hide from them," one campaign official said. "The data is pretty clear: the independent voters are on our side on issues like gay marriage. So leaning into them comes with a benefit, not a cost."

Meaning that, at least on these issues, the same positions could rally the Democratic base now and appeal to independents in November 2016.

SOCIAL MEDIA

Dan Merica (5:32pm) May 9, 2015 @danmericaCNN : David Axelrod says Clinton campaign will start to feel pressure on access when it becomes a "meme in the press." "I think you do feel that."

Maggie Haberman (11:59) May 9, 2015 @maggieNYT : Jeffrey Sachs criticizes "ad hoc" nature of Clinton Foundation work nytimes.com/politics/first …

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

Why Hillary Clinton's Democratic Opponents Only Throw Softballs // TIME // Sam Frizell - May 8, 2015

Republican presidential candidates are already running hard against Hillary Clinton. Hours before she announced her campaign for president, Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul released an online video accusing Clinton of "corruption and cover-up, conflicts of interest," calling her "the worst of the Washington machine." Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush challenged her on her use of a personal email account while she was Secretary of State. Texas Sen. Ted Cruz asked a crowd, "How can the American people trust her with another position of power?"

In the Democratic primary, things are very different.

Clinton's three top likely challengers — former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb — have notably refused to criticize Clinton's ethics. All three have avoided mentioning her private email account, her handling of the Benghazi attacks in 2012 or the controversy surrounding the Clinton Foundation fundraising, among other popular GOP lines of attack. Aides from several of the emerging campaigns told TIME they don't plan to do so, either.

"We're not going down that road," said Tad Devine, a top advisor for Sanders' campaign. "We're not going to run a negative campaign."

"Jim's the kind of candidate who's going to focus on what he wants to talk about and let the media make all the contrast and comparison that are to be made," said Craig Crawford, spokesman for Webb. "He won't get in this because he wants to run against somebody."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Instead, Clinton's Democratic challengers are taking on her positions on trade, income inequality and foreign policy, arguing either that she's wrong on the policy or that she's come to the right position late. When they have been asked about the email or conflicts of interest, they have consistently deflected the question.

Asked in March about Clinton's use of personal email, O'Malley basically ducked the issue. "I'm not an expert on federal requirements or state requirements, and I'm, frankly, a little sick of the email drama," O'Malley said. When questioned about Clinton, Webb told a scrum of reporters that the email story is "between her and you all." Sanders has said repeatedly he wants to run a campaign a debate "over serious issues" and not "political gossip."

Clinton, for her part, has hardly mentioned her likely challengers for the nomination or she's been charitable when speaking about them. When Sanders announced his candidacy last week, Clinton amicably tweeted her welcome to the race.

Much of the reticence around staging personal attacks on Clinton comes from her relative strength. She is widely admired in the Democratic Party, while her contenders are relatively unknown at the national level. O'Malley has been in Maryland politics for more than two decades as the state's governor and a city council member and mayor in Baltimore, while Webb was a one-term Virginia senator. A full 69% of Iowa Democratic voters said they weren't sure whether they rated Webb favorably or not, a good indication that many first-in-the-nation residents don't yet know who he is, and 65% said the same of O'Malley, according to a Public Policy Polling survey taken last month.

For O'Malley, Sanders and Webb, a presidential bid would be their introduction to many voters across the country. A first impression as a harsh critic against a widely admired candidate would likely be a poor first impression.

"If you're a lesser-known candidate and your first introduction to Democrats is a vicious attack on Hillary Clinton, it would backfire completely," said Joe Trippi, a Democratic strategist. "But if you're trying to become the lefty in the party or new fresh ideas person it helps you to get there to pick a policy argument with her."

On that front, her challengers are happy to fight.

Though not yet officially a candidate, O'Malley has been the most vocal critic of Clinton's policies, responding to each position she's taken. He has drawn contrasts with Clinton on issues like the Trans-Pacific Partnership, an Obama initiative loathed by the Democrats' progressive wing that Clinton called a "gold standard" when she was Secretary of State.

When Clinton tiptoed carefully around the deal last month, O'Malley sent an email to his supporters with the subject line "Hard choice?" and answered the question in the body: "Nope. To me, opposing bad trade deals like TPP is just common sense," he wrote.

O'Malley also has painted himself as a more forward thinker on same-sex marriage and immigration, pointing out recently that he came to progressive views on both issues before her. "I'm glad Secretary Clinton's come around to the right positions on these issues," O'Malley said last month, referring to Maryland's 2012 legislative approval of gay marriage. "Leadership is about making the right decision, and the best decision before sometimes it becomes entirely popular."

His campaign is likely to continue to make Clinton's credibility on hot-button policy issues a central part of his campaign against her. Hours after Clinton spoke at a roundtable about her support for immigration reform, O'Malley's campaign reminded reporters that he was in favor of allowing children fleeing violence in Latin

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

America last year to stay in the United States.

Clinton said at the time that the children needed to be sent back in order to “set an example.”

“When most leaders in the Democratic and Republican parties were saying that we should close our border to children fleeing violence in Central America, he defied them and said that we could not send children ‘back to certain death,’” a spokesperson for O’Malley said. “He was criticized for that position, but leadership is about forging public opinion, not following it.”

The other candidates have chimed in on policy occasionally, too. Before he announced his candidacy, Sanders suggested that Clinton isn’t ready to confront the “billionaire class.” Webb said earlier this month after Clinton gave a speech about criminal justice reform that that he had been talking about those issues “for nine years.”

All the same, Clinton’s likely rivals are keeping personal criticism to a minimum, and most policy distinctions have been indirect references. Left unspoken among them is that if the candidates lose to Clinton, any personal vitriol against her will be remembered in the Democratic Party — and possibly replayed in Republican attack ads — and could hurt their chances for public office in the future.

That means, for now, that the sharpest attacks on Clinton will continue to come from the Republican side.

“By the time it gets to Iowa and New Hampshire, the Republicans are going to be jumping over themselves to attack her. For us to get in any way associated is a liability,” said Devine, Sanders’ advisor. “Bernie is going to try to move toward his own strengths at all times.”

Clinton campaign moves in on the metro while Republicans prepare for multiple candidates // Indianola Record-Herald // Paige Godden - May 8, 2015

While Hillary Clinton’s presidential campaign is already focusing on voters in and around Warren County, the county Republicans are trying to rally around the multiple 2016 candidates expected to visit within the coming months.

Clinton, who already has stopped in Norwalk, is organizing a grassroots campaign by building six regions – which will soon turn into seven – with three organizers in each region.

Kane Miller, a regional organizer for Polk County and those surrounding it, said the first couple of weeks have been exciting. The campaign has been out talking to people, listening to what’s important to them, he said.

“We’re going to be doing as much stuff one-on-one as possible,” Miller said. “Sitting down with activists in coffee shops and make-shift workspaces all over the region.”

Meanwhile, organizers will share Hillary’s vision by taking cues from Clinton’s “long and clear record of public service,” Kane said.

Eventually, he said Clinton will use the information gathered from the one-on-one conversations to launch her platform.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Clinton campaign also has launched a frenzy on social media. Miller said the organizers are asked to give out cards to the people they meet.

Those who pledge to caucus for Hillary fill out a form with their name and address, and the campaign sends the form back to the person who pledged a few days before caucus day.

Then, citizens are asked to take a picture with another card and post it on their social media accounts saying they've pledged to Hillary.

"Right now we're just trying to engage as many people as possible," Miller said. "We need to do our part to re-energize the democratic process."

No individual Republican candidates have organized quite like Clinton has in Iowa yet, but Rick Halverson, chair of the Warren County Republicans, said there is still a lot to do this summer.

Local Republicans are working on an event for either May 15, May 17 or both to complement the Lincoln Dinner, May 16 in Des Moines. That event usually attracts several presidential candidates.

Overall, Halverson said he works to bring in as many candidates to Warren County as possible.

"We're lucky here in Iowa that we have all of these presidential candidates stumping around our towns and county," Halverson said. "It gives us a chance that most people across the United States don't get. We need to appreciate that."

He said he was disappointed by the small crowd at a recent event for Rick Santorum at the Corner Sundry in Indianola.

"If one candidate comes here and has a low turnout, that news spreads," Halverson said. "If we want to get high on the candidates' list of places to go, we need to get people to turn out."

He said he believes this election is one of the most important in the 230-plus years of this country.

"The world is on fire and in my opinion it's because of the lack of leadership from this administration," Halverson said. "This lead from behind mentality isn't working and I don't think it's going to get any better under a Hillary Clinton administration than Obama."

Hopefully, he said, the Republicans who stayed home in 2012 and sat on their hands because Romney "wasn't their candidate or wasn't a good enough Christian" will get out to vote this time around, and support the Republican candidate who is chosen in the primary through to 2016.

Democrats Relish Hillary Clinton's Embrace of Cultural Issues // NYT // Maggie Haberman - May 8, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Rodham Clinton's call this week for more expansive action on immigration was the latest in a series of policy statements likely to appeal to her party's liberal base. But her comments also reflect a growing feeling among Democrats that the political balance on cultural issues has shifted in their favor since her last campaign.

Mrs. Clinton is undoubtedly a more sure-footed candidate, even in the short time she has been on the trail, as The Times's Patrick Healy noted in an article this week. Her campaign has so far stayed on message and avoided chasing media flare-ups, and Mrs. Clinton herself is more at ease taking positions on issues that she had hedged on during her last presidential bid.

But another explanation for her newfound comfort on the issues is the feeling among Democrats that public opinion on cultural issues like same-sex marriage and immigration is more aligned with their party than Republicans.

During the 2008 Democratic primary, Mrs. Clinton's top strategist was focused on preserving her electability in a general election and not turning off the swath of self-described independents who they expected to swing the race.

But the issues on which she is now perceived to be tacking to the left — primarily on immigration and same-sex marriage — are not likely to be dangerous for her in 2016, Democratic strategists argue, because a majority of voters in the center favor her views on those topics over the positions Republicans take.

"Every policy position that Hillary Clinton has staked out so far will help her in a general election, as well as advance her campaign for the nomination," said Geoff Garin, a Democratic pollster who worked on Mrs. Clinton's 2008 campaign. "On a personal level, the fact that she is showing her passion on these issues matters, because voters of all stripes respect candidates who speak out for their beliefs."

On immigration and same-sex marriage, in particular, the national picture has changed. About six in 10 Americans said they support President Obama's executive action on immigration, according to a recent poll by The Associated Press. Almost an equal number in a New York Times/CBS News survey this week supported same-sex marriage.

Some of Mrs. Clinton's critics have suggested that her embrace of a more liberal agenda is directed at keeping Elizabeth Warren, the populist senator from Massachusetts, from running and diffusing any primary challenge from her left. And Republicans are taking note of the fact that Mrs. Clinton has changed positions on some of these issues over the years — most notably trade, immigration and same-sex marriage — hoping to raise questions with voters about her character.

But her stance on immigration, for instance, has nothing to do with Ms. Warren, and is all about a contrast with Republicans.

The strategy is reminiscent of the one employed by Terry McAuliffe, her friend and 2008 campaign chairman, during his successful 2013 run for Virginia governor. The assumption heading into that race was that Mr. McAuliffe would run a centrist candidacy in an effort to appeal to more moderate voters. Instead, Mr. McAuliffe — whose campaign manager, Robby Mook, now runs Mrs. Clinton's campaign — focused on bread-and-butter Democratic issues — like women's health and immigration — and cast them through an economic lens.

It's the frame Mrs. Clinton is almost certain to use, and one that has many Democrats feeling confident about her prospects.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This was an updated version of the famed war room that fought the first round of Clinton scandals in 1992, propelling Bill Clinton to the presidency; now, two months later, aides point to the handling of the “Clinton Cash” threat – a still-unfolding stream of allegations involving the Clinton Foundation and its donors, but one that seems not to have seriously altered perceptions of Hillary – as proof of the campaign’s ability to manage messaging and counter the inevitable blowback of an 18-month campaign.

The campaign systematically raised questions about the objectivity of author Peter Schweizer and, according to sources with knowledge of the deals, strategically leaked details of the book to news outlets to undercut the exclusivity of excerpts given to reporters at The New York Times and Washington Post, who had obtained special deals with Schweizer.

Sources close to Clinton described meetings at her personal office in Midtown Manhattan that were so focused that when Fallon’s twins were born April 8 — four days before Clinton officially launched her campaign — he continued to join the conferences by phone from the hospital in Washington, D.C., despite being on leave.

The game plan at first was two-pronged: debunk author Peter Schweizer by stressing his ties to Republicans and his close friendship with the Koch brothers, while a second group of research and communications operatives pushed positive messages the campaign would roll out while the book was making headlines.

Instead of hunkering down, Clinton would make news herself with a speech on criminal justice — where she called for an end to mass incarcerations — and a newsy speech on immigration, where she vowed to expand on President Obama’s executive actions to include another 5 million undocumented immigrants from deportation.

Behind the scenes, the strategy turned from defense to offense in late April, when the campaign caught a break and obtained an early copy of the 256-page book.

At that point, the campaign began pitching its own stories about “Clinton Cash,” and then finally turned to new media to tell its own version of the story.

Campaign operatives leaked single chapters of the book to national media outlets, sources with knowledge of the deals said — a strategy that allowed them to undercut the reporters who, through exclusive agreements with Schweizer, had obtained early copies of the entire tome, and also to attack the content at the same time.

Schweizer, in an interview, said he was aware of the strategy.

“I knew fairly early on they had access to the book,” he said. “Sure, it helped them. They’re famous for that. I was aware they were leaking selectively chapters, particularly as journalists who had access to the full book had contacted them with questions. They didn’t want to share the complete book, just chapters. For me, the power of the book is in the pattern of the behavior.”

Schweizer said he caught on to the strategy when the New York Times investigative team was working on a 4,000-word story about the connection between Clinton donor Frank Giustra and the approval of a sale of a mining company to Russia, which drew from chapters 2 and 3 of his book.

Indeed, the Clinton team was particularly concerned that the Times and Post would use his book as a jumping off point for investigations — coverage that would make it harder for them to simply dismiss Schweizer as a tool of the right.

Just as the New York Times was preparing to publish its investigation of the Giustra matter, “the Clinton team is sending chapter 3 of the book to Time magazine and other reporters,” Schweizer said. “Who gets just one chapter of the book? They gave them chapter 3 but not chapter 2, which is also on the uranium deal. You’ve got reporters running with stories that didn't have the full picture. That was the Clinton strategy: to muddy the waters and not have an honest conversation."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The campaign says that Giustra, the Canadian billionaire whose role in the uranium deal is outlined in chapter 3, sold his stock two years before Clinton was appointed as Secretary of State. Schweizer says that's only part of the story. "The book talks about nine people who are shareholders, not just Giustra," he said. "They never mentioned the other eight. They're mentioned in chapter 2, not 3."

The goal of aggressively parceling out parts of the book was to generate headlines that could be discredited before the book hit the shelves and before Schweizer went on the television circuit promoting his work.

When Schweizer started making the media rounds on the Sunday shows ahead of the May 5 book release, the Clinton team had managed to get ahead of him to put him on the defensive. "We've done investigative work here at ABC News, found no proof of any kind of direct action," "This Week" host George Stephanopoulos said of the claims about the uranium deal with Russia.

Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta and Fallon published their own posts directly to Medium, to point out what they said were errors and omissions.

During the weeks that various chapters of the book were making headlines, the campaign began releasing nightly memos to surrogates and supporters with stories and commentators on air who had discredited the book, or raised questions about the reporting. In total, the campaign put out five detailed memos to its network.

"In the last two days alone, three new claims by the partisan author of the Clinton Cash book have been discredited by independent news outlets," read a line in one of the memos.

The final push came on the day of the book's release. The campaign spent over 96 hours building out "The Briefing," a website that launched on the day of the book's release, which included an upbeat video featuring Fallon responding to the book and a supercut of Clinton surrogates and talking heads with the general message: "there's no there there."

In the donor world, the painstaking strategy to deal with the book was noticed.

"The campaign didn't get paralyzed," said Tom Nides, a vice chairman at Morgan Stanley and a close Clinton confidant who is her main liaison to Wall Street. "They didn't get in a bunker, they kept supporters up to date daily— it felt very proactive."

And perhaps most important to the donor class who may have harbored fears about Clinton's weaknesses on display so early in the campaign, the candidate herself appeared relaxed and confident as she attended fundraisers in Washington and New York City.

"This could have gotten nutty," Nides admitted. "She herself was a more relaxed Hillary. I've gotten universal feedback from these meetings that she's excited to be there, she hung around. She was supposed to be at the event for an hour-and-a-half, she stayed for almost two hours. She didn't act like she had to get back to the bunker. She was upbeat, positive, and not defensive. People tee off of that."

So far, Clinton herself has answered only one question about the book, without referring to it by name. At a campaign stop in New Hampshire last month, she dismissed it and said she expected to be "subject to all kinds of distractions and attacks." She has not addressed it publicly since then.

But that doesn't mean it hasn't been on the minds of the staffers and volunteers who manned the war room. As Clinton was speaking about immigration reform at a high school in Las Vegas on Tuesday, her campaign operatives back in Brooklyn waited eagerly on the results of a new poll.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When The New York Times poll popped, showing Clinton's favorability had risen over the past year, the team from the war room finally exhaled.

"Clinton Cash," the poll showed, had not had the devastating impact the campaign had feared. After weeks of stories pegged to chapters in the book, only 10 percent of voters said they believed foreign donations affected Clinton's decisions as secretary of state, according to the poll, and more voters said they saw Clinton as a strong leader than they did earlier in the year.

But Schweizer notes that the themes of the book have now become a part of the Clinton narrative, and could easily pop up later in the campaign — especially as news organizations continue to plumb the Clinton Foundation and its donors.

"I think they have done a very detailed and aggressive campaign to try to undermine the credibility of the book," Schweizer said. But he pointed to polls showing a relatively high percentage of voters questioning her trustworthiness.

"The narrative is now framed around the foundation and Bill's speeches, and what role did that have on her decisions at the State Department," Schweizer said. "My sense is those questions are going to be asked whenever she decides to actually talk to the press."

Top Economist Sees Clinton Money Machine as Problematic // NYT // Alan Rappeport - May 8, 2015

Questions surrounding foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation are beginning to fester beyond the usual conservative critics who hope to derail the presidential hopes of Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Prof. Jeffrey D. Sachs, a leading economist and philanthropist, said on Friday in an interview on MSNBC that the fuzzy lines between the foundation's donations and the political influence wielded by the Clintons is problematic.

"There is a lot here that is real," said Professor Sachs, a special adviser to the United Nations secretary general and director of Columbia University's Earth Institute. "Whether it's quid pro quos or not, who knows? But the amount of schmoozing involved and crossing lines and one person putting money in a foundation, and then Clinton getting unbelievable amounts for his speeches, and then contracts going one way or another, it's not good."

Professor Sachs suggested that the Clinton money machine was a distraction that interfered with serious policy and the relief work it was trying to accomplish in places like Haiti. He said that members of the international philanthropy community have been concerned about the Clinton Foundation's practices for years.

"There were too many friends around, too many ad hoc plane flights in to do this deal or that deal, and there was not the systemic approach that one needs after a devastation," he said. "That's the sad part of it."

Former President Bill Clinton defended his foundation this week during a trip to Africa. He said it has never done anything "knowingly inappropriate" and pointed to all the good work it does around the world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton Caps L.A. Fundraising at Home of Haim Saban // Variety // Ted Johnson - May 8, 2015

Hillary Clinton capped a day of fundraising for her 2016 presidential bid at the Beverly Park home of longtime supporters Haim and Cheryl Saban, as she appeared before a crowd that included such industry figures as Casey Wasserman, Stevie Wonder, Peter Chernin and Clarence Avant.

Donors paid $2,700 per person at the event, the last of three fetes that were expected to bring in close to $3 million, according to fundraisers. Also attending, according to a guest who was there, were Lions Gate's Rob Friedman, WME Entertainment's Patrick Whitesell, talkshow host Larry King, Mike and Irena Medavoy, former Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and Mary Steenburgen.

Co-chairing the event at the Saban home was Wasserman, another longtime Clinton family friend, and his wife Laura.

In tented area of his sprawling estate, Saban gave just brief remarks, and Wasserman introduced Clinton.

In her 35-minute remarks, Clinton tied her speech to her granddaughter and her role as a grandmother, and some attendees said came across as more folksy and accessible than during her 2008 campaign.

"A lot of people think she is speaking more from the heart, someone you can relate to," said David Wolf, a finance consultant who raised for the group Ready for Hillary, a SuperPAC set up to lay the groundwork for Clinton's campaign. "People like what they hear."

Clinton echoed some of the remarks she said earlier in the day, talking about domestic concerns like mass incarceration and expanded economic opportunity, and at one point quipped that she has long dyed her hair so it won't go gray if elected president — as has happened with so many males. She also quipped that "it was nice of the royal family to name their baby" after her granddaughter, Charlotte. She was referring to the name that William and Kate gave to their newly born daughter.

Clinton devoted most of her time to domestic issues, but when it came to foreign policy said that any deal needed to "make sense," according to one attendee. Saban and Wasserman, in a letter sent to potential donors several weeks ago, wrote that she was a "true friend when it comes to the U.S. and Israeli relationship." In her remarks before the crowd, Clinton did not specifically mention the recent framework of an agreement for a deal over Iran's nuclear program.

In another area of the estate, she also did a photo line with donors who raised at least $27,000.

John Gile, public affairs and fundraising consultant, said that Clinton's speech was "beautiful and crisp and purposeful."

Compared to her 2008 campaign, he said, "she seemed much more relaxed, more focused, more personable."

In Beverly Hills, some union and environmental groups staged rallies calling for Clinton to oppose the Trans Pacific Partnership, a trade pact among a dozen countries including the United States.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Three Areas Where Hillary Clinton Is Running Against Her Husband's Legacy // BuzzFeed News // Andrew Kaczynski and Christopher Massie -May 8, 2015

Hillary Clinton called for changes to the criminal justice system last week in a speech at Columbia University that rejected the "tough on crime" agenda pushed by her husband and centrist Democrats and Republicans in the 1990s.

But that's not the only area where Clinton has moved to the left of her husband's legacy. Some of the shifts, like her position on same-sex marriage, reflect an overall shift in the Democratic Party — and in the country — but many of the issues were ones her husband used to win political battles during his 1996 re-election campaign and presidency.

Here's a look at three issues that Hillary Clinton's campaign is focused on that rejects policies her husband pushed and campaigned on.

Immigration

About a week after he signed the Defense of Marriage Act, in September 1996, Bill Clinton signed an appropriations bill that included measures meant to reduce illegal immigration.

Among these were enhancements to border security, a 12-month deadline to submit asylum applications, and a rule banning undocumented immigrants who had spent over a year in the country from returning to the United States for 10 years after leaving or being deported. Bill Clinton said then that the bill "strengthens the rule of law by cracking down on illegal immigration at the border, in the workplace, and in the criminal justice system — without punishing those living in the United States legally."

The month before, the president had signed a welfare package that blocked some legal immigrants from receiving food stamps.

At the time, public opinion in much of the country was in line with these positions.

During an appearance on C-SPAN near the end of the campaign in 1996, Hillary Clinton discussed her husband's immigration policy noting what he had done "to stem the flow of illegal immigrants," including his efforts to beef up the border.

Hillary: "The United States is a nation of immigrants and I think all of us should recognize that and be grateful for it. You know, my grandparents on both sides of my family immigrated to the United States. And I think that the President has been absolutely right in saying that we should honor and respect our immigrant tradition and we should do all we can to make sure people come here legally. Because that is the important difference between those who wish to come and choose to come legally and those who do not. But that legal immigrants should not be denied the services and the opportunities that are available to people living in our country. And illegal immigrants—we should stop the influx of illegal immigrants. But there are certain services and needs that people have whether or not they are illegal or legal immigrants and I think the President is right that we have to be very careful about cutting off healthcare and educational opportunities for the children of illegal immigrants, while we try to do a better job, which the President has actually been able to do in the last four years, to stem the flow of illegal immigrants."

Interviewer: "A better job than any previous administration."

Hillary: "That's right. I mean, he has taken very seriously the efforts to try to beef up our border patrols, put more people on the borders. We were in San Diego just a few days ago for the debates and talked with the people there who are working and their very pleased at the kind of effort that's been undertaken to prevent people from coming illegally into the United States and that has to continue."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton also notably repeated a claim about all her grandparents immigrating to the United States. Her campaign recently admitted that claim was incorrect and said that "her grandparents always spoke about the immigrant experience…"

"The United States is a nation of immigrants and I think all of us should recognize that and be grateful for it. You know, my grandparents on both sides of my family immigrated to the United States.

During one speech, she noted that Bill signed an executive order "to revoke the federal contracts of businesses that hire illegal workers."

"He also said that he would issue an executive order to revoke the federal contracts of businesses that hire illegal workers. Everyone who does business with the United States government should obey the laws."

Bill Clinton's 1996 website noted the same theme of increasing deportations and hiring more border agents that his ad talked about.

Bill Clinton's 1996 website noted the same theme of increasing deportations and hiring more border agents that his ad talked about.

It also noted he would streamline the deportation process and increase deportations the following year:

It also noted he would streamline the deportation process and increase deportations the following year:

Today:

Speaking in Las Vegas this week Hillary Clinton moved to the left on immigration in an anticipated event where she outlined an agenda which included a a path to citizenship and protections for parents of DREAMers. Clinton left open the option of going further than the White House's expanded policy of deferred deportation for undocumented immigrants.

During her 2008 campaign, Clinton also supported "a path to legalization" if undocumented immigrants attempted to learn English and paid back taxes.

Maybe the first glimpse of a Clinton softening on immigration came in 2000, when the president signed a law that reopened the cases of thousands of immigrants seeking amnesty. The law, which was drafted by the GOP, also granted visas to spouses and children of some legal immigrants, regardless of whether their family members had been previously living in the country legally.

Same-sex marriage and the Defense of Marriage Act

When Bill Clinton signed the Defense of Marriage Act in September 1996, he was careful to argue that the law did not condone "discrimination of any kind." Yet, the law, which was overturned in June 2013, barred federal recognition of same-sex marriage and permitted each state to ignore them if the couple was married in another state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That July, the White House denounced the law as “gay-baiting, pure and simple,” and “a classic use of wedge politics designed to provoke anxieties and fears.” But press secretary Michael McCurry pledged that the president would sign it anyway, because of his “very strong personal views” that marriage was between a man and a woman.

DOMA passed with overwhelming majorities in both the House and Senate. In 1996, fewer than 30 percent of Americans supported same-sex marriage. By 2014, that number had risen to 55 percent, according to Gallup.

In the 1996 election, after signing DOMA, Clinton ran this ad touting that he signed DOMA and was “protecting religious freedom.” The ad ran on religious radio stations.

Protecting religious freedom, it’s the foundation of our nation. When the Justice Department went after a church to gather the parishioners’ tithing money, the government was stopped cold because President Clinton overturned the government’s policy and protected us. It’s not the only time he’s defended our values. Don’t be misled by Bob Dole’s attack ads. President Clinton wants a complete ban on late-term abortions except when the mother’s life is in danger or faces severe health risks, such as the inability to have another child. The president signed the Defense of Marriage Act, supports curfews and school uniforms to teach our children discipline. The president enacted the v-chip to block out violent TV programs. His crime bill expanded the death penalty for drug kingpins. Bob Dole opposed him and is resorting to untrue negative attacks. President Clinton has fought for our values and America is better for it.

During her 2000 campaign for Senate, Clinton said she supported her husband signing DOMA and would have voted for had she been in the Senate.

Clinton added same-sex couples should have the same rights extended to heterosexual couples.

“Marriage has got historic, religious and moral content that goes back to the beginning of time, and I think a marriage is as a marriage has always been, between a man and a woman,” the First Lady said in White Plains. “But I also believe that people in committed gay marriages, as they believe them to be, should be given rights under the law that recognize and respect their relationship.”

Today:

“Hillary Clinton supports marriage equality and hopes the Supreme Court will come down on the side of same-sex couples being guaranteed that constitutional right,” Adrienne Elrod, spokesperson, Hillary for America, recently told BuzzFeed News about the landmark same-sex marriage case before the Court.

Clinton included two same-sex couples in her two-minute-long campaign announcement video last month. She supported leaving the issue of same-sex marriage to the states in her 2008 campaign and supported civil unions. She announced her support for same-sex marriage in 2013.

In 2013 her husband also penned the op-ed, “It’s time to overturn DOMA” for the Washington Post

The crime bill President Clinton signed in September 1994 sought to add 100,000 officers to the police force and offered federal money to states to build new prisons, on the condition that they agreed to force inmates to serve out their whole sentences.

The bill passed with bipartisan support. Only one Democratic senator voted against it. (Since the law’s passage, there has been a significant, bipartisan shift on the issues of incarceration and drug policy, particularly among progressive and libertarian-influenced politicians.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As president, Clinton also signed the Brady bill in 1993 and a ban on assault weapons in 1994. The Brady bill mandated that buyers of handguns undergo background checks, while the weapons ban expired in 2004.

During the 1996 campaign, Hillary Clinton boasted about all three laws in touting her husband as a candidate who was "tough on crime." A position she would advocate repeatedly throughout years, including in her 1996 book It Takes A Village

In 1994, speaking to a conference for female police officers, Hillary Clinton spoke favorably of the crime bill's efforts to build more prisons as well as the "three strikes and you're out" policy.

"We will be able to say, loudly and clearly, that for repeat, violent, criminal offenders — three strikes and you're out. We are tired of putting you back in through the revolving door," noted Clinton at one point.

Clinton added noted that the crime bill would help build more prisons.

"We will also finally understand that fighting crime is not just a question of punishment, although there are many dollars in the crime bill to build more prisons," she said. "It is also a question of prevention. We want to give police officers the tools to help young people stay out of trouble. We want to begin to give young people something to say yes to, not just to have to face the bleak, alienated streets that too often push them in the wrong direction."

"I think as more Americans focus on the fact that this bill would have put more police on the street, would have locked up violent offenders so they could never get out a again," she said. "Would have given more prison construction money available to the states as well as the federal government. But also would have dealt with prevention, giving young people something to say yes to. It's a very well thought out crime bill that is both smart and tough. "

Clinton in 1996 argued her husband's policy was working so "why would we go back?"

"I think we've made progress. The President against extraordinary opposition that was marshaled against his efforts was able to pass an anti-crime bill that is putting more police on the street and has begun taking guns off the streets and out of the hands of felons and fugitives and stalkers. The ban on assault weapons has made a difference. The Brady bill has made a difference. And not many people know this but the President's proposal to expand the Brady bill was actually passed so that people convicted of domestic violence will also be prevented from buying handguns. So we are seeing the results of the President's anti-crime strategy. I just don't want that set back. I don't want to elect a President or Congress who don't believe in the Brady bill, don't believe in the assault weapons ban, don't believe in putting police on the streets. You know, it's working, why would we go back?"

In one speech that year, she called kids in gangs "super-predators" with "no conscience, no empathy."

"But we also have to have an organized effort against gangs, just as in a previous generation we had an organized effort against the mob. We need to take these people on. They are often connected to big drug cartels. They are not just gangs of kids anymore. They are often the kinds of kids that are called 'super-predators.' No conscience, no empathy. We can talk about why they ended up that way but first we have to bring them to heel and the President has asked the FBI to launch a very concerted effort against gangs everywhere."

In the same speech, Clinton argued the crime bill was helping local law enforcement make "progress" in the "challenge" to "take back our streets from crime, gangs, and drugs."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The fourth challenge is to take back our streets from crime, gangs, and drugs. And we have actually been making progress on this count as a nation because of what local law enforcement officials are doing, because of what citizens and neighborhood patrols are doing, we’re making some progress. Much of it is related to the initiative called ‘community policing.’ Because we have actually gotten more police officers on the streets, that was one of the goals that the President had when he pushed the crime bill that was passed in 1994. He promised 100,000 police. We’re moving in that direction, but we can see it already makes a difference. Because if we see more police interacting with people, having them on the streets, we can prevent crimes, we can prevent petty crimes from turning into something worse.”

In her columns (in which she repeatedly spoke positively of the law), Clinton further argued in the column that “the same approach can work” for juveniles as for adults and condoned policies wherein “young people who break the law are held accountable.”

“This same approach can work for juvenile crime. Communities all across the country are abandoning rhetoric for prosecution and prevention strategies that show real results.

San Diego County is attacking this problem with a comprehensive plan in which law enforcement, schools, public agencies and communities work together. There is zero tolerance for guns and drugs in school. Young people who break the law are held accountable. Families in trouble are directed to a wide array of support services. And at-risk youth are steered into a variety of after-school activities.”

Today:

Hillary Clinton last week called for changes to the criminal justice system including mandatory body cameras for police and an end to the “era of mass incarceration.”

“We have to come to terms with some hard truths about race and justice in America,” she said.

Debunking Hillary Clinton’s liberal ‘problem’ // WaPo // Chris Cillizza - May 7, 2015

One of the most persistent tropes of the 2016 election is that some large number of liberals are deeply dissatisfied with the centrist approach to politics long championed by Hillary Rodham Clinton and, as a result, are actively engaged in a search for a more progressive alternative.

Persistent -- and wrong. The truth is that scant evidence exists in any poll to suggest that Clinton is anything short of beloved (or, at the very least, be-liked) by the party's liberal base.

Take a new Iowa poll conducted by Quinnipiac University. In it, Clinton stands at 60 percent in a hypothetical caucus vote, with Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) running second at 15 percent. Clinton's standing among the base of the party? She gets 61 percent among those who consider themselves "very" liberal and 66 percent among the "somewhat" liberal. Her poorest performing ideological group is "moderate/conservative" Democrats, where she wins only 58 percent.

Take it a step further. It's not just that liberals in Iowa are going to vote for Clinton. They also have an extremely positive view of her. Overall, 83 percent of likely Iowa Democratic caucus-goers told Quinnipiac that they view Clinton favorably. That number jumps to 88 percent among "very" liberal Democrats. So, 9 in 10 of the most liberal voters in Iowa like Clinton. Not exactly a liberal problem, right?

And it's not just Iowa. The last national poll conducted by the Washington Post-ABC News, in late March, showed similar popularity numbers for Clinton. Eighty four percent of Democrats rated her favorably. Seventy seven percent of self-identified "liberals" had a favorable opinion of Clinton, including 50 percent who felt "strongly" favorable toward her.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush nods to early states and general election battlegrounds, Clinton sticks to primary path // AP // Thomas Beaumont and Julie Pace - May 7, 2015

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) — To judge them solely by their travels over the past month, you might think Jeb Bush has already plunged into the general election and Hillary Rodham Clinton has a serious fight on her hands for the Democratic nomination.

Whereas the conventional thinking, at least, is quite the opposite: He's got a real primary race to settle first and she doesn't.

Bush, who has yet to declare his candidacy for the Republican nomination, has been stopping in states far from the early testing grounds of Iowa and New Hampshire. Over the past month, he's made appearances in Ohio, North Carolina and Colorado, all crucial general election states.

On Saturday, he'll be in Virginia, which will also be hotly contested in November 2016, even as most of his Republican nomination rivals are appearing in South Carolina — an important state in the primary race.

"It's a conscious effort, as he goes through the consideration process, to talk to and hear from people across the board," Bush spokesman Tim Miller said. "That means in the early primary states and other states that would play a role in the process."

Bush's strategy carries potential risks. Voters in early primary and caucus states are used to personal attention from candidates and could see Bush's apparent flirtation with the general election as premature. Clinton, in contrast, is narrowly focusing her travel schedule on the first four states in the primaries, suggesting she wants voters to know she's taking nothing for granted despite her dominant position in the party.

To be sure, Bush isn't avoiding the early states. He's made visits to Iowa and New Hampshire, as well as South Carolina and Nevada, which round out the first four primary contests, and is headed back to Nevada and Iowa next week.

Also, he does not have paid staff on the ground in the battleground states.

But a candidate's time remains one of any campaign's most valuable assets and how and where the candidate spends it provides the clearest glimpse into their strategy.

Bush's relentless travel schedule has been largely driven by his aggressive fundraising campaign. But he took time out in Ohio last month to speak to the influential Ohio Chamber of Commerce conference, a coveted speaking engagement in a perennial swing state.

This weekend, Bush will give the commencement address at Liberty University in Virginia, a state that Democrat Barack Obama carried twice. In just the past month, Bush has also spoken in Colorado and North Carolina.

Ohio, Virginia, Colorado and North Carolina were each decided by less than five percentage points in the 2012 election, and are expected to be pivotal in 2016.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Since announcing her campaign in early April, Clinton has limited her campaign appearances to Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada. She also plans to travel to South Carolina in the coming weeks.

It's not a liability for Bush to dip a toe into a key fall election state, because such travel is still a priority, said veteran GOP presidential adviser Charlie Black.

"Your first driving force is fundraising," he said, referring to travel plans. "Second is early-primary states and third is swing states. Sometimes it's a major speech, or a national speech that's driving them."

Black presumed that Clinton would alter her schedule under the right conditions.

"If there were a NARAL conference in St. Louis, you can bet she'd be there," he said, referring to the pro-abortion-rights group.

Clinton's campaign is initially raising money for the primaries, not the general election.

But it's clear she is keeping an eye on Bush, who is viewed by many of her advisers as the toughest potential GOP candidate in a general election.

Hillary's State Dept. aides consulted on Bill's speeches // POLITICO // Josh Gerstein - May 8, 2015

Hillary Clinton's State Department aides were sometimes consulted "as a practical matter" during the independent review process of President Bill Clinton's lucrative global appearances and business deals to get "additional perspective," a State Department official acknowledged to POLITICO.

In one instance, the department's top ethics lawyer Jim Thessin decided to consult with the secretary's close aides about a 2010 request from the former president to accept an invitation to speak in China, according to documents obtained by POLITICO.

The planned speech was to the Beijing Forum, an annual education-related event paid for by the state-run Peking University, the Beijing Municipal Education Commission and a Korean foundation. The fact that two of the three sponsors were effectively part of the Chinese government raised a red flag.

When Bill Clinton's team pressed for an answer on whether he could speak to the event devoted to "The Harmony of Civilizations and Prosperity for All," they were told Thessin needed to consult with Hillary Clinton's staff about it.

"In response to the request involving the Beijing Forum, Jim Thessin is attempting to contact the staff at the Secretary's Office to discuss the issue," State ethics lawyer Violanda Botet wrote to Bill Clinton's Director of Scheduling and Advance Terry Krinvic.

"Will a foreign government or a foreign government entity provide compensation?" Botet asked in another email.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's unclear with whom Thessin discussed the proposed Bill Clinton appearance, one of several with Chinese-government sponsors, but thousands of pages of State Department ethics-review records obtained by POLITICO under the Freedom of Information Act show that Hillary Clinton's Chief of Staff and longtime aide Cheryl Mills was copied on virtually all requests.

In some instances, the records show Thessin and Mills exchanged emails about Bill Clinton's proposed speeches or travels. The substance of those emails was deleted from the records released by the State Department, which cited a need to preserve internal deliberations.

The documents, released sporadically by State in response to a request made more than five years ago, are often a confusing muddle. Redactions obscure most of the State lawyers' specific concerns. In addition, the State emails have been released separately from the original memos from Bill Clinton's office, which were sent to his lawyers to be reviewed for potential confidential information.

However, it's clear that the vast majority of Bill Clinton's proposed speaking engagements sailed through with no resistance from State, while a handful of proposals drew scrutiny over possible funding from foreign governments.

Asked about the ethics consultations with Hillary Clinton's immediate staff, a current State Department official defended the practice.

"As a practical matter, the office of Secretary Clinton was included for additional perspective on the Secretary's schedule and work she personally involved herself in. Their role was to identify concerns that could present even the appearance of a conflict and which may not have been apparent to the ethics officials reviewing each case," said the official, who commented on condition of anonymity.

It does not appear the former president ever spoke to the Beijing Forum, although the records made public by the State Department don't show a definitive decision one way or another. Bill Clinton did give at least two high-dollar, paid speeches in China while his wife served as secretary: a $750,000 address in Hong Kong paid for by telecom firm Ericsson and a $550,000 speech in Shanghai paid for by the Huatuo CEO Forum. They took place days apart in 2011.

The State ethics review process — established under a series of agreements struck prior to Hillary Clinton becoming secretary in 2009 — has come under close scrutiny in recent months as reports emerged that the Clinton Foundation did not always submit foreign-government donors for conflict of interest reviews or disclose them publicly.

POLITICO sought records of that process under the Freedom of Information Act more than five years ago, in November 2009. In late 2013, State began releasing some of its files on the ethics reviews after the conservative watchdog group Judicial Watch filed a lawsuit.

The internal State Department records released this week reveal new details about the process, including:

—The level of concern at State about foreign-government funding appears to have varied dramatically by country. Government financial backing seems to have scuttled several proposed speeches by the former president in China and at least one in Turkey. However, events in Canada, Thailand and the United Arab Emirates were green-lighted despite money from government sources.

— One such government-funded speech delivered by Bill Clinton appears not to have been reported on his wife's annual financial disclosure, as required by law.

Bill Clinton's aides sought and received approval for a November 12, 2010 speech in Bangkok paid for by the Thai energy ministry and a state-owned oil-and-gas company there, PTT. Photos of the event show Clinton stood under logos for the Thai ministry and PTT as he delivered a speech titled, “Embracing Our Common Humanity.” PTT’s role in the event is also noted in the company’s annual report.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

However, the address does not appear on the yearly list Hillary Clinton submitted of paid speeches given by her husband, nor was the fee the former president received ever made public.

The speech itself was mentioned in passing in news accounts about something else the former president reportedly did in Bangkok on that trip: film a cameo for Hangover II. (The scene was apparently cut and one actor in the film said Clinton just visited the set and never planned a cameo.)

—Until now, agency officials and Clinton aides have been vague about whether any foundation donations ever wound up being cleared under a vetting arrangement set up before Hillary Clinton became secretary, but the records show at least one such foreign-government gift was submitted and approved at State.

Part of the current controversy surrounding the foundation was generated in February when the fund acknowledged, in response to a query from the Washington Post, that Clinton aides had not submitted for review a $500,000 gift the Algerian government contributed for earthquake relief in Haiti.

But a request for approval did come in for a planned $175,000 donation from a Colombian government agency to a development program run by the Clinton Foundation in coordination with Canadian mining magnate Frank Giustra. Part of the money was intended for a spice-growing cooperative; another chunk was destined for a foundation run by singer Shakira.

The initial submission to State prompted Mills to ask Bill Clinton’s office by email: “Can you provide any context for the purpose of the contribution?”

A memo shows a State ethics lawyer later signed off on the donation.

While the records released by State this week appear to reveal disparate treatment for government-backed requests to pay Bill Clinton for speeches, the files don’t clearly state the reason for the divergence.

State began raising questions about government-supported speeches in China early on in Hillary Clinton’s tenure, but requests from Bill Clinton’s office continued to roll in. In 2009, State officials appear to have forced cancellation of a planned video address by the former president to a sports gala in Shanghai sponsored by a hedge-fund titan routing money through a Chinese-government-run foundation.

In addition to the Beijing Forum, there were red flags from State for proposals for paid speeches to the Chinese E-Commerce Association, the China Association for International Friendly Contact and a business aviation event to take place in Shanghai in 2012.

Kathryn Youel Page said that aviation event raised questions because the request “states that the Shanghai Airport Authority (SAA), a state-owned enterprise, would be a ‘title sponsor only.’”

“Does this mean that SAA is not contributing any funds to pay for President Clinton’s speaker fees?” she asked Krinvic via email. “I don’t believe we’ve previously cleared acceptance of fees from PRC [People’s Republic of China]-linked entities but could consider this variation.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We are actually pulling that offer from our list,” Krinvic replied. “It’s not feasible schedule wise now.” (Former Republican presidential candidate and publisher Steve Forbes appears to have taken the speaking slot first offered to Bill Clinton.)

A proposed Bill Clinton speech in Turkey in 2009 met similar resistance, with State lawyers asking about possible government funding. The “keynote address” planned for the International University Festival in Istanbul was to be underwritten by Turkey’s Ministry of Culture and Tourism and the Office of then-Prime Minister Recep Erdogan.

The proposal generated email traffic between State headquarters and U.S. diplomats in Ankara, as well as with climate change experts, since that was one proposed subject of Clinton’s talk. The substance of the exchanges was redacted from the released documents, but the speech appears to have never taken place.

A friendlier reception was accorded to the Canadian government when aides to Bill Clinton asked ethics officials to approve a speech to the Canadian National Exposition in Toronto. Clinton’s participation in a “photoline, speech and moderated Q&A” was to be paid for by a tourism-promotion agency of the Canadian government, Clinton’s office said in a July 21, 2009 request.

State Department lawyer Violanda Botet wrote back 10 days later asking Clinton’s people to clarify the foreign government funding.

“All funding for this event comes from a Government program that supports tourism in Canada,” Krinvic replied. “Funds have been provided in the grant from Industry Canada to market President Clinton’s appearance in key US border states (New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan).”

By August 5, Krinvic had grown frantic.

“Anyword [sic] on this? I have about 30 more min before we lose the offer,” he wrote via email.

One hour and one minute later, Thessin — State’s top ethics official — finally weighed in.

“I do not have a problem with this as long as President Clinton is not serving as a U.S. government employee at the time of the appearance and when he is paid an honorarium,” Thessin wrote. “If not an employee, he may accept reimbursements of expenses and an honorarium for his speech/talk, but he may not receive any gifts from the Canadian government.”

That speech, delivered on August 29, 2009, brought Clinton a fee of $175,000, according to his wife’s financial disclosure.

Bill Clinton got similar approval for the 2010 speech sponsored by the Thai government, for an unknown amount, and for an environmental event in Abu Dhabi in 2011, which carried a $500,000 paycheck.

The records suggest that ethics reviewers generally did not know how much money Clinton was receiving for the speaking engagements until his wife’s disclosure form was filed months or even a year or more after the events.

Spokespeople for the Clintons and for the Clinton Foundation did not respond to requests for comment for this story.

However, traveling in Africa for the Clinton Foundation this week, the former president said he needed to give the paid speeches to keep his family finances afloat. “I’ve got to pay our bills,” Bill Clinton told NBC in Nairobi.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton said the speech circuit was the least problematic way for him to bring in income without establishing permanent business ties to individuals or companies.

“It’s the most independence I can get,” he argued in the NBC interview. “If I had a business relationship with somebody, they would have a target on their back from the day they did business with me until the end….People like hearing me speak. And I have turned down a lot of them. If I think there`s something wrong with it, I don`t take it. And I did disclose who gave them to me so people can make up their own mind.”

A State Department spokesman declined to comment when asked why the ethics reviewers seem to have concluded that government funding from some countries was problematic, but money from other nations was not.

At a regular briefing for reporters Thursday, a State Department spokesman said the agency does not plan to take any action to address or investigate the failure by the Clinton Foundation and related organizations to submit some foreign government donations for review or to make public the names of donors.

”The State Department has not and does not intend to initiate a formal review or to make a retroactive judgment about items that were not submitted during Secretary Clinton’s tenure,” spokesman Jeff Rathke said.

Rathke noted that the various ethics-related agreements struck just prior to Clinton becoming secretary of state did not require any approval of donations made to the Clinton Foundation by private individuals or businesses, just foreign governments. The agreements do raise the possibility of State ethics officials advising Clinton personally on potential conflicts of interest arising from her husband’s speeches and business contacts.

Rathke said that while any omissions in the donation vetting process are unfortunate, there is no indication that any gifts to the foundation or payments for husband’s speeches or advice impacted her work at State

“We regret that we did not have the opportunity to review all new and increased foreign government donations,” Rathke said.” The department’s actions under Secretary Clinton were taken to advance administration policy as set by the President and in the interest of American foreign policy…. We aren’t aware of any actions taken by Secretary Clinton that were influenced by donations to the Clinton Foundation or its offshoots, or by speech honoraria and consultancies of former President Clinton.”

Rancor marks Benghazi panel’s first year of work // Greenville Online // Mary Troyan - May 8, 2015

WASHINGTON – After a year of operations, the mostly secret work of the special House committee investigating the 2012 Benghazi attacks is fueling partisan rancor that threatens to bleed into the 2016 presidential election.

Public hearings have been scarce, a final report is many months away, and the committee, which marked its one-year birthday on Friday, has spent most of its time reviewing documents and talking to witnesses behind closed doors.

The only work product available for public viewing consists of snippy letters between Republicans and Democrats on the committee, and between those Republicans and former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton’s lawyer over who will be interviewed when, and by whom.

But Rep. Trey Gowdy, R-S.C., the panel’s self-assured chairman, said the lack of transparency is intentional and doesn’t mean there hasn’t been progress.

In a Thursday interview, Gowdy said he expects to review 25,000 documents Congress has never seen and to interview 50 witnesses never before interviewed. He said the committee, formally known as the House Select Committee on Benghazi, could finish its report by the end of the year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We were asked to write the final, definitive accounting… not have a hearing with great ratings or provide a lot of theater and drama,” Gowdy said. “I am willing to put up with the criticism until we produce a final report.”

Committee Republicans will issue a one-year progress report on Friday.

Four Americans, including Ambassador Chris Stevens, were killed when terrorists attacked U.S. facilities in Benghazi, Libya, on Sept. 11, 2012. One suspect, Ahmed Abu Khatallah, is in U.S. custody, and the criminal investigation is ongoing.

The Benghazi committee, created by a House vote, has grown into a multimillion-dollar operation complete with staff, security clearances, offices and subpoena power.

It spent about $1.8 million in 2014, most of it in salaries. Pay is typical for congressional staff, including $172,500 annually for the Republican staff director/chief counsel, and $70,000 for the Democrats’ press secretary.

In the first quarter of 2015, the committee spent another $916,000. It has almost $3.7 million remaining, but Gowdy has said he doesn’t expect to spend that much.

The panel was created because House Republicans were unsatisfied with the seven previous congressional inquiries into the attacks. House Speaker John Boehner picked Gowdy, a former state and federal prosecutor, to chair the committee and appointed six other Republicans to the panel. Democrats, initially reluctant to participate, received five seats.

The committee has three lines of inquiry: inadequate security before the attacks, the military’s inability to respond in time, and whether the Obama administration, for political reasons, intentionally mischaracterized the attacks as the spontaneous outgrowth of a protest.

Democratic critics of the Benghazi committee say all three issues have already been explored, leading to changes in security protocols, repositioning of military assets and the conclusion that the protest-gone-awry description was a mistake, not a cynical attempt to disguise the attacks’ links to terrorism.

Gowdy and the panel’s other GOP members say nothing is settled as long as new evidence is still being uncovered.

The biggest revelation to date is that Clinton used a private email account to conduct official business during her term as secretary of state. She decided which emails to turn over to the committee and deleted the rest, igniting a confrontation over whether the public record of her tenure is complete.

The focus on Clinton has led Democrats to speculate that the committee is nothing more a Republican plot to sully her presidential candidacy ahead of the 2016 election.

The panel’s top Democrat, Rep. Elijah Cummings, D-Md., said Republicans have strayed from the priority pushed by the families of the four men killed in the attacks — better security for American personnel overseas.

“They said, ‘Please do not turn this into a political football,’” Cummings said in a Thursday interview.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Gowdy, who has asked Clinton to turn over her personal email server to an independent third party for review, said he's focused solely on her Libya-related communications. Broader questions over her email policy will be handled by a separate committee of Boehner's choosing, Gowdy said.

"There is no question someone else is going to do that. I don't want to do it," he said.

Gowdy said Democrats are more focused on how Benghazi affects Clinton than he is, and tensions over 2016 helped short-circuit the committee's bipartisan cooperation. Democrats complained in January that Republicans had shut them out of witness interviews. Gowdy and Cummings gave contradictory explanations at the time.

"I think there are forces outside the committee that probably don't benefit from it being perceived as professional and real and want it to be viewed as other committees — hyper-partisan and fighting — and that's when the tactics changed," Gowdy said.

Cummings said it is "absolutely wrong" to think anyone pressured Democrats to be uncooperative.

"Nobody ever made any kind of that statement to me," he said.

Cummings said tensions flared after Republican leaders said the committee would adopt operating rules, but never did.

On Thursday, Gowdy said Democratic members or their staffs have been present at all witness interviews, including interviews of five witnesses who survived the attacks. Four of the five have never before been interviewed by Congress, he said.

The committee's pace of witness interviews has doubled, from two to four per week. Next up: individual interviews of members of the CIA's global response staff in Libya who were interviewed as a group by a previous congressional committee, Gowdy said.

Document production is not moving as swiftly, he said. The committee's last public hearing, in January, focused on the committee's pending requests to the State Department.

Gowdy said the committee also is awaiting records from the Justice Department, the White House and the CIA. He recruited lawmakers on the House and Senate Appropriations Committees to pressure the State Department to speed compliance, especially regarding emails from senior agency officials other than Clinton.

Gowdy also said he wants the committee to interview Susan Rice, who was U.N. ambassador at the time of the Benghazi attacks. Rice said on Sunday talk shows after the attacks that they appeared to be linked to widespread protests reacting to an anti-Muslim video.

The House intelligence committee, in its report released last year, said her comments were based on incomplete and contradictory intelligence at the time.

Democrats say the Benghazi investigation already has lasted longer than congressional inquiries into Iran-Contra, the John F. Kennedy assassination, the attack on Pearl Harbor, and Hurricane Katrina.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cummings confirmed Gowdy's statement that Democrats have been included in witness interviews, but he said they have yet to discover information that contradicts previous reports.

"Witnesses are just verifying what is already known," Cummings said.

One Republican committee member, Rep. Martha Roby of Alabama, said the yearlong investigation has been worthwhile.

"We're closer now than we ever have been before... to establishing a clear record of what happened, how it happened and why the attacks happened," Roby said Thursday.

In South Carolina, conservatives critical of how the Obama administration handled Benghazi say they believe the committee will unearth new information.

"Trey is bringing order to chaos," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C.

Nic Lane, former chairman of the Spartanburg County Republican Party, said the conservatives in Gowdy's hometown will accept the findings, even if they don't confirm some of the especially sinister conspiracy theories of wrongdoing by Clinton or other Obama administration officials.

"True conservatives who know Gowdy... know what kind of a prosecutor he was and will stand behind him no matter the outcome," Lane said. "No political maneuvering or inside baseball is going to stop him from producing what he believes is a presentation of all the facts."

Hillary Clinton's Hill Whisperer // National Journal // Sarah Mimms - May 8, 2015

May 7, 2015 Eager to line up support from top members of the national Democratic Party, Hillary Clinton sent three of her senior aides to Capitol Hill last month. For the Clinton campaign, it was an opportunity to brief members of Congress on her plans, avoid any surprises, and shore up support among the party's electeds.

For Clinton's political director Amanda Renteria, it was a homecoming.

After running a failed congressional campaign in California last year, the 40-year-old former staffer for Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Debbie Stabenow returned to Capitol Hill in April as a top liaison between Team Hillary and some of the members she knows well from nearly a decade on the Hill.

Given her knowledge of working in (and running for) Congress and her sterling reputation among Democratic senators, Renteria could be a secret weapon for Clinton in keeping the campaign and the minority party in Congress on the same page.

"Oh, I was so proud of her," Stabenow said beamingly, reflecting on Renteria's performance in a closed-session luncheon with the Democratic senators. "I feel like it's one of the family, for me. ... I think she's very well-respected in the caucus. People were very excited to see that she is in this position. I think people have a lot of confidence in her."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the three weeks since, Stabenow said several members have approached her to praise Renteria and her team of regional political directors for their quick responses to their queries about the campaign's views on policy, surrogacy needs, fundraising, and more. "She understands both the importance and the benefits of having members totally engaged and also the importance of being able to respond quickly with information," Stabenow said.

"I've worked on a lot of campaigns for a really long time and I'm shocked by how good this campaign is at keeping people in the loop. Usually this is the one thing that campaigns do badly. And in the past weeks, I've just been astounded," said Bill Sweeney, Stabenow's current chief of staff who served as Renteria's deputy. "I think that a lot of it really does stem from Amanda's leadership ... understanding that folks out here are trying our best to be helpful."

It's been a long and unusual road for Renteria, the daughter of a Mexican-immigrant father and Mexican-American mother, who was raised in California's Central Valley. After graduating from Stanford University, where she played both softball and basketball for the school, Renteria briefly worked at Goldman Sachs. Then she took a job teaching high school, left to get her MBA at Harvard, and then took a job as a budget analyst and consultant to the City of San Jose, before finally landing on Capitol Hill in 2005.

At age 30, Renteria took a job as a legislative aide to Feinstein, her home-state senator. Just two years later, she became the first Latina chief of staff in Senate history, working for Stabenow.

That quick rise was fueled not only Renteria's ambition and work ethic but her warmth and ability to quickly earn the trust of those she's working with, current and former Democratic staffers said.

Nowhere was that more evident than in the fight to pass a farm bill through both chambers of Congress last year. Renteria was instrumental in bridging the gap between not only the two parties, but the regional factions of members that grew up around the bill. That kind of coalition-building could be instrumental to the Clinton campaign, as the presumptive nominee faces criticism from the party's liberal wing.

And her relentless optimism helped to keep a team of warring staffers together. "That farm bill almost died about 20 different times I think," one former Senate Democratic staffer said. "But she ... was never sort of, dour. Even at sort of the darkest times she remained positive and determined. That's part of the reason why she's such an effective leader—because then everybody else said, if Amanda still thinks it's possible [then maybe it is]."

Renteria declined to be interviewed for this story, but Sweeney said he sees clearly how she'll translate her skills honed in the Senate to a presidential campaign. "Really, the job of the chief of staff is really just to keep everything running. She was really good at that, good at keeping the trains running on time, keeping everybody in the loop. And that's the key thing she's going to be doing at the Hillary campaign," he said.

After wrapping up the farm bill and seeing Stabenow reelected in a tough 2012 contest, Renteria left the Hill on a high note, preparing to return two years with a very different title: Congresswoman.

It didn't work out that way. Although California's 21st District was redrawn in 2012 to be much more favorable to Democrats and now is 72 percent Hispanic, Renteria lost to incumbent Republican David Valadao by almost 16 points.

The loss was difficult for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, which helped to recruit Renteria for the seat. She was one of their most promising candidates for a seat that the party finally had a shot at after years of Republican control, executive director Kelly Ward said in an interview. But it was one of many in the 2014 cycle to swing toward Republicans, and the DCCC had to switch its focus to protecting its own incumbents rather than trying to make inroads in new territory.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In preparing for the 2016 election cycle, Renteria was the first candidate that the DCCC reached out to, Ward said. Ward had been impressed during the previous cycle by Renteria, a mother of two who she described as "warm, but tough." She was rumored to be considering a second run for Congress, but had told local reporters she was leaning towards running for an open California State Assembly seat.

"Her number one focus was going home and doing right by her community," Ward said.

As a candidate in 2014, Renteria did everything "110 percent," Ward said, and although it's often difficult for "doers" like Renteria, she handled the transition from staffer to candidate, who had to pass a lot of the work she typically did to a staff of her own, better than almost any other candidate Ward had seen.

The 2014 loss "was no fault of hers," Ward said.

And the California Democratic Party is hoping that the energy she brought to Democrats in the Central Valley will pay dividends in 2016, even without Renteria as a candidate. "She brought new people into the party because she ... just drew them in because she is so dynamic," Shawnda Westly, the party's executive director said in an interview. Renteria built an incredibly loyal volunteer base in the district that impressed Westly and other members, a skill she could use in building a team for Clinton as well.

The personal experience of campaigning for Congress clearly informs Renteria's work as political director for the Clinton campaign. But it also gives her another connection to members on Capitol Hill. The DCCC, too, has kept in touch with Renteria—not as a candidate, but as a liaison to help keep the campaign committee in the loop with Team Hillary.

"I'd love to have her as a candidate in a presidential election cycle," Ward said, but she understands why Renteria is moving on to the Hillary campaign rather than running another of her own. "I think she is going to do a great job."

Sweeney echoed that sentiment. "Frankly the best thing is if she was in Congress right now, the second best thing is her working to get Hillary elected," he said.

Hillary Clinton to attend Chicago fundraisers in late May // CNN // Dan Merica - May 9, 2015

Hillary Clinton will headline two fundraisers in her hometown of Chicago on May 20, according to two invitations obtained by CNN.

Clinton will start her afternoon in the Windy City with a fundraiser at the home of Fred Eychaner, a philanthropist, chairman of Newsweb Corporation and prolific Democratic donor.

Eychaner has been a longtime Clinton supporter and has donated more than $25 million to The Clinton

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Foundation. He is also a supporter of Priorities USA, a Democratic super PAC run by former Clinton aides that recently received the presidential candidate's blessing.

Clinton will then head to the home of J.B. Pritzker, the co-founder of the Pritzker Group and Clinton's 2008 presidential campaign co-chair, and his wife, M.K. According to his own reported estimates, he raised upwards of $1 million for her failed bid.

Pritzker is the brother of Penny Pritzker, the current secretary of commerce.

"Please join us for a conversation with Hillary Rodham Clinton in support of Hillary for America," both invites read.

The Chicago Sun-Times first reported that Clinton was holding the events.

The two fundraisers will be Hillary Clinton's first visit to her hometown of Chicago since she declared her second presidential campaign last month. Clinton was raised in Park Ridge, a small Chicago suburb, and regularly mentions her Midwestern roots.

The fundraisers will be part of Clinton's "Hillstarter" program that asks donors to raise a total of $27,000 by encouraging 10 people to donate the maximum $2,700. The invites also give donors a chance to "host" the event by raising $50,000. Clinton has already held Hillstarter events in New York, Washington, Los Angeles and San Francisco.

She is spending Friday in Silicon Valley, where she will headline a fundraiser at the home of Eileen Chamberlain and John Donahoe, CEO of eBay.

Why Character Attacks on Hillary Won't Work // Daily Beast // Jeff Greenfield - May 9, 2015

Why the former first couple has always survived attacks on their character, and probably always will.

If you're Martin O'Malley, or one of the other potential Democrats pondering a race against Hillary Clinton, you've been presented with an unexpected opportunity—and a very, very tricky challenge.

The spate of stories about the interconnections between the Clinton Foundation, the Clintons' wealth, and Hillary Clinton's tenure as Secretary of State have opened up a line of attack against the prohibitive Democratic favorite that was once the province of her ideological foes. For close to a quarter-century now, the willingness—make that eagerness—of voices on the Right to embrace every accusation against the Clintons has proven to be a pearl of great price for Bill and Hillary, serving to insulate them politically from allegations that were, in fact, credible. (No, the Clintons did not murder Vince Foster, nor profit from the Whitewater deal. Yes, there was something distinctly non-kosher about how Hillary Clinton made so much money trading cattle futures. No, the Clintons did not hang pornographic toys on a White House Christmas tree; yes, the Marc Rich pardon was indefensible).

The immediate instinct of Clinton defenders to attack the credentials or motives of accusers is going to be undergoing a heavy stress test with these latest stories, requiring the addition of the New York Times and the Washington Post to the members of the vast right-wing conspiracy. More seriously for the presumptive

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democratic nominee, the stories help take the ideological patina off the argument that the Clintons chronically exempt themselves from the rules that are supposed to apply to the rest of the political universe. Throughout their political lives, the Clintons have successfully—and often accurately—argued that the criticism have come from those opposed to their agenda. Now, two news outlets that embody the "Mainstream Media" so much scorned on the Right have weighed in with stories that undergird precisely the same argument.

And herein lies the opportunity—and the dilemma—for O'Malley or any of the other possible Democratic challengers: what do you do with the argument that the case against Hillary Clinton is a matter not of ideology, but of character?

As far as I can tell, no intra-party campaign against a prohibitive favorite has ever been waged on such grounds. The more formidable challengers to sitting Presidents have all been made on policy grounds. The Eugene McCarthy-Robert Kennedy campaigns against Lyndon Johnson were based on disagreements over the Vietnam War (RFK clearly believed LBJ was unfit by character to be President, but it was not part of the campaign). Ronald Reagan fought Gerald Ford in 1976 over what he saw as a weak foreign policy, created by (Dr. Kissinger and Mr. Ford"—a rhetorically brilliant evocation of "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde"). Ted Kennedy opposed President Jimmy Carter for presiding over a shaky economy with insufficiently liberal remedies.

Throughout their public lives, Bill and Hillary Clinton have benefitted enormously from the fury of their ideological enemies.

The same is true when the odds-on favorite was not a White House occupant. Bill Bradley tried to run to Al Gore's left in 2000, but never raised an issue of character. (When I asked him during a New York City debate whether he thought Gore was honest enough to be President, he said, in effect, that's a judgment for the voters to make). In 2008, Barack Obama's case against Hillary Clinton was both generational—I'm free of the arguments of earlier times—and positional—I opposed the Iraq War; she voted for it.

(The closest use of "character" came in 1992, when Jerry Brown raised the question of Hillary Clinton's legal work in a TV debate with Bill Clinton—permitting Clinton to indignantly declare that Brown should be ashamed of himself for attacking his wife).

Up to now, Clinton's potential rivals have been taking the traditional route of arguing that she does not truly reflect the Democratic base on issues like income inequality and corporate regulation. Now, they have been handed a much more potent argument: that the financial behavior of the Clintons demonstrates that they identify with the one per cent—or one-tenth of one per cent—and that their conduct will be as big a liability to Hillary Clinton as Mitt Romney's business career and tax returns were to him in 2012.

But, as with nitroglycerin, a potent substance can also be highly dangerous. Bill Clinton is the most admired man in America; and among Democrats, his approval rating is stratospheric. Up to now, there has been no significant unhappiness within her party at the prospect of a Hillary Clinton nomination—not to mention the significant cohort of voters eager to see a woman elected President. (Indeed, a recent New York Times poll suggests that Clinton has retained, even increased, her popularity among Democrats) There's also the pragmatic argument that a frontal assault on the likely democratic nominee will do neither the party nor the advocates of such an assault any good.

Moreover, nothing is more likely to rally Democrats around Clinton than the assaults from across the political divide. Throughout their public lives, Bill and Hillary Clinton have benefitted enormously from the fury of their ideological enemies. Making a case that will persuade Democrats to move away from Clinton on character grounds will be the political equivalent of defusing a ticking bomb.

Hillary Clinton under fire in South Carolina for being 'old, white and rich' as Republican presidential hopefuls pile on the Democratic front-runner // Daily Mail // David Martosko - May 9, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrats 'don't like "old, white and rich",' a red-meat conservative audience heard Saturday in the early hours of the South Carolina Freedom Summit.

'And their answer to that is Hillary.'

Mrs. Clinton, the American liberal most likely to contend for the presidency in 2016, rivaled the ISIS terror army in taking punches from Republicans at the event, held in Greenville.

The demographic quip came from Kellyanne Conway, a pollster. But she wasn't alone.

Former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, four years ago the Iowa Caucus victor, complained that Clinton stood in the way of nuclear-related sanctions he once drafted when they were both senators.

Asked after his speech if he could think of a nice work or two for the former secretary of state, he stood puzzled and then shrugged: 'Happy Mother's Day?'

Donald Trump, the brand-happy real estate billionaire, told Daily Mail Online that Hillary Clinton would 'destroy the country.'

He pursed his lips, though, when asked if he could say anything nice about her. And then 15 seconds ticked off silently.

'Honestly,' Trump said after the pregnant pause, 'I think it would be inappropriate right now.'

'Hillary's got some very big problems, I think,' Trump said in an interview backstage. 'Much more significant than people understand, with respect to the emails and other things.'

'If you look back eight years ago, she had it made. And then Obama came along. Now? I'm not even 100 per cent sure she's going to go all the way.'

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal also made a positive note of Clinton's motherhood, saying she and former presdient Bill Clinton had 'raised their daughter under the glare of the media spotlight.'

'By all accounts she's turned out to be a very accomplished adult in her own right,' Jindal said. 'And happoly married.'

But he said he doesn't want to see Chelsea visiting her mom in the Whtie House in 2017.

'The only thing she's ever run is President Obama's foreign polic,' he said of Hillary, ticking off disappointments in Russia, Ukraine, Israel and Iran. 'It's been a complete failure.'

He also criticized her recent comments that 'deep-seated cultural codes, religious beliefs and structural biases have to be changed' to give more of the world's women access to abortion and other reproductive interventions.

'I can't imagine a more preposterous and offensive comment,' Jindal said Saturday.

'My religious beliefs aren't between me and Hillary Clinton. They're between me and God. And I'm not going to change them simply because she doesn't like them.'

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jindal snarked that Clinton hadn't proposed a method for shifting the religious views of pro-life Republicans.

'I don't know – does that mean re-education camps?' he asked.

'I think the Democrats are making a mistake simply by crowning Hillary Clinton. But that's their choice to make.'

The president of Citizens United, the constitutionally famous group behind Saturday's event, called for a criminal investigation into her time as America's top diplomat.

'The Clintons are synonymous with the word "scandal",' David Bossie told Daily Mail Online, referring to allegations that she traded her influence for foreign donations to her family foundation.

'I actually hope there is a grand jury looking into this right now, because there needs to be.'

Asked during a press conference what Clinton's strongest political quality is, Iowa congressman Steve King didn't mince words.

'It's not her likeability,' he said.

King also blasted Clinton as a holdover from an Obama administration whose foreign policy stumbles carried her personal brand for four years.

'I don't know how that works for her,' King said with a shrug.

'We need to make a change from Barack Obama. The country knows that. She's partly an extension of Barack Obama. She has to defend her policies and still separate herself [from him]. That's a tough campaign for her to run.'

Conway, whose Polling Company Inc. runs a 'WomanTrend' division targeting female consumer opinion, hammered Hillary for trying to corner the market on the feminine-candidate mystique.

WIth Clinton as the Democrats' standard-bearer in 2016, she predicted, 'the gender card will be played.'

'The idea of a female president? I think it's terrific. I have three daughters.'

But ultimately, she said, 'the question isn't whether you want "a" woman to be president. It's whether you want "that" woman to be president.'

'Hillary is not a hypothetical. She's Hillary.'

Chelsea Clinton is no longer off limits // The Telegraph // Peter Foster - May 10, 2015

American presidential campaigns are always more about personality than policy, requiring voters to pass judgment on the characters of the candidates - which is why losing is such a bruising business. Just ask Mitt Romney.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's also why both parties have long agreed that when it comes to personal attacks, spouses and children are off-limits. Candidates get what is coming to them, but basic decency and a bit of tactical commonsense - attacking someone's family is guaranteed to make you look cheap - means that loved-ones are spared the hurt.

But the 2016 campaign could be rather different, thanks to the unique situation thrown up by the candidacy of Hillary Clinton.

Her spouse, as a former US president and a political figure in his own right, is clearly fair game as, potentially - and this is where it could get really interesting - is the Clinton's daughter, Chelsea.

Chelsea Clinton with her parents BIll and Hillary in Chicago in 1996 (AP)

Now 35, she is no longer the gawky teenager of her father's tumultuous White House years or indeed the slightly awkward, just-out-of-college twenty-something who campaigned so hard (400 events) for her mother in 2008.

Eight years on, she has grown into a very different figure, as could be seen last week as Chelsea and Bill made their semi-Royal progress around Africa reviewing the good works of the Clinton Foundation, where Chelsea has played a leading role since 2011.

The trip was a good example of how Chelsea is no longer just a public figure - a matter in which she had no choice - but also now a political one too.

The Clinton Foundation undeniably does good works but has it always laboured somewhat under the impression that its philanthropy is at least as much about showing love to the Clinton family brand as it is about dispensing medicines and hearing aids in Africa.

Chelsea Clinton during a visit to a Kenyan hospital to see work of the Clinton Health Access Initiative (EPA)

The recent raft of allegations about the Clintons using the foundation as a part of a hazy web of influence-pedalling has hit the nascent Hillary campaign hard, and it is noteworthy that Chelsea has been directly involved in the push-back.

“It's always about the work,” she said in an interview with Washington Post in Africa this week. “I've never had anyone talk to me about my parents in a political capacity for a foundation programme.”

Only the voters can decide if Chelsea really believes in that simplistic account of how influence works, but equally they can be clear that she is part of the family firm now.

Chelsea told The Telegraph last year that she never wanted to join the family business, but ultimately felt “called” to do so.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That decision comes with a price. Republican strategists will have to decide whether to attack Miss Clinton, or not, but there is sense in which Chelsea, once pitied for enduring her teenage years at the White House, is now part of the wider Clinton conundrum.

It is an oblique point, but it was interesting to note that Chelsea was photographed alongside her father at the memorial to those who died in the 1998 US Embassy bombings in Nairobi, taking a moment to remember.

Nothing wrong in that, but as the former US president on whose watch those 213 people died, Mr Clinton is always present in a semi-official capacity.

Chelsea's position is less clear, more dynastic in nature: she is a former first-daughter, heir-apparent, and, ultimately, lone princess to the Court of Clinton.

The birth of the first Clinton grandchild last year - also called Charlotte, as it happens - was greeted with fawning fanfare in the US media worthy of a real royal birth.

The feted infant often appears in New York gossip columns being wheeled round Lower Manhattan, and is also fast becoming an unwitting fixture of the Hillary Clinton campaign - under the Hillary hashtag #grandmothersknowbest.

Like all good princesses, Chelsea is dutiful and demure - and only her harshest critics would suggest she is not earnestly engaged in the realm of international development, often to the point of tedium - but that hasn't stopped her developing a Clintonian sense of entitlement.

Mrs Clinton campaigns in populist fashion against America's upper echelons, but as Bill Clinton said this week when quizzed about his $500,000-a-pop speaker fees, “we gotta pay our bills” and Chelsea, married to a Goldman Sachs alum turned hedge fund manager, apparently does too.

Until she quit last year, NBC News paid Miss Clinton $600,000-a-year for a handful of utterly lousy television reports that caused the Washington Post's television critic to describe her (accurately) as “one of the most boring people of her era”.

Chelsea feigns naivety about why corporations and governments throw vast sums at her parents, and yet she must know that third-rate trainee television reporters don't receive that kind of money, unless they happen to be called Clinton.

She has played the game herself too long to fail to understand the rules, and the electorate knows it It might still feel mean and gratuitous to beat up on Chelsea - and Republican strategists might decide against it for that reason - but the fact is Chelsea is no longer the young woman who moved the needle positively for her mother in 2008.

Chelsea has moved on these past eight years and - like the rest of Clinton machine - she comes with baggage now, too.

GOP slow-plays Benghazi investigation // The Hill // Scott Wong and Martin Matishak - May 9, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton has agreed to testify before the Benghazi committee this month but don't expect Republicans to be satisfied with her appearance.

House Republicans have now spent a full year investigating the 2012 terrorist attacks in Libya — including whether any of the former secretary of State's actions may have contributed to the incident — and there are few indications there will be a speedy conclusion to their inquiries.

Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), chairman of the Select Committee on Benghazi, signaled he's prepared to drag out his investigation well into 2016 if Clinton and the Obama administration continue to stonewall his requests for documents and answers.

That would mean the probe would not conclude until the homestretch of Clinton's long campaign for the White House.

"Chairman Gowdy said early on in this investigation that there is no statute of limitations on the truth. Our job is to get to the truth," Rep. Jim Jordan (R-Ohio), a leading House conservative who serves on the Benghazi panel, told The Hill. "I wish we could already be there but based on the way this administration has conducted themselves has just made it difficult.

"They're the ones who've been driving the pace and the timing of all this."

So far, there's no agreement on when exactly Clinton would appear on Capitol Hill. In an interim report on of the Benghazi committee's first year of work, Gowdy wrote Friday that the panel would call Clinton to testify once she and the State Department had provided all relevant information.

Since Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio) created the Benghazi committee a year ago this week, the panel has adopted a go-slow approach. Gowdy, a former federal prosecutor, has been thorough and methodical, while being careful not to make his investigation appear too overtly political or partisan.

When the committee discovered that Clinton had used a personal email account while leading the State Department, Gowdy called for her to turn over her email server to the agency's inspector general or another neutral third party, GOP aides noted. That way an independent arbiter could separate the private emails from the public ones.

"The goal here is not pomp and circumstance or show hearings," said a GOP leadership aide familiar with the investigation. "The goal is to get facts and a full and complete record of what happened before, during and after the attack. And that is the mandate Gowdy has steadfastly pursued."

But Republicans are also fully aware the investigative panel — and the Benghazi issue in general — is proving to be a major political headache for the 2016 presumptive Democratic presidential nominee. Boehner, whom Gowdy briefed last week on the Benghazi probe, has used recent news conferences to bring attention to the Clinton email scandal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Of course this is all detrimental to her political ambitions,” said one House GOP lawmaker.

It’s been more than two and a half years since Islamic militants attacked U.S. diplomatic facilities in Libya, killing Ambassador Chris Stevens and three other Americans — an assault that Clinton took responsibility for.

Republicans have long contended that Clinton and other senior State officials denied repeated requests for more security at the mission before the attack.

Democrats, meanwhile, have pointed out that Gowdy’s Benghazi investigation has lasted longer than congressional probes into the Pearl Harbor attack, John F. Kennedy assassination, and Iran-Contra scandal.

But Republicans have made no apologies about their slow-and-steady approach. The Benghazi panel, they argue, unearthed the existence of Clinton’s private server that numerous other House and Senate committees missed in their own investigations.

And the panel contacted eyewitnesses who never had been interviewed before, and secured tens of thousands of new documents related to the attack. Just last week, the State Department handed over more than 4,000 documents from the agency’s own investigation into the deadly attack. Congress had never reviewed them before.

The disclosure was soon followed by a May 4 letter from Clinton’s attorney to Gowdy that she would appear once before the committee, not twice as he had insisted for months.

The missive was the latest in a months long chess match between Clinton’s team and the panel about when she would make her third congressional appearance on the attacks.

In January, Rep. Elijah Cummings (Md.), the panel’s top Democrat, said Clinton had agreed to testify again on Benghazi.

But the March revelation that Clinton used a personal email server while helming the State Department complicated the calendar, prompting Gowdy to say Clinton would have to appear twice: first to address the email controversy behind closed doors, and again during an open hearing on the 2012 assault.

Clinton’s attorney, David Kendall, eventually pushed back, writing in an April 22 letter that there was “no reason to delay her appearance or to have her testify in a private interview.”

Gowdy then said in an April 23 response that both hearings could be held in public.

The South Carolina lawmaker has yet to respond to Clinton’s latest demand for a single hearing and likely won’t until after meeting with fellow panel Republicans this week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jordan and others are still pushing for two hearings, saying they'd have an enormous amount of material to cover. For instance, Gowdy has asked Clinton 136 questions about her private email server alone, none of which have been answered.

"My focus is on: What did Mrs. Clinton know? What was she involved with? What decisions did she make when she was secretary of State, and specifically secretary of State relative to Benghazi?" Jordan said in a phone interview from Ohio. "I am not concerned about Hillary Clinton who wants to be president."

Clinton campaign spokesman Nick Merrill declined to comment for this story. But Clinton's attorneys have rebuffed Gowdy's request for more documents, saying her server has been wiped clean and that she's already turned over 900 pages worth of emails.

Meanwhile, Clinton's allies on Capitol Hill insist the Gowdy investigation is nothing more than a smear campaign, a GOP effort to undermine her credibility and reputation before voters elect a new president in November 2016.

"The Republicans want to have her here every 10 minutes. It's a political exercise for them," said Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.), a member of the Armed Services Committee who in 2013 became the first senator to endorse Clinton this cycle.

"I think she is saying, 'I'll come. I'll answer any questions you want me to answer. But I'm not going to come repeatedly to satisfy your need for political theater,'" McCaskill added. "I think they'll use every trick they possible can to try to damage her politically."

But GOP senators who've been monitoring the Benghazi panel say its members have been measured and thoughtful in their pursuit of the facts.

"Let's face it. This administration is not transparent. They are not turning over records willingly," said Senate Homeland Security Chairman Ron Johnson (R-Wis.), who famously tangled with Clinton over Benghazi at a 2013 hearing.

"It's like pulling teeth, and it takes a while to pull teeth."

British Election Good News For Hillary Clinton, Cameron Aide Says // BuzzFeed News // Ben Smith - May 8, 2015

The former Obama aide who helped Britain's Conservatives stay in power Thursday told BuzzFeed News that Hillary Clinton, rather than U.S. Republicans, should be taking hope from the victory of Britain's right.

Prime Minister David Cameron is "a progressive leader" who "pushed for gay marriage and a world climate change deal and proposed to increase child care subsidies and cut taxes on the minimum wage," Jim Messina said in a telephone interview from London, where he said he'd just departed a celebratory tea at 10 Downing Street.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Messina served as a top adviser to the conservative campaign, and spent the run-up to the election in London, and said he'd slept about an hour in the last two days. He helped steer a re-election campaign that combined intense attacks on Labour leader Ed Miliband with policies — from support for nationalized health care to intervention in the housing market — that would fit easily inside the U.S. Democratic Party. (Labour, which is well to the left of the Democrats, was advised by Messina's old boss, David Axelrod, who declined via email to comment on the lessons for Clinton from the U.K. election.)

But Cameron clashed with Miliband over the incumbent's relatively hawkish foreign policy and support for, and from, London's booming financial industry.

Messina said he'd learned from Bill Clinton that elections should always look forward, and said Miliband "was talking about going back to the '70s and '80s."

He declined to draw any direct lines between this election and next year's American presidential campaign.

"I don't think this election has anything to do with Hillary Clinton," he said.

But Messina said Clinton could take heart from the results.

"Cameron showed, again, that all presidential elections are about the future and Hillary is by far the right candidate in the U.S. to do that," Messina said.

He said Cameron would likely follow Obama's example in staying neutral in the U.S. election, as Obama did in Britain's.

He said he'd been struck by the difference between the electoral system — in particular, Britain's cap on spending, at just over £31 million per party, that means that election campaigns aren't dominated by television advertising.

"The very hard cap on spending was a very good thing," said Messina, who said it created an environment in which the press had more power than it does in the U.S.

Britain has a "way more partisan press corps than what we have in the U.S.," Messina noted, though he disputed the notion that the press had tilted toward the Tories.

Messina said he will return to continue to work for the super PAC Priorities U.S.A., which he co-chairs and whose relationship to Clinton's campaign has at times been complicated.

"I plan to do whatever else I can to help," he said.

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

Deval Patrick: The Man Who Isn't Running For President // BuzzFeed News // Darren Sands - May 8, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The man who probably isn't going to be the second black president was speaking at Selma's Tabernacle Baptist Church one Sunday in March, recalling his days working for the NAACP Legal Defense Fund.

Deval Patrick has an unusually direct connection to the civil rights era for a man of the Joshua Generation: Back in 1985, he was the junior lawyer on the Alabama vote fraud case against Albert Turner, an old ally of Martin Luther King Jr., who had helped organize the march across the Edmund Pettus Bridge on Bloody Sunday; his wife, Evelyn; and another man named Spencer Hogue Jr. They became known as the Perry County Three, accused by the Justice Department of altering absentee ballots. If found guilty, each could have gone to jail for life.

He remembered his clients, he told the congregation, "as being old black people. In fact, they would now only be the age I thought they were then." The crowd laughed at Patrick, who likes being referred to as still a relatively young man. "The scary thing is, I am now the age they actually were."

Theirs, and others, was a legacy of resilience, Patrick said, and it served black folks well to remember that even in the face of all manner of injustice, including injustice related to police violence — "A grand jury can't see in the videotaped strangling of Eric Garner what the rest of the world sees!" he said, also making reference to Michael Brown — that legacy was dishonored by declaring defeat. "The key it seems to me is to be as mindful and as determined as our forebearers to keep on marching whether we are desperate or comfortable — maybe especially if we are comfortable."

The point about being comfortable recalled another line for Patrick: "Being first doesn't mean a thing unless there's a second."

The crowd approved and applauded — and Patrick let that applause linger in the air, sharp and abiding as it had been at any point during his address.

Deval Patrick, the first black governor of Massachusetts and only the second black governor in U.S. history, did no public Hamlet act over whether he'd run for president. He did, however, consider it in private, he told BuzzFeed News in an interview. Top advisers to Hillary Clinton also eyed Patrick warily through much of last year. He was, in their view, one of the few Democrats with a path to beating her.

But Deval Patrick is not challenging Hillary Clinton for the Democratic nomination — he's not running for president and he's not going to follow Barack Obama. Instead, the former two-term governor of Massachusetts, a powerful speaker with a liberal record, works at Bain Capital, and complains from time to time that Hillary Clinton doesn't have a strong enough challenger.

"If our forebearers had been defeated by the challenges around them, which were in many respects more profound, then we wouldn't get to sit in a room like this," Patrick recently said of that Selma speech, gesturing from the 41st floor of the Boston high-rise where he now works toward the state house, whose golden dome was beaming under the sunlight. "I wouldn't have got to sit in a building like that."

It's a unique bit of symmetry that Patrick's new office at Bain Capital, the private equity firm intertwined with the 2012 election where he will lead a new "social impact" investment fund, overlooks his old one. His new office is "not quite fitted out yet." For now, it's just two purple orchids and pictures of his family lined up in a row.

The nondescript space is a little like Patrick's newly formed post-governorship life so far. He left office in January — and looks little changed from years past, a bit more trim, perhaps. He rocks a bit of closely cropped salt-and-pepper haircut, and is perpetually clean-shaven. And while the 58-year-old walks gingerly — the effect of hip replacement surgery in 2009 — Patrick's appearance is not the evidence we all needed that black don't crack, but he looks good. And now, he's out of public life and back to near anonymity.

"One thing I have noticed about being a black man," he wrote in his 2011 memoir, "if you're dressed in jeans and a casual shirt with a cap on, people will often look right past you." Earlier this year, a local high school hosted a panel on the legacy of civil rights with, among others, former Sen. William “Mo” Cowan and J. Keith Motley, the chancellor of the University of Massachusetts–Boston. Patrick showed up in a cap and sweater. “I look up and see him,” Motley said, “look around and realize, ‘My god, no one even realizes he’s here.’” His next-door neighbor, State Sen. Brian A. Joyce, spotted him — ball-cap clad and being assisted at the Apple Store’s Genius Bar recently. “There was not a person who recognized him. I think he relished that.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Even if Patrick relishes this anonymity, however, he occupies an unusual perch in the Democratic Party, at the intersection of three current centers of power: He is close friends with the president; he has a long, albeit less close, history with the Clintons; and he shares a home state with the woman — Elizabeth Warren — who leaves progressives enamored and creates problems for both Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton.

And, at the end of the day, he could have run for president.

A true progressive who oversaw a major transportation consolidation project, helped implement the state’s health care insurance system, and signed into law criminal justice changes popular in the Democratic Party, Patrick was widely considered capable of winning a third term. The question of a presidential run indeed weighed on Patrick, too, last year. If some Democrats were looking for a real challenger to Hillary Clinton, why not him? Democrats could do worse than a two-term governor with name recognition in New Hampshire.

Last December, Obama called into Patrick’s monthly “ask the governor” radio show as a final good-bye. When Obama hung up, Patrick was asked about what it’s like for that kid — the kid from the South Side of Chicago — to field a personal call from the president of the United States. Patrick took a deep breath to collect himself. “I’ve had reporters asking me about another political job — even that political job,” Patrick said. “I know I’m supposed to keep a straight face and try to give the best answer I can, and an honest answer, which is, ‘I don’t have any plans.’ But it really blows my mind that people would ask a kid from the South Side of Chicago a serious question like that.”

He wrestled with the decision, one prominent Democrat said, and woke up daily for a time unable to say that he was not going to run. When told this, Patrick’s closest advisers downplayed how close Patrick got, given that there was a clear path — Obama’s path — to the nomination.

Sitting in the Bain office last month, Patrick acknowledged that he gave running for president some thought. But, he said, his personal obligations eliminated the slightest possibility. “I didn’t have to think about it very long,” he said. “I never ran for governor to be something else.”

“My sense is that he didn’t come as close as people think,” Joyce told BuzzFeed News. “I don’t know a governor or a U.S. senator who doesn’t take a close look at it — who doesn’t at least close their eyes and say, ‘Hey, I could do that.’

“He certainly has not issued any Sherman-like statements,” he added. “Would I rule him out in the future? Absolutely not.”

A close former aide who went to dinner with Patrick recently said politics didn’t come up once. He is most upbeat when he begins to talk about his work at Bain Capital. “Oh, man!” he let out when asked what indication he had the work was going to be fulfilling. “The enthusiasm inside the building has been over the top.” The mission of social impact investing is one Bain Capital is trying to figure out how to be in, he said “and the field is exploding and that is a very hopeful thing.” He emphasized field and that like a politician who is trying to inspire.

Still, even Obama himself recommended Patrick for higher office. “Deval would make a great president or vice president. But I think based on me talking to him, it sounds like he’d like to take a little bit of a break,” Obama told a Boston cable news station. “He’s still a relatively young man.”

Asked if Obama asked him to consider a run, Patrick laughed. “That’s a nice try,” he said. “What’s your next question?”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The curious thing about Patrick — a man who is not running for president — is his seemingly incurable habit of talking about Hillary Clinton’s “inevitability” problem.

It started in early 2014, when Patrick was asked outright by a reporter if there was going to be a “Hillary–Deval ticket in 2016.” He looked bewildered before saying no, and began laughing.

In July, Patrick expressed doubt about what he perceived to be her inevitability. “I worry about the campaign,” he said then. “I don’t think it’s so much her.” He noted they’d spoken at a conference in San Diego — but he added, “It’s not like we’re pals.”

In September, he emphasized she was “fantastic and incredibly strong,” before saying that “the problem with inevitability is it’s sometimes interpreted as entitlement, and I think that voters want competition and they want their candidates to have to work for it.”

And again in November: “Secretary Clinton has been an extraordinary public servant and would be a terrific candidate for president,” he said. “But I think the narrative that it’s inevitable is off-putting to regular voters.”

Patrick said, in the interview with BuzzFeed News, that he doesn’t mean that point he’s made — that Clinton’s inevitability reads to the general public like entitlement — as a criticism of Clinton so much as it was of the people she had around her, noting this time around that her campaign manager, Robby Mook, is “off the charts good.” Patrick said what he hungers for is authenticity. He also wants competition. “I think if she has a competitive primary, she will be a better nominee.” Asked if she was better now, Patrick said he saw her at a rally for Martha Coakley, the former attorney general who lost to Gov. Charlie Baker. “She was brilliant. She was fantastic,” Patrick said. “She really got to, sort of, the nub of people’s aspirations and anxieties. It was beautiful.”

That was last October. Clinton arrived in Boston to campaign for Coakley, speaking to a packed ballroom at the Park Plaza Hotel for a little less than a half hour. People say Clinton and Patrick began with political chitchat. Patrick congratulated her on the new addition and before long, babies Gianluca and Charlotte were the main topic of conversation. Clinton and Patrick got a glimpse of the other’s grandchild on their phones. It lasted about 15 minutes.

The former governor and the former first couple have a long history, dating back more than a quarter century. When the NAACP LDF sued to stop voting rights violations in Arkansas he befriended Bill Clinton, who saw Patrick work the room in a meeting that settled the lawsuit and observed, “He has a future as a politician.” In 1994, Clinton tapped Patrick to lead the Justice Department’s civil rights division.

When Barack Obama entered the presidential equation, however, the relationship shifted a little. Then-Sen. Hillary Clinton had called in 2007 asking for his endorsement, he said in the interview last month. “I told her I was going to keep my powder dry,” he said. “I like the competition.” Then, in the summer of 2007, he told Obama he would endorse him on Martha’s Vineyard at a home Valerie Jarrett rented. Run like you’re willing to lose, run at the grassroots, and keep your rhetoric high-minded and positive he told Obama, according to his memoir, repeating the occasion in the interview. (When he recalled offering Obama to use his “just words” riff, Patrick briefly got emotional when he recalled giving the original speech on Boston Common. It was an especially rough time for “what they were trying to do to my family.”) Patrick’s recollection now of telling Obama he’d endorse him is less than crisp. “We’ve had lots of Vineyard conversations,” he said.

If there is leftover angst from endorsing Obama years ago, a Democrat close to Patrick said he’s not interested in rehashing it. “He’s been a civil rights lawyer, a corporate executive, governor … he’s worked in the Clinton administration and he’s close to Obama,” the Democrat said. “By virtue of his tremendous experience, you can’t put him in a box. It’s just not that simple.” When Obama appointed Clinton secretary of state, he signaled to the rest of the party that “Democrats have been tasked with showing a way forward. So when talking about the past, some of these issues are, like, who cares? Except with how it relates to moving forward.”

In 2015, the only criticism is that of “inevitability.” The source familiar with Patrick’s thinking reiterated that it’s not personal. “For him, talk of inevitability is off-putting because it’s self-defeating. It assumes that the voters don’t matter, that what they care about doesn’t matter, that there’s no value in engaging with them. He views that that's a failure of politics and policy."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The danger Clinton's inevitability candidacy poses, Patrick noted, is that someone like, well, Deval Patrick could come along. "That was the view of the Democratic establishment in 2005 and 2006," he said, referring to his Massachusetts primary victory over two members of the state party establishment in 2006. "If you'd asked a lot of people then — and maybe even me — about whether it was going to be a really competitive primary with this newcomer, meaning me, coming into the race, I think a whole lot of people would have been equivocal. Things happen in politics. People find their voice and their footing."

"If there's a political doctrine that consistently governs Deval Patrick's actions as a political player, it's that if you want to know what he thinks, you can literally just listen to what he says," said longtime ally and former campaign manager John Walsh. "He's not the kind of guy who says things he doesn't believe. His biggest asset in an election is his willingness to lose. I've never heard him say, 'What do I need to say here to win?'" Walsh said, in a way explaining his willingness to shake things up.

Behind the scenes, Patrick's been a little less resistant to the Clinton operation: On April 27, after attending the swearing-in of Attorney General Loretta Lynch that morning, he attended the so-called "road show" the Clinton campaign has embarked on in some cities as a way to brief her most ardent supporters. It was held at the law firm Foley & Lardner LLP, according to sources familiar with the meeting. Mook and Obama campaign vet Marlon Marshall held forth in a large conference room, with Mook telling the audience even if Clinton is the likely nominee, her staff wasn't taking it for granted — and neither could they.

Other attendees included Clinton loyalists Beth Boland, a partner at Foley; Steve Grossman, former state treasurer and former Democratic National Committee chair; Cheryl Cronin, a lawyer and fundraiser; and Shanti Fry, a wealthy Cambridge activist who was a former finance co-chair for Massachusetts Sens. Ed Markey and Elizabeth Warren.

It wasn't known by every attendee that Patrick would attend or who had invited him; Patrick's comments in the press about Clinton's inevitability and her need for a competitive primary, irked some who were present at the meeting and were said to be surprised by his appearance a third of the way into the presentation. He arrived in a suit and tie. When asked to speak, he did. He said that Democrats need to speak with conviction in this election about what they believe in, about the tough road that lay ahead and the importance that the Democratic nominee follows President Obama to the White House. "Democrats need to have conviction to make sure we actively explain to voters what we stand for," he said, adding that voters are going to be have a clear choice in the election. Two people present at the meeting couldn't remember if he said anything about Clinton.

Even so, when asked in the interview about Clinton, Patrick remained almost noncommittal. Will he campaign for her?

"Within bounds," Patrick said. "I mean, I've got demands on my time."

Patrick said, even though she's the likely nominee, "I'm going to be listening to all the candidates."

Would he be helping her raise money? Patrick repeated himself.

"I'm going to be listening to all of the candidates, and we'll see."

His relationship with Obama is far less complex. The pair met in 1995 at the behest of Abner Mikva, the former congressman and former White House counsel who once told Obama to study preachers to cultivate his speaking style. Patrick, in the middle of his stint at the Justice Department, met Obama for coffee, remarking in his memoir he was immediately taken with his intellect.

Now, he says, he serves a slightly different role in Obama's life.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I may be one of the few people who called him every once in a while, or comes to see him without saying, ‘Do this differently,’ or ‘do that differently,’” he said. “It’s just, “How you doing?” It’s hard to have these jobs and know people who are just interested in you.”

Patrick says he’s pushed Obama to push the limits of his own bubble, well aware of how they can be debilitating. But increasingly, Patrick reiterated that while his relationship with Obama is of a personal nature, he does not see his role of defending the president as a defense of his friend but as a defense of visionary leadership. “The president can stick up for himself — he’s the president,” Patrick said. “My defense of the president is not just a defense of my friend, it’s a defense of visionary leadership, and that’s what I think we have in this president.”

When you speak with Democrats who worked for Obama or are friends with Obama, they emphasize his legacy; they talk about the importance of how he will be seen going forward, the cornerstones of his record, and what best will preserve that legacy — a Democratic successor.

Political surrogates with name recognition like Patrick’s are not easy to come by. His standing and political capital make him a serious and possibly indispensable surrogate for the Democratic nominee. And people around him say he does like campaigning, that he was eager to stump for Coakley last year and escape the grind of governing.

He will make speeches, he said, “when I have something to say.” And he does have plenty to say about the issues of criminal justice, police violence against the community, and mass incarceration — something the Clinton campaign has already signaled will be a part of her platform, and something the Obama White House has faced over the last year. If Patrick is interested in the defense of Obama, whose exit from the White House is actually inevitable, it may be on this subject that Patrick is seen out on the campaign trail.

After all, his message in Selma was connected to a legacy of black people who “faced their fears” and fought for civil rights.

The absentee ballots organized by the Perry County Three were about political power. “The charges were a response to growing black political power,” Patrick said.

And then, Patrick said if the heroes of Selma hadn’t been resilient, hadn’t fought to vote and exercised their political power — and gotten back up — that there would be no Barack Obama.

“Imagine if they hadn’t?”

Lincoln Chafee Is Trying to Re-Run Obama’s 2008 Playbook // TIME // Tessa Berenson - May 8, 2015

In 2008, Hillary Clinton lost the Democratic nomination to Barack Obama when he hammered her on her vote in favor of going to war in Iraq. Now, former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee wants Clinton to keep paying for that vote in 2016.

Chafee, a Republican turned Independent turned Democrat, is running against Clinton for the Democratic nomination. He hasn’t officially announced yet, he’s still in the exploratory phase, but making it official is something he “plan[s] to do soon.” And when he does, he’s going to make Clinton’s vote for war his central argument against her.

“I always go back to what I call one of the biggest mistakes in American history, the decision to go to war in Iraq,” he told TIME, “and the judgment call made by Senator Clinton.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Chafee was a Senator at the time too; he served as a Senator from Rhode Island from 1999 to 2007 before he became governor. He voted against the war, and he says that split between him and Clinton highlights a fundamental difference in their common sense.

"That was a critical time in American history, October of 2002, and I made a different judgment call," he said, again referring to Clinton's vote in favor of the war. "I think we should have a debate, not only as the Democratic Party first of all, but also in America about where we're going on in the world and who can make the correct judgment calls as we go forward."

Even Clinton has publicly regretted her vote. In her 2014 book Hard Choices, Clinton wrote, "I thought I had acted in good faith and made the best decision I could with the information I had. And I wasn't alone in getting it wrong. But I still got it wrong. Plain and simple."

Although this lynchpin of Chafee's burgeoning campaign happened over a decade ago and was already used at the center of the 2008 election, Chafee says the so-called "biggest mistake" will resonate just as much with voters today.

"We're still paying for it," he said, saying the war will end up costing the country $6 trillion. "We're paying for it financially in taking care of our brave veterans ... but we're also paying for it overseas ... The repair work goes on. It's relevant to today."

But polling data shows that voters may not agree. In 2008, a Gallup poll found that Americans cited Iraq as the second most important issue facing the country, behind the economy. In 2015, Gallup separated economic concerns from non-economic issues, but even in the non-economic poll the situation in Iraq came in 15th, after issues like race relations, immigration and education. (No. 1 was dissatisfaction with government.)

Chafee outlined some other policy positions: he supports the Affordable Care Act, he would vote for the Trade Promotion Authority, he supports a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants. But he kept coming back to Iraq.

Chafee faces a steep uphill battle towards the nomination; so far he's barely even been included in Democratic primary polling.

He said his biggest challenge will be "getting out to every possible potluck supper and gathering in Iowa and New Hampshire and other states." But, "I look forward to it, meeting the people. I started my career at the local level ... by going door to door ... It's going to be no different in this campaign."

The exception to Bernie Sanders' liberalism // MSNBC // Steve Benen - May 8, 2015

On Capitol Hill, there's literally only one member of Congress who describes himself as a European socialist. I'm referring, of course, to Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), who launched his Democratic presidential campaign last week, to the delight of many progressive activists.

And why not? Sanders isn't favored to actually win the Democratic nomination, but the Vermont senator has a bold, progressive vision, and is prepared to take advantage of the national platform a White House campaign offers. For liberal voters who yearn for a standard bearer whom no one has ever considered a "moderate," Sanders is a welcome breath of unapologetic fresh air.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There is, however, an exception to Sanders' liberalism. Mark Joseph Stern highlighted it at Slate this week.

[B]efore liberal Democrats flock to Sanders, they should remember that the Vermont senator stands firmly to Clinton's right on one issue of overwhelming importance to the Democratic base: gun control. During his time in Congress, Sanders opposed several moderate gun control bills. He also supported the most odious NRA–backed law in recent memory – one that may block Sandy Hook families from winning a lawsuit against the manufacturer of the gun used to massacre their children.

Sanders, an economic populist and middle-class pugilist, doesn't talk much about guns on the campaign trail. But his voting record paints the picture of a legislator who is both skeptical of gun control and invested in the interests of gun owners – and manufacturers. In 1993, voted against the Brady Act, which mandated federal background checks for gun purchasers and restricted felons' access to firearms. As a senator, Sanders supported bills to allow firearms in checked bags on Amtrak trains and block funding to any foreign aid organization that registered or taxed Americans guns.

In fairness to Sanders, the senator does not always see eye to eye with the far-right gun group, but over the course of his congressional career, the Vermont independent has generally sided with the NRA on most of the major legislative fights regarding gun policy.

Indeed, it's probably safe to say that Sanders will be to Clinton's left on most issues in their primary fight, except when it comes to guns.

To understand why, it's important to realize that Vermont has some of the most lax gun laws in the nation, in large part because gun violence in the Green Mountain State is so low.

Indeed, a wide variety of prominent Vermont Democrats and liberal independents routinely enjoy support from the NRA. Former Gov. Howard Dean, his reputation as a liberal firebrand notwithstanding, was endorsed by the NRA in Vermont more than once – a fact he used to brag about during his 2004 presidential campaign.

It's easy to forget, but back in November 2003, when it looked like Dean was surging in the race for the Democratic nomination, John Kerry actually used this against the Vermont governor: "We don't need to be a party that says we need to be the candidacy of the NRA. We stand up against that."

With this in mind, Sanders is simply in line with his home state's political norms. His position may not be expected given his reputation in D.C., but in Vermont, it'd be odd if Sanders didn't oppose many gun reforms.

It's tough to say whether progressive activists who've rallied to the senator are going to care much about this, and it's a safe bet that Sanders won't make opposition to gun-safety measures an important part of his 2016 pitch. But as the campaign progresses, it's an angle worth watching anyway.

Update: My colleague Sunita Sohoni makes a nice catch, flagging this Washington Post report from a few years ago, in which Sanders got a D- rating from the NRA.

Josh Earnest is wrong; Obama's job on immigration not over // The Hill // Cesar Vargas - May 8, 2015

The 2016 presidential season has kicked off, and all attention has focused on the candidates from all sides who are talking about immigration. Meanwhile, the Obama administration seems to be preparing for retirement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Election Day is still more than a year away, however, and the White House still has much to do: toasting at a Cinco de Mayo celebration is not the end of the line for President Obama's job on immigration.

White House Press Secretary Josh Earnest is legally wrong that the president did all that he could. For example, by utilizing Section 504(b)(2) of the enlistment statute, the president has statutory power to direct the secretary of Defense to allow talented Dreamers to enlist because their enlistment is "vital to the national interest."

Republicans have shown, time and time again, that they are completely incapable of addressing immigration reform, allowing only bills attacking Dreamers to pass through the House of Representatives and never touching even the rightward-leaning Gang of 8 bill that passed the Senate with strong bipartisan support.

Even though Hillary Clinton took a great step by committing to further action on immigration, Obama should not defer to future presidents on leadership that is needed now.

Legal experts from around the country have agreed that a president has expansive legal authority to act to temporarily protect additional groups from deportation — and that this authority is rooted in statute, court opinion, regulations and precedent.

Obama has not exhausted the legal limits of this power yet, despite finding some political relief within a Department of Justice memo that outlined certain limits regarding executive power.

His authority on deportation relief, however, is fairly clear. Needless to say, the latest lawsuit against the president's immigration actions is nothing more than political theatrics by the far right of the Republican party and not based on law.

While almost everyone running for president puts an emphasis on immigration legislation, ferrying legislation through Congress will not be easy or quick, however, and will require executive solutions to bridge the gap between now and the enactment of new laws.

The president can still expand deportation relief — as he did with Dreamers — to help keep more families intact and talent in the U.S.

Significantly, the "bed mandate" is an arbitrary policy offensive to contemporary notions of due process written into the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) Appropriations Act of 2010. DHS has interpreted this as a mandate to contract for and fill 33,400 beds in detention centers, which was increased in 2013 to 34,000.

As an agency, DHS is of course subject to executive authority: If the president were to direct DHS to interpret the funding differently, such as interpreting the 34,000 beds as an upper limit rather than a minimum, this could drastically change immigration detention, thereby allowing nonviolent immigrants to rejoin their families while their cases are processed.

Rather than settling for a legacy of executive timidity, President Obama can still leave a legacy of hope. While Congress is still relearning how to tie its shoes, the country needs an executive who will protect our families where our broken immigration system, and equally broken Congress, have failed.

De Blasio's National "Contract With America" Strategy Leaks // Daily Beast // May 8, 2015

Everyone from Susan Sarandon to Van Jones is helping draft and push de Blasio's new "Contract with America," which will push for paid sick leave and free, universal pre-K.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

First New York City. Then America.

New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio is heading to Washington D.C. next week to present a progressive “Contract with America,” a 13-point agenda intended to push the Democratic Party leftward.

According to a draft of the document provided to The Daily Beast by someone asked to join the effort, de Blasio will call for a number of measures for which he has already pushed in New York City, including national paid sick leave and free, universal pre-kindergarten and afterschool programs.

During the 2013 mayoral campaign, de Blasio used his support of paid sick leave to pummel the Democratic front-runner, Council Speaker Christine Quinn, sparking his come-from-behind victory. De Blasio then signed an expansive law on the topic soon after becoming mayor. Universal pre-K became de Blasio’s signature accomplishment of his first year in office, even if his mechanism to pay for it—a tax on the city’s upper income earners—was rejected by Democratic Gov. Andrew Cuomo.

The contract will also put de Blasio in the center of some of the debates currently roiling Washington. According to a draft of the document circulated this week, de Blasio will call for the passage of comprehensive immigration and for Democrats to “oppose trade deals that hand more power to corporations at the expense of American jobs, workers’ rights, and the environment.”

President Barack Obama has called for a new Pacific trade deal that he says would open up new markets for American goods. He has received little support for that view among Democrats, however, and Hillary Clinton has declined to back the agreement.

According to a draft of the document circulated this week, de Blasio will call for the passage of comprehensive immigration and for Democrats to “oppose trade deals that hand more power to corporations at the expense of American jobs, workers’ rights, and the environment.”

Some of the items on de Blasio’s wish list have not yet been made a priority in his time as mayor, like universal free childcare and a $15 per hour minimum wage. The mayor has pushed for a $13 minimum wage indexed to inflation, which would not rise to $15 until 2019. The mayor’s push locally for the $13 minimum wage has likewise been rejected by Albany.

De Blasio is expected to be joined in Washington by a more than 60 members of Congress, progressive activists and labor leaders, among them Oregon Senator Jeff Merkley, Congressmen Keith Ellison and Raul Grijalva and the actor Susan Sarandon. Last month de Blasio convened a number of progressive thinkers at Gracie Mansion, including Nation editor Katrina Vanden Heuvel and civil rights activist Van Jones in order to hash out ideas about how to build a progressive agenda in 2016. De Blasio has pointedly declined to endorse Hillary Clinton’s presidential bid, even though he was the campaign manager of her 2000 Senate run in New York and even though both Bill and Hillary Clinton were on stage with de Blasio at his inauguration.

Aides to de Blasio dismiss the suggestion that this effort is designed to lift de Blasio’s profile, and say instead that it is intended to get a more progressive government into Washington D.C.—one that will be more attentive to New York City’s needs. The contract is modeled on Newt Gingrich’s Contract With America, which helped Republicans retake the House in 1994.

Many of the items that de Blasio calls for are unlikely to pass, even with a Democratic president and a Democratic congress, such as the “Buffet Rule,” which would force millionaires to pay a higher tax rate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Among some of the other items expected to be on de Blasio's agenda are a reform of the National Labor Relations Act "to enhance workers' rights to organize and rebuild the middle class," the expansion of the Earned Income Tax Credit, allowing students to refinance student loan debt, closing the carried interest loop, ending tax breaks for companies that ship jobs overseas, and the closing of a "CEO tax loophole that allows corporations to take advantage of 'performance pay' write-offs."

GOP

Chris Christie got into an epic shouting match with a radio host who compared him to Bernie Madoff // Business Insider // Colin Campbell - May 8, 2015

Boston conservative talk radio host Howie Carr is not a fan of New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie's (R) plan to rein in entitlements spending.

Indeed, Carr repeatedly tore into the likely 2016 presidential candidate in an interview on his Thursday radio show. At times, Carr and Christie attempted to shout over each other as they debated whether Social Security benefits should be cut.

"You're proposing what amounts to a bait-and-switch, aren't you? I mean, what's the difference between this and Bernie Madoff?" Carr asked at one point, comparing Christie's plan to Madoff's infamous Ponzi scheme.

Last month, Christie proposed a number of specific reforms to entitlements like Social Security and Medicare. Among other things, he called for raising the retirement age, cutting back benefits for seniors who earn more than $80,000, and completely ending benefits for those who make more than $200,000.

But Carr, who's nearing retirement age, said the proposal amounted to "raising taxes on the American people."

"I'm older than you are. I'm 63. I started paying into this program when Lyndon Johnson was president, right? Nobody said anything about means-testing," he said. "I'm going to get a union pension. A union pension, governor. And you say I'm going to be making too much in retirement? I have to give up my Social Security?"

Christie didn't back down, however, and challenged Carr to propose his own plan to prevent the US entitlements system from going bankrupt.

"What's your solution, Howie? What's your solution? It's going to go broke, what's your solution?" Christie asked. "I'm dealing responsibly with the problem. You're complaining and putting forward no solution. That's your right, you're radio talk show host, you don't have to come forward with solutions. But your questions have to have some — some — degree of realism to them."

Christie further said he was simply giving Carr some "hard truths."

"These are hard truths, Howie. I'm sorry to have to bring hard truths onto your air. But the fact is that the Social Security system will broke if we don't make changes, or have massive tax increases. You keep talking about the cuts, we should talk about the massive tax increases that we'll pay to make sure everybody gets every nickel that they were ever promised," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Big Issue Haunting Top Republican Presidential Hopefuls This Weekend // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur - May 8, 2015

Immigration.

Jeb Bush and Senator Marco Rubio, two top contenders for the Republican presidential nomination, will deliver major speeches on Saturday: Bush at Liberty University in Virginia and Rubio at the Republican Freedom Summit in South Carolina.

Both are expected to make compelling cases for themselves. But don't expect them to emphasize the issue atop the minds of the Hispanic voters who could help elect the country's 45th president: immigration.

One reason: Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton put them in a box this week by making an offer to Hispanics that Republicans cannot feasibly match. She will expand President Barack Obama's executive actions to include protections from deportation for parents of undocumented young people who have been given "deferred action."

"This is where I differ from everyone on the Republican side," she told young undocumented immigrants at a roundtable in Las Vegas on Cinco De Mayo.

The two Floridians are the most pro-immigration candidates in the Republican presidential field. Each offers a unique appeal to Latinos. In Puerto Rico recently, Bush hailed "the power of the immigrant experience," adding: "I live it each and every day." The reference was to his Mexican-born wife, Columba, and their bicultural children. Rubio too has a compelling personal story as the son of Cuban immigrants. Both have championed legislative reforms to help undocumented immigrants gain legal status.

But neither can match Clinton's offer. Bush, Rubio and just about all Republicans have said Obama's executive actions to protect more than 4 million people from deportation exceed his presidential powers and must be reversed. The president's moves (which have been halted by a federal judge as a court battle plays out) ignited the fury of conservative voters, whom no candidate for the Republican presidential nomination can afford to alienate.

Another top-tier Republican contender, Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker, was quick to channel the anxieties of that conservative base. "Hillary Clinton's full embrace of amnesty is unfair to hardworking Americans and all immigrants who followed the law," said the prospective candidate, who is against legalizing unauthorized immigrants.

Clinton's proposal goes even further than the Obama administration did in November. The White House would protect two categories of undocumented persons from deportation: 1) the undocumented parents of children who were born in the United States and who are, therefore, Americans and 2) young people who were brought here illegally as children by their parents. Under Obama's order, the parents who brought their children here illegally could still be subject to deportation. Clinton, however, would grant them leniency.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The political implications of Clinton's move are obvious. Hispanics, the country's fastest-growing demographic, provide critical votes in swing states like Florida, Colorado, New Mexico and Nevada. And they support Obama's executive actions by large margins—64 percent in aGallup survey in December; 89 percent in a Presente poll in November—because the initiatives delivered results where Congress has repeatedly failed to.

That might explain why Bush and Rubio haven't said a word about the issue. There's no easy way to discuss it without alienating either the Republican voters they need in the primary or the Hispanic voters they'll likely need in the general election.

Ohio Governor John Kasich's positive politics, even with Hillary Clinton // Boston Globe // Scot Lehigh - May 8, 2015

HALFWAY THROUGH John Kasich's testing-the-presidential-primary-waters pitch at a local restaurant on Wednesday, something odd struck me: Ohio's Republican governor hadn't engaged in Obama-trashing or Clinton-bashing.

Indeed, he declined even when an audience member asked for "two or three of the best reasons you can give us as to why Hillary should not be president of the United States."

"I'm not getting into Hillary today," Kasich replied. He answered another question, then circled back. "If I'm talking about what I don't like about Hillary, then I'm not telling you what I think. And I think you need to know more about who I am, and what I think, than what I think negative about somebody else."

That response won Kasich a round of applause, prompting him to note that at the New Hampshire GOP's presidential-candidate cattle call last month, he had stuck to a positive message while most other candidates had ripped into Obama and Clinton.

"If I've gotta spend my time trashing people to be successful in this, you can count me out," said the man who hasn't yet counted himself in, but sounds increasingly like a candidate. He then launched into a story about raising turnpike tolls in Ohio to back bonds for infrastructure improvements.

A while later, I ran into the please-pillory-Hillary questioner on Main Street, and asked what he had thought of Kasich's answer. He was (sometime) ski mogul Les Otten, a former Republican candidate for governor in Maine, who says he may well be a New Hampshire resident by primary time. Otten claimed Kasich's reply was just what he wanted.

"I think people in the north country of New England are pretty tired of politics as usual, and will be looking for a candidate that speaks plainly and just talks about the issues," he said.

Otten may be onto something there. I also expect New Hampshire Republican primary voters will end up favoring a results-oriented conservative pragmatist over the right-wing to-the-barricade ideologues. Further, as Granite State GOP graybeard Tom Rath observes, if the Democratic primary looks like a Clinton cakewalk, independents may decide to take GOP ballots — and that group in particular could find Kasich politically attractive.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A pragmatic rather than a doctrinaire conservative, Kasich, 62, hasn't retooled his stands to pass right-wing litmus tests, at least not so far. He supports Common Core, for example, citing the need for better educational standards. He expanded Medicaid under the Affordable Care Act, though he wants to repeal the rest of Obamacare and let the states craft health-coverage solutions. Kasich has said he thinks climate change is a problem, but hasn't displayed any urgency about addressing it. Fiscally, Kasich, whose resume includes nine terms in the House, has been a tax cutter and budget balancer, but also someone who thinks government should help the poor, a belief rooted in his strong religious values.

In Concord, I asked him if he was trying to reclaim the party from its hard-right ideologues.

Kasich said no, but then added: "I would hope that people will see what worked in Ohio for a conservative Republican who was able to win the state with a big margin, and I hope leading by example will help them to kind of rethink maybe where they are."

As a smart, accomplished swing-state governor, Kasich belongs in the lightly populated category of Republican hopefuls one could actually imagine as president.

And in New Hampshire, that's a very good place to be.

Scott Walker heads to Israel // Washington Examiner // Ryan Lovelace - May 8, 2015

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker heads to Israel for the first time this weekend, where he hopes to augment his foreign policy credentials in advance of formally launching his presidential campaign. The governor has become a conservative darling for his stances on domestic issues, but doesn't have a lot of international experience.

Touring Israel is very nearly a requirement for Republicans looking to compete in the presidential race, as many GOP primary voters believe the United States' relationship with Israel is critical. An unflattering GQ profile painted Ben Carson, a newly minted presidential candidate and retired neurosurgeon, as unable to grasp Israel's system of government. While waiting for his flight to Israel, Carson peppered his guide with questions about the Jewish state, before reportedly remarking, "It sounds complex; why don't they just adopt the system we have?"

Walker appears to have adopted a different approach designed at minimizing attention to his trip. The Walker campaign describes the trip as a "listening tour," and he does not seem to have scheduled any public appearances overseas. Walker told reporters in Milwaukee that he only plans to bring staff and advisers with him to the Middle East, and would not travel with donors.

Ford O'Connell, a GOP strategist and veteran of the McCain-Palin 2008 campaign, said Walker made the right choice to watch and listen. "Frankly, he doesn't know much about foreign policy and the best place to start, if you're going to understand the fine points of foreign policy, is starting with Israel and the Middle East," he said. "He's really starting at a lower rung than a lot of the others [on foreign policy]."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Walker team has kept quiet about the governor's itinerary, but Walker has acknowledged he plans to meet Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. Matthew Brooks, the executive director of the Republican Jewish Coalition, is traveling with Walker to Israel and has helped organize the trip. Brooks said the governor will tour Israel on the ground and via helicopter.

"The governor's going to receive briefings from leading Israeli officials on a variety of policy matters," Brooks said. "We'll have an opportunity to do some sight seeing and go to some of the historic and religious spots, such as the Western Wall, Church of the Holy Sepulchre, meaningful places for him as a devout Christian."

Walker is the son of a Baptist minister.

Ari Morgenstern, communications director for Christians United for Israel, said voters look at a candidate's attitude toward Israel because it is often a good indicator of a politician's larger foreign policy and shows whether the candidate espouses the Judeo-Christian values both societies share.

Omri Ceren, The Israel Project's managing director for press, said the Israel issue is not a litmus test, but a gut check for conservative candidates' chances of electoral success. "If you're on the wrong side of the Israel issue, Americans — and especially American conservatives — think that you're not like them," Ceren said in a statement. "Then you have to go the extra, extra, extra, extra mile to try to convince Republicans that you're one of them, that you think like they do. It's a cultural issue as much as it is a security issue."

As Walker seeks to get a better grasp on foreign affairs, he has increased his overseas travel, having already made multiple trade missions throughout Europe this year. Unlike the trade trips, however, taxpayers will not pay for Walker's trip to Israel. The Republican Jewish Coalition and Our American Revival, Walker's political group, will be paying for his visit. Walker leaves Saturday from South Carolina, where he will speak at the South Carolina Freedom Summit hosted by Citizens United, and he will return stateside on Thursday, May 14.

Mike Huckabee's Message Is As Formidable As Jeb Bush's Money // National Journal // Josh Kraushaar - May 8, 2015

If you listen to the rhetoric from the GOP elite in Washington, Republicans view immigration as an unquestioned asset, support free trade agreements, and believe entitlement reform is necessary to get the country's fiscal house in order. But those reformist positions embraced by party leaders threaten to alienate a significant constituency within the Republican party, one that has been growing in recent years. That populist faction of the party—call it the Huckabee wing—is one that Republicans are overlooking at their own peril.

Indeed, what's most notable about Mike Huckabee's presidential launch is that he hasn't bought into any of the conventional GOP positions on those issues—and instead is using his populist bona fides as a weapon to separate himself from the opposition. He slammed free trade agreements for reducing the cost of wages, saying he'd "like to think the U.S. government would stand up for the U.S. workers rather than let them take it in the backside." In his kickoff speech, he pledged to prevent politicians from rolling back popular Social Security and Medicare benefits. After Clinton's embrace of liberalized immigration policies, Huckabee called her "absolutely wrong" and emphasized his tough stance on border security. And the overall anti-Washington tenor of his message—even calling on candidates who hold public office to resign their seats to run for president—suggest that he'll be a force to be reckoned with in the GOP nomination fight.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's this heterodoxy that drives fiscal conservatives, such as the Club for Growth, batty. The Club has taken the unusual step to spend $100,000 in Iowa and South Carolina to blast Huckabee over his record raising taxes in Arkansas. And many Republicans dismiss his chances of contending in a crowded Republican field, citing his financial disadvantages and smaller campaign organization.

But when it comes to winning over disaffected voters that make up a growing share of the Republican party, Huckabee's message is poised to resonate. Huckabee's positions may be dismissed by liberals and conservatives alike, but they're representative of a significant chunk of the electorate. He starts out with 11 percent of the Iowa caucus vote, according to this month's Quinnipiac poll, holding more than double the support of Jeb Bush. As FiveThirtyEight noted this week, his average net favorability in all the national, live-caller polls this year is stronger than any other candidate.

Public polling shows that the populist sentiment within the Republican party is rising, and is ripe for the picking from a candidate willing to exploit it. As Democrats have shed many of its working-class supporters during the Obama administration, many of them have found a home with the Republicans—and given the party a more blue-collar flavor.

For Sen. Marco Rubio, a question of friendship vs. politics // WaPo // Ben Terris - May 8, 2015

As an underdog candidate for the U.S. Senate going nowhere in the polls, Marco Rubio thought about dropping out. Then his close friend David Rivera showed up at his house, armed with giant sticky notes to paste reasons not to quit all over Rubio's living room.

But now, as Rubio pursues another audacious, uphill campaign, this time for the Republican presidential nomination, the man he has called his "most loyal friend and supporter" could be a big political problem.

That's because Rivera — a fellow South Florida pol who won a U.S. House seat in 2010, the year of Rubio's come-from-behind Senate victory — has left politics under an ethical cloud.

Rivera, who lost his 2012 reelection bid, has been a target of state and federal investigations looking into his alleged failure to disclose income as well as his alleged role in supporting a shadow campaign in 2012 designed to undercut his Democratic rival for Congress.

Rivera has never been charged with a crime, and he has said he did nothing wrong. But the revelations have been embarrassing. A former girlfriend, for instance, told prosecutors that Rivera recruited her to help with the shadow campaign and then helped her flee to Nicaragua — allegations denied by Rivera.

Last month, a Florida ethics commission slapped Rivera with a $58,000 fine for routinely billing the state for travel and other expenses while paying himself back out of campaign accounts when he earlier served as a state legislator.

Rubio, meanwhile, has begun to gain traction as a White House contender. Since announcing his candidacy last month, he has been a consistent presence in polls near the top of the GOP pack.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So far, Rubio has largely stood by Rivera. But, as the campaign grows heated and rivals begin to take aim at his potential weaknesses, he may face a quandary: whether to minimize his ties with a potential liability or remain true to his best friend in politics.

At the moment, Rubio and Rivera are linked on paper, through their joint ownership of a home in the state capital, Tallahassee. The house has been a cause for embarrassment, with Rubio and Rivera served with a foreclosure notice in 2010 after failing to make mortgage payments.

They put the house on the market for $125,000 a few weeks before Rubio's formal campaign announcement, a move first reported by Politico. It has not yet sold.

Rubio declined through a spokesman to be interviewed. The spokesman, Alex Burgos, said that Rubio's team knows opponents will bring up the relationship but that they are comfortable there is nothing for Rubio to be concerned about.

"David Rivera is an old friend of Senator Rubio's," Burgos said. "His hope is that Mr. Rivera can put his recent troubles behind him and go on with his life."

In 2012, when GOP nominee Mitt Romney was considering Rubio as a possible running mate, Rubio did not cast aside Rivera — even though Rivera, according to news reports, had already been under federal investigation for alleged tax improprieties. Rubio hosted a fundraiser for Rivera that year.

"I guess it's because I'm new to Washington, but I've never felt it — I mean, maybe it's acceptable here — it isn't to me — to turn your back on friends when they're going through a difficult time, no matter, you know, what they may have done or not done," Rubio told Fox News. "He's a friend, and I'm going to give him the benefit of the doubt."

Rivera, in a recent e-mail exchange with The Washington Post, said the two remain in touch.

"We're friends," Rivera said. As for how often they speak, he added: "Depends on the month."

Asked why Rubio has stood by him, Rivera was incredulous.

"Why wouldn't he?" Rivera wrote. "After all, no federal government agency has ever said I was under investigation for anything."

Some who are close to Rubio say they see no reason why the friendship would be relevant in a political campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“My feeling on it is, whatever it is the authorities are looking at has nothing to do with Senator Rubio,” said Al Cardenas, a former Florida GOP chairman who has known the two men since the 1990s. “That was just not his sphere of knowledge or control when it came to Rivera. I’m sure Rubio is as saddened as I am by what’s happened.”

Dan Gelber, a former Democratic leader of the state House of Representatives who worked with Rubio and Rivera as fellow members of the Miami delegation, said Rivera’s troubles are “wholly unrelated to Marco.”

But already, American Bridge, a Democratic group raising money for researching ads in the presidential race, has signaled that it intends to highlight the Rubio-Rivera relationship as part of a broader strategy to raise doubts about Rubio’s ethics. The group has also pointed to past criticism of Rubio for using a state GOP credit card to pay for personal expenses.

“It’s hard to imagine a world where Marco Rubio does not know the inner workings of David Rivera,” said Christian Ulvert, a Democratic strategist who once worked with Rivera on a campaign to bring slot machines to Miami-Dade County. “Because David Rivera sure knows the inner workings of Marco Rubio.”

The connection dates to the genesis of Rubio’s political career.

The two met as volunteers on Lincoln Diaz-Balart’s successful 1992 congressional campaign, and, four years later, Rivera recruited Rubio to work on Bob Dole’s presidential campaign.

Rivera, who was born in New York to Cuban immigrant parents, moved to Miami with his family when he was 9. By the time he was 14, he had volunteered for Youth for Reagan. After college, he worked for U.S. Sen. Connie Mack III (R-Fla.) and, at 24, landed a gig in 1990 as executive director of the Miami-Dade County Republican Party.

After they worked together on the Dole campaign, Rubio’s and Rivera’s own political aspirations quickly became known. Rubio ran for the West Miami City Commission and then the state House with financial and strategic support from Rivera. In 2002, Rubio, who had been elected to the Florida House two years earlier, helped Rivera with his own successful state House bid.

In Tallahassee, they were inseparable.

“There were always two phrases to define them,” Ulvert said. “Batman and Robin, and good cop and bad cop. Marco was always out front trying to be friendly, and David Rivera was always behind the scenes doing the heavy lifting.”

It worked well for them. Rubio, with his boyish good looks, lofty ideas and good-natured humor, made friends easily. And while some colleagues have described Rivera as charming in his own way, as well, he has always seemed a better fit for a sidekick role.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former colleagues say the dynamic helped propel Rubio's rise through the House.

When Rubio ran for the speakership, Rivera traveled the state making the hard sell to fellow lawmakers. According to "The Rise of Marco Rubio" by Washington Post reporter Manuel Roig-Franzia, Rivera once surprised a group of legislators by pulling out pledge cards and demanding that they sign them. The lawmakers knew that the wrath of Rivera, with his behind-the-scenes power, could affect their own future elections.

One former House colleague, Republican J.C. Planas, said he personally felt Rivera's heat when he stepped out of line.

When Planas, now a Miami lawyer, would not sign on to support Rubio's chosen successor for the job — speakers are typically anointed years in advance — Planas said that Rivera personally recruited a candidate to challenge him in the next GOP primary.

He wasn't the only legislator to recall being on the other side of Rivera's efforts. Alex Villalobos, a Miami Republican who once had designs on the top slot in the state Senate, said that when he didn't vote the way Rubio and Rivera wanted on an amendment involving school class sizes, they tried to engineer his defeat at the polls.

"They raised $8 million to take me out," Villalobos said. "I got fired as majority leader, I got stripped of my office and ended up in a little office down the hall."

The most insulting part, Villalobos said, was showing up at his polling precinct with his 15-year-old daughter only to find Rivera was there to whip votes against him.

"He's a real a------," Villalobos said.

Rivera did not respond to questions about the recollections from Planas and Villalobos.

In 2010, Rubio and Rivera both set their sights on Washington. Rivera ran for the U.S. House, but he also played a pivotal role in Rubio's Senate campaign — stepping in to talk Rubio out of shifting gears and running instead for state attorney general.

That was when Rivera came with a group of friends and a sticky pad to Rubio's house. Together, they brainstormed reasons why Rubio should run for Senate — and Rivera plastered those reasons all over the living room.

Rubio wrote in his 2012 memoir, "An American Son," that part of the reason he stayed in was because he didn't want to lose the respect of these friends. Back when Rubio had run for speaker, he said Rivera had "done more for my candidacy than anyone else." Rivera clearly was playing a pivotal role again.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rivera's hard-fought congressional race in 2010 brought heightened scrutiny to his own political machinations. That year, local news organizations reported details of a 2002 highway collision in which Rivera ran his car into a truck carrying campaign fliers printed by his political opponent. Rivera said he was simply trying to pull the truck over to retrieve some of his own campaign literature. The crash delayed the truck from getting to the post office before it closed for the day.

In 2012, the Miami Herald reported that state law enforcement investigators had examined Rivera's campaign spending practices and that, as a result, his arrest once seemed "all but certain." Miami-Dade prosecutors had written a "draft" complaint that contained 52 counts of theft, money laundering and racketeering, the Herald report said. But after Rivera and his attorneys fought back, officials never charged him, citing among other things "statute-of-limitations issues."

Later, a federal prosecutor named Rivera as a co-conspirator in a scheme to prop up a shadow candidate to undermine his chief Democratic opponent. Rivera ultimately lost that election. In testimony this year, Rivera's former girlfriend Ana Alliegro told a federal grand jury that Rivera used her to supply more than $81,000 to fund the operation, helped plot a coverup and then helped her flee to Nicaragua to avoid arrest.

Rivera said via e-mail that Alliegro's allegations were "false." He blamed "media hype" for the attention over the years paid to his alleged ethical problems.

Rubio's relationship with Rivera was a point of concern for some members of Romney's team as they vetted the senator for a possible vice presidential nomination in 2012. According to "Collision 2012," by The Post's Dan Balz, some Romney aides worried that an indictment of Rivera in the throes of the campaign could become a major distraction. In the end, the Romney team determined that Rivera's issues were unrelated to Rubio and included him on the short list — although the deliberations took place before the 2012 shadow campaign allegations against Rivera.

Matt Rhodes, Romney's campaign manager, said that Rubio was "thoroughly vetted for vice president" and that the campaign was "confident that, if chosen, his legislative record and high personal character would have been a great asset to Mitt on the campaign trail and in office."

Those close to Rubio say that not only should the senator not be punished for his loyalty but that he also deserves credit for standing by his friend.

"Would you stab a friend in the back?" said Nelson Diaz, a GOP strategist who knows both men. "I've stood by David, too. If he wants to go to the gates of hell, I'll go with him. If Marco wants to go for the presidency, I'll go with him. It's a test of friendship more than anything else."

NBC/Telemundo Republican Debate Set For Feb. 26 // NBC News // Mark Murray - May 8, 2015

Mark your calendars.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

NBC News and Telemundo, along with National Review, will host a 2016 Republican presidential debate in Houston, Texas on Feb. 26 .

It's billed to be the last GOP debate before the March 1 "Super Tuesday" contests of Colorado, Massachusetts, Oklahoma, Tennessee, Texas, Vermont and Virginia.

The NBC/Telemundo debate, sanctioned by the Republican National Committee, was originally set to take place in Florida, but has been moved to Texas.

In addition to setting the date and location, NBC and Telemundo have announced that they're partnering in the debate with the conservative publication National Review.

Obama Calls Elizabeth Warren 'Absolutely Wrong' on Trade Deal // NYT // Peter Baker - May 9, 2015

WASHINGTON — Escalating the fight with his own liberal base, President Obama, in an interview posted online on Saturday, took on Senator Elizabeth Warren, a champion of the left, by suggesting that she was motivated by politics in her battle against his proposed Pacific trade accord.

Mr. Obama said that some of Ms. Warren's warnings about the potential damage of the trade deal were nothing more than the "hypotheticals" of a law-school professor and, repeating an assertion he used recently, "absolutely wrong."

"The truth of the matter is that Elizabeth is, you know, a politician like everybody else," Mr. Obama told Matt Bai of Yahoo News in an interview conducted on Friday at Nike's headquarters near Beaverton, Ore. "And, you know, she's got a voice that she wants to get out there, and I understand that. And on most issues, she and I deeply agree. On this one, though, her arguments don't stand the test of fact and scrutiny."

The president's rebuttal of Ms. Warren, the Massachusetts Democrat who came to national prominence in part through her work with the Obama administration, underscored the schism within the Democratic Party over the Trans-Pacific Partnership, a 12-nation trade deal.

Ms. Warren, a former Harvard law professor, has become an outspoken leader of those Democrats who argue that the agreement would cost American jobs.

Mr. Obama's comments came after he delivered a speech at the Nike headquarters in which he lashed out at liberal critics of the agreement, arguing that they were fighting an old fight even though he was negotiating what he called the most progressive trade deal in history.

He seemed most irritated at Ms. Warren's suggestion that the trade pact could be used as a vehicle to undercut the financial overhaul that Mr. Obama signed in 2010 in response to the Wall Street excesses that led to the recession.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“She’s absolutely wrong,” Mr. Obama said in the interview. “Think about the logic of that, right? The notion that I had this massive fight with Wall Street to make sure that we don’t repeat what happened in 2007, 2008, and then I sign a provision that would unravel it?” He added, “I’d have to be pretty stupid.”

Mr. Obama said liberal opponents of his trade deal were living in the past. “Their arguments are based on fear,” he said, “or they’re fighting Nafta, the trade deal that was passed 25 years ago or 20 years ago.”

He added: “I understand the emotions behind it. But when you break down the logic of their arguments, I’ve got to say there’s not much there there.” The president’s criticism of Ms. Warren in particular has irritated some of her allies. Ralph Nader, the longtime consumer advocate and former presidential candidate, said on Saturday that the president ought to debate Ms. Warren in person, much as Al Gore, then vice president, did with Ross Perot over Nafta in 1993. “A president can get away with his soliloquies when he stays on his throne,” Mr. Nader said by telephone. But if he is going to go after critics, he said, “then I think he is obligated to engage in a public debate that will inform the American people.”

Bernie Sanders perfectly sums up why elites love apathetic voters // Salon // Zaid Jilani - May 9, 2015

American voter turnout has long lagged behind that of most countries. A new Pew survey released this month found that among developed countries the United States had higher voter turnout in the last national election than only Japan, Chile, and Switzerland:

This lower voter turnout has consequences – it is a well-established fact that the groups of people that do not vote tend to have more progressive views. Thus lower voter turnout tends to benefit conservative political parties.

In the 2006 film American Blackout, which chronciled voter suppression, then-Rep. Bernie Sanders (I-VT) explained how high turnout was a “nightmare” for the elites who rule America:

SANDERS: The truth of the matter is that the media, large corporations, the people who control politically our country today do not want you to participate. They want a low turnout of primarily upper middle class people, they want big money to dominate the political process. Their nightmare is that young people, lower income people, working people jump into the process. They do not want that.

Jeb Bush Casts Wide Net on Religious Liberty in Address // TIME // Zeke J Miller - May 9, 2015

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush courted social conservative voters with a sharp defense of religious liberty Saturday, but sought to distinguish himself from his party’s more vocal bomb-throwers on the subject.

In a commencement address at the evangelical Liberty University in Lynchburg, Va., the all-but-declared Republican presidential candidate charged President Obama with “supporting the use of coercive federal power” against those practicing their faith.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush pledged to govern influenced by his faith, rejecting the “politically correct” idea that it should be kept out of the public sphere.

“The mistake is to confuse points of theology with moral principles that are knowable to reason as well as by faith,” Bush said. “And this confusion is all part of a false narrative that casts religious Americans as intolerant scolds, running around trying to impose their views on everyone. … Our friends on the left like to view themselves as the agents of change and reform, and you and I are supposed to just get with the program.”

Bush cited the case of Little Sisters of the Poor, a Catholic charity that objects to providing contraceptive coverage to their employees — as mandated by the Affordable Care Act — which has become a cause célèbre for conservatives wary of government influence in the religious sphere.

“I’m betting that when it comes to doing the right and good thing, the Little Sisters of the Poor know better than the regulators at the Department of Health and Human Services,” Bush said. “From the standpoint of religious freedom, you might even say it’s a choice between the Little Sisters and Big Brother – and I’m going with the Little Sisters.”

But even as he struck the conservative chords on religious freedom, Bush sought to position himself as a social conservative capable of reaching out to those of all beliefs. Bush declared that “some moral standards are universal” and can’t be shifted by public opinion, referencing his opposition to abortion and his efforts to keep Terri Schiavo alive, as well as the need to fight sex trafficking and stand up for oppressed minorities. But he conspicuously skirted the issue of same-sex marriage, which has divided the GOP field but is growing in support among young Republican voters.

He also made a religious case for environmentalism, saying the political debates “can be too coldly economical.” “Men and women of your generation are striving to be protectors of creation, instead of just users, good shepherds instead of just hirelings – and that moral vision can make all the difference,” he told graduates.

A convert to Catholicism, Bush didn’t directly reference his own faith, but briefly referenced Pope Francis. Bush quoted Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. to make the case that he sees his faith as one that can help overcome injustice and raise up the poor.

“‘No law in the world,’ said Martin Luther King, “could have produced such unalloyed compassion, such genuine love, such thorough altruism,” Bush said. “The Christian faith, as Dr. King proclaimed, ‘adjourns the assemblies of the hopeless, and brings new light into the dark chambers of pessimism.’”

The even-keeled address contrasted greatly with the more red meat rhetoric adopted by many of Bush’s fellow Republicans on social conservative issues, such as Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, who launched his campaign at Liberty University.

Some Republicans have promised to fight to nullify an expected Supreme Court decision legalizing same-sex marriage nationally, and have used more forceful language to criticize the Obama administration. Bush’s approach was designed to signal to social conservatives that he believes with them, but that he won’t adopt rhetoric that could turn away the voters the party will need to retake the White House next fall.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jeb Bush's $100M May // POLITCO // Alex Isenstadt - May 8, 2015

Jeb Bush is putting in motion an ambitious plan to develop a super PAC that would be unprecedented in its size and scope — a blueprint growing in scale and intensity as he nears the formal launch of his presidential campaign.

The group, called Right to Rise, is said to be on track for raising an historic $100 million by the end of May, and its budget is expected to dwarf that of Bush's official campaign many times over. In interviews, more than half a dozen sources familiar with the Right to Rise plans described a juggernaut that was rapidly taking shape — from its likely headquarters in Los Angeles, 2,700 miles from the Miami office where Bush was basing his campaign, to a new fundraising push aimed at expanding its ballooning coffers.

Bush is even setting the timing of his official campaign announcement — which is increasingly likely to come in mid-June, following a trip to Europe — around a cross-country fundraising tour. In the final weeks leading up to the launch, his strategists have been devising a plan to allow both arms of the campaign — the official one and the super PAC — to work seamlessly, even as they will be legally barred from coordinating once he officially becomes a candidate.

There is little question that Right to Rise, with its deep cash reserve, will give Bush a leg up in the Republican nomination contest, especially if it becomes a protracted and costly affair.

"It's an advantage. No question," said Fred Malek, a prominent GOP donor who chairs the Republican Governors Association's finance committee. "I think Bush will be able to raise three or four times as much as anyone else."

While many of Bush's rivals are also setting up super PACs, they are not expected to be nearly so well-heeled. Bush, thanks to his family's deep network of supporters and his long career in politics, has an unmatched reach into the Republican donor world. His likely nearest rival in the money race, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, is expected to raise just a fraction of Bush's haul during the opening months of the primary race.

Some opponents are growing increasingly concerned about how the group might be used to damage them.

"People are looking at that $100 million figure and wondering, 'Is it going to be aimed at us?'" said a top adviser to a rival Republican campaign who spoke on the condition of anonymity to candidly describe internal discussions. "Any time you're within a stone's throw of the Bush campaign, you're in the radius of the baseball bat."

Last month, at a posh Miami hotel, Bush held a private event for 350 of his top donors and other major supporters. The weekend confab was described by organizers as an opportunity to thank his biggest backers — and give them a chance to meet with Bush and the people who will be running his super PAC.

In recent weeks, with his launch date fast approaching, Bush has been rushing to fill the Right to Rise bank account. On Wednesday, he was in New York City for a get-together headlined by New York Jets owner Woody Johnson, a much sought-after Republican donor. A week from Monday, he'll be in Miami for an event with

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Florida Reps. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen and Mario Díaz-Balart.

Over the coming days, according to one person briefed on the Right to Rise plans, Bush will try to accelerate the cash flow. Hoping to avoid the public perception that he'd been indebted to a few extremely wealthy benefactors, the former governor initially imposed a $1 million cap on donations to the super PAC.

But now, the source said, that restriction is being lifted. The move is partly out of concern that, with other Republican candidates raising large sums, more cash could be needed. (A Bush spokesman declined to comment.)

Some see Right to Rise as the latest development in the post-Citizens United world of political spending, where cash-flush super PACs, which can raise and spend unlimited amounts of money, are increasingly supplanting candidates and their campaigns.

In 2012, the super PAC supporting Republican Mitt Romney's candidacy, Restore our Future, spent only about one-third as much money as his official campaign. Bush's advisers declined to provide an estimate of just how much the super PAC will outraise and outspend the official campaign — but said it would be significant.

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee is shown.

"I think the way they've designed the campaign is the wave of the future," said Charlie Black, a longtime lobbyist in Washington, who has advised a number of Republican presidential campaigns. "It's a new model."

Bush's decision to put off a formal announcement is rooted in the complex nature of campaign-finance laws. As a non-federal officeholder who hasn't yet become a candidate, he's allowed to travel the country and solicit large contributions of unlimited amounts for Right to Rise. Once he becomes a declared candidate, though, Bush won't be able to ask for donations of more than a few thousand dollars for the super PAC. At that time, he'll also be prohibited from discussing strategy with the consultants and operatives who will be running the group.

One person who'd been briefed on Bush's timeline said he was eying a June announcement, tied to his return from a trip to Poland, Germany and Estonia. Under that scenario, the former governor would have about another month to, without restriction, raise funds for Right to Rise and to communicate with the strategists who are likely to guide it. One of them, veteran Republican media consultant Mike Murphy, has played an integral role in guiding Bush's exploratory committee and is one of his closest political confidants.

HOPE, AR - MAY 05: Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee speaks as he officially announces his candidacy for the 2016 Presidential race on May 5, 2015 in Hope, Arkansas. Huckabee, a Republican, previously ran for the presidency in 2008.

Some Republicans contend that Bush's super PAC-centric setup poses a potentially serious hazard: That he will, in a sense, be walled off from the vehicle that has most of his financial resources. It's a dynamic that could lead to confusion or disagreements between two wings of the campaign, neither of which will be allowed to talk to the other.

"The risk is you're going to end up going in two different directions," said Ed Rollins, a Republican strategist who's helped lead nine presidential campaigns. "What's going to happen is, you're going to end up with two campaigns."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush's strategists say they're well aware of the pitfall, but are taking steps to avoid it. One adviser to the super PAC said a division of labor had been established. While the official campaign arm would take the lead on dictating messaging, the super PAC would take on the role of a follower and be an echo chamber. "There's an understanding that Miami is in charge," the adviser said.

Another dividing line: While Right to Rise will house the TV and digital advertising efforts, the official campaign will be in charge of voter outreach. "We're not going to have a staff with clipboards going around Iowa," the super PAC adviser said.

Right to Rise has been assembling a core staff that is eventually expected to number a little less than a dozen. It's also expected to hire advisers in key primary and battleground states who, one aide said, will serve as "eyes and ears" on the ground and funnel information back to headquarters.

Those headquarters, according to two sources, are likely to be based in Los Angeles, where Murphy works. Matt Leonardo, a Murphy business partner who's served as a top strategist for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, is likely to take on a leading role in Right to Rise, as are two other veteran Republican operatives, Larry McCarthy and Liesl Hickey. Murphy is expected to oversee the group.

Those close to Bush point out that he's long had a penchant for bold strokes and innovative thinking in his campaigns — and a hands-on approach. In his 2002 reelection race, one ally recalled, Bush came up with his own form of early micro-targeting: sending mailers to readers of Golf Digest that highlighted his endorsement from Jack Nicklaus.

"He and the people with him have always been forward-looking," said Mac Stipanovich, a former Bush adviser and a prominent lobbyist in Florida. "It's interesting to hear people say that he's the old guy in the race because he's always been on the cutting edge, and I expect him to be now."

Fiorina Promises to Restore Possibilities // Iowa Public Radio // Kathleen Perkins and Dean Borg - May 8, 2015

Republican presidential candidate, Carly Fiorina, spent an hour-and-a-half speaking to about 75 people in a downtown Cedar Rapids coffee house Thursday morning. She promises to restore what she calls "possibilities," in Americans' lives.

"And we knew, we knew that our lives were defined by possibilities, and our children and our grandchildren's lives would be filled with even greater possibilities. And yet, people don't know that anymore. And when we lose the sense of limitless possibilities that has always defined this nation, we are losing the core of who we are."

In a brief conversation with reporters as she was leaving, she was asked about her strategy for competing in the Iowa Republican caucuses.

"We're three days into a presidential campaign…and the Iowa caucuses are obviously very important and they are one of many important things that need to happen. And so, we're not going to put all of our eggs in any one basket. But, we are going to work hard and compete hard and hopefully continue to perform well in every opportunity, including the Iowa caucuses."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fiorina went on to say that she's running against Democrat Hillary Clinton.

"What I want to know is what have you done? And the truth is Hillary Clinton hasn't done a lot except for obfuscate, muddy up, fuzz up a whole bunch of questions

Without mentioning opponents she must defeat to win the Republican nomination, Fiorina portrayed herself as a leader rather than a manager.

"Everything about me is different. My experience is different. My life is different. My experience is different. My perspective is different. My voice is different. My approach to problem solving is different."

Fiorina also says to win the presidency, Republicans must first win with women voters.

Fiorina is a former business executive who ran an unsuccessful 2010 campaign for U.S. Senate in California. Later in the evening she spoke at a Dallas County Republicans event in West Des Moines.

Bobby Jindal Offers Rare Praise for Hillary Clinton // NYT // Nick Coransanti - May 9, 2015

GREENVILLE, S.C. – With Mother's Day following the Freedom Summit here in South Carolina, Gov. Bobby Jindal of Louisiana was able to compliment Hillary Rodham Clinton during a news conference.

After running through a list of criticisms, such as declaring that the only thing Mrs. Clinton had run was "President Obama's foreign policy" and that she "doesn't seem to understand the First Amendment," Mr. Jindal was pressed to say something nice about her. He paused, until being reminded tomorrow is Mother's Day.

"I will say this: She and her husband, former President Clinton, raised their daughter, Chelsea, under the glare of the media spotlight," he said. "As we get closer to Mother's Day, I respect the fact they worked very hard to shield their daughter from the politics, from the media scrutiny, and by all accounts, she's turned out to be a very accomplished adult in her own right."

He added: "You gotta give her and Bill credit, they did everything they could, from the outside, it seems, to protect Chelsea and raise her and give her as normal a childhood as they possibly could."

Ben Carson on God, Country, and His Ailing Mom // NYT // Nick Coransanti - May 9, 2015

GREENSVILLE, S.C. – Ben Carson, appearing at the South Carolina Freedom Summit here on Saturday, used his first major appearance alongside his rivals since he formally entered the Republican presidential field to focus on economic and fiscal issues, while imbuing his remarks with repeated references to God and faith — and demonstrating the sort of thoughtful, studied way of speaking that he acquired as a neurosurgeon.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Religion: Mr. Carson formally entered the race with a kickoff event in Detroit on Monday, but quickly left the trail to be with his ailing mother in Dallas. He told the crowd here that her condition had improved. “I met one lady who said she had a group of 2,200 people praying for my mother,” Mr. Carson said. “And the last few days, she’s been eating and drinking again. So I just want to thank you for all those prayers.” He spoke of the ways in which religion’s importance was recognized by the founding fathers and their heirs, from the Declaration of Independence’s acknowledgement of “the creator, or God,” to how “every coin in our pocket, every bill in our wallet, says ‘In God We Trust.’” He repeatedly said he believed that marriage was between one man and one woman.

On the Economy: Mr. Carson called the nation’s $18 trillion dollar debt “beyond ridiculous” and unfair to future generations. He argued for a flat tax, and traced the recent unrest in Baltimore to the problems caused by a battered economy, for which he blamed President Obama. “One of the reasons that a lot of people are frustrated and manipulated into rioting is because they hear all this stuff, but then when they open their eyes and look around, they don’t see it,” he said. “There’s been plenty of change, but very little hope. And that’s what’s killing people.”

On the Stage: Mr. Carson paced back and forth, speaking slowly and pensively. He offered asides as he spoke, joking that his own mother was “kind of like that Baltimore mom you saw on television” who roughed up her son when she caught him among the looters. He lamented the nation’s racial tensions, saying that, as a neurosurgeon, “When I open someone’s head, I’m operating what makes them who they are. The skin, the nose, the hair doesn’t make them who they are. It’s the brain that makes them who they are.”

Billionaire Lifts Marco Rubio, Politically and Personally // NYT // Michael Barbaro and Steve Eder - May 9, 2015

MIAMI — One day in the State Capitol in Tallahassee, Marco Rubio, the young speaker of the House, strayed from the legislative proceedings to single out a lanky, silver-haired man seated in the balcony: a billionaire auto dealer named Norman Braman.

This man, Mr. Rubio said in effusive remarks in 2008, was no ordinary billionaire, hoarding his cash or using it to pursue selfish passions.

“He’s used it,” Mr. Rubio said, “to enrich the lives of so many people whose names you will never know.” As it turned out, one of the people enriched was Mr. Rubio himself.

As Mr. Rubio has ascended in the ranks of Republican politics, Mr. Braman has emerged as a remarkable and unique patron. He has bankrolled Mr. Rubio’s campaigns. He has financed Mr. Rubio’s legislative agenda. And, at the same time, he has subsidized Mr. Rubio’s personal finances, as the rising politician and his wife grappled with heavy debt and big swings in their income.

Now, with Mr. Rubio vaulting ahead of much of the Republican presidential field, Mr. Braman is poised to play an even larger part and become Mr. Rubio’s single biggest campaign donor, with an expected outlay of approximately $10 million for the senator’s pursuit of the White House.

Norman Braman, a Miami businessman, signaled support as Senator Marco Rubio announced his presidential candidacy. Credit Joe Raedle/Getty Images

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A detailed review of their relationship shows that Mr. Braman, 82, has left few corners of Mr. Rubio's world untouched. He hired Mr. Rubio, then a Senate candidate, as a lawyer; employed his wife to advise the Braman family's philanthropic foundation; helped cover the cost of Mr. Rubio's salary as an instructor at a Miami college; and gave Mr. Rubio access to his private plane.

The money has flowed both ways. Mr. Rubio has steered taxpayer funds to Mr. Braman's favored causes, successfully pushing for an $80 million state grant to finance a genomics center at a private university and securing $5 million for cancer research at a Miami institute for which Mr. Braman is a major donor.

Even in an era dominated by super-wealthy donors, Mr. Braman stands out, given how integral he has been not only to Mr. Rubio's political aspirations but also to his personal finances.

Mr. Rubio, 43, is unabashed in acknowledging the influence of Mr. Braman, a commanding and litigious figure with so much clout in Miami that he almost single-handedly recalled a sitting mayor.

In an interview, Mr. Rubio described Mr. Braman as a father figure who had given him advice on everything from what books to read to how to manage a staff. After Mr. Rubio's father died in 2010, Mr. Braman called every other day to check in.

Pressed on his financial ties to Mr. Braman, Mr. Rubio said in an interview that he saw no ethical issue. "What is the conflict?" he asked. "I don't ever recall Norman Braman ever asking for anything for himself."

He acknowledged that Mr. Braman had approached him about state aid for projects, such as funding for cancer research, but said that he had supported the proposals on their merits.

The reliance on Mr. Braman is likely to put a spotlight on the finances of Mr. Rubio, who ranks among the least-wealthy candidates in the emerging Republican field. Mr. Rubio left the Florida House of Representatives in 2008 with a net worth of $8,351, multiple mortgages and $115,000 in student debt. In his latest financial disclosure form, for 2013, he reported at least $450,000 in liabilities, including two mortgages and a line of credit.

Mr. Braman and aides to Mr. Rubio have declined to say how much personal financial assistance he has provided to Mr. Rubio and his wife, directly or indirectly, but it appears to total in the hundreds of thousands of dollars.

In a series of interviews at his office in downtown Miami, above showrooms of shiny BMWs and Rolls-Royces (he also sells Cadillacs, Audis and Bugattis), Mr. Braman praised the Rubios. He recounted what he described as "excellent service from them" over the years, and said he wanted nothing in return for his financial help.

What Marco Rubio Would Need to Do to Win

"I'm not going to be an ambassador or anything like that," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Braman — a former owner of the Philadelphia Eagles; the chairman of Art Basel, which stages art shows; and a collector who owns works by Andy Warhol, Alexander Calder and Picasso — emphasized that there were limits to the friendship.

“I also have a yacht,” Mr. Braman said, “that Senator Rubio has never seen.”

Mr. Braman has the manner of a man accustomed to getting what he wants. He was vacationing in France one summer when the mayor of Miami — not the one he had recalled from office — informed him that he would seek to raise taxes. Mr. Braman hung up the phone, turned to his wife and declared: “Goodbye, I’m heading back to Miami to fight this.” He returned home and led a successful campaign to block the increase.

“If you’re going to do something, you do it all the way,” he said.

As early as 2008, Mr. Braman made a bold prediction, captured in a video tribute to his friend: Mr. Rubio would be the first Hispanic president of the United States. Seeing that through in 2016, Mr. Braman said in one of the interviews, is “part of my legacy.”

The partnership began in the early 2000s when a Miami lawmaker introduced them. Mr. Braman, himself the son of immigrants, was instantly drawn to the story of Mr. Rubio, a child of struggling Cuban refugees. By 2004, Mr. Braman and his wife had donated $1,000 to Mr. Rubio’s State House campaign, the first of many contributions.

Mr. Rubio quickly emerged as a dogged champion of Mr. Braman’s most cherished cause: state funding for a Miami cancer institute that bears the Braman family name.

Florida’s governor, Jeb Bush, had vetoed the funding in 2004, incurring Mr. Braman’s public fury. “Frankly, as a very active Republican, I’m ashamed of him,” Mr. Braman said then of Mr. Bush.

Mr. Rubio did not let it happen again. The next year, he secured the cancer funding over Mr. Bush’s objections. “Marco,” Mr. Bush wrote in a somewhat grudging email to a lobbyist at the time, “strongly wanted the Braman Cancer money.”

Soon, Mr. Rubio became a regular visitor to Mr. Braman’s office on Biscayne Boulevard. By the time Mr. Rubio was elected speaker of the House, the youngest in Florida’s history, Mr. Braman felt close enough to show up at the 2005 celebration in Tallahassee and deliver a memorable — and valuable — token of affection: a framed Revolutionary War-era American flag. It hung, on loan, in Mr. Rubio’s office for the entirely of his tenure as speaker.

Continue reading the main story

In Mr. Braman, a Republican with a strong distaste for wasteful government spending, an ardent commitment to Israel and a seemingly limitless bank account, Mr. Rubio found a devoted sponsor.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When Mr. Rubio geared up for re-election to the House, more than a dozen individuals and companies linked to Mr. Braman, including his Honda and Cadillac dealerships, gave Mr. Rubio $500 each, the maximum donation allowed under Florida law.

When Mr. Rubio decided to write a book laying out a conservative vision for Florida's future, Mr. Braman said, he chipped in money to pay for its publication.

When Mr. Rubio announced his signature legislative goal, an initiative to slash property taxes and raise the sales tax, Mr. Braman contributed $255,000 to the advocacy group lobbying for the changes, becoming by far its largest donor.

Mr. Rubio said the flow of donations from Mr. Braman had no effect on his decision-making as House speaker, adding that he would never give preferential treatment to a donor. But in 2008, when Mr. Braman sought the $80 million for the genomics institute at the University of Miami, a large taxpayer grant to a private college, Mr. Rubio delivered the opposite message: Mr. Braman's request, he said, had tilted the scales.

Usually, Mr. Rubio said at a news conference at the time, he would have laughed off such an eye-popping pitch. "But when Norman Braman brings it to you," Mr. Rubio said, "you take it seriously."

Later that year, when Mr. Rubio left state government, determined to shore up his finances before running for the United States Senate, he landed a teaching job at Florida International University, agreeing to raise much of his salary through private donations.

Mr. Braman gave $100,000, according to records he shared with The New York Times. Dario Moreno, who oversaw the university center where Mr. Rubio worked and who taught classes with him, confirmed that Mr. Rubio had raised the money from Mr. Braman.

In the spring of 2010, as Mr. Braman was donating heavily to Mr. Rubio's Senate campaign, his company, Braman Management, hired Mr. Rubio as a lawyer for seven months. According to records provided by Mr. Braman, the company paid Mr. Rubio until a week before he was sworn in as a senator.

Who Is Running for President (and Who's Not)?

Four months after Mr. Rubio left the payroll, Mr. Braman hired Mr. Rubio's wife, Jeanette, who had little professional experience in philanthropy, and her company, JDR Events, to advise the Braman foundation. Mr. Braman declined to discuss her compensation.

Mr. Rubio said the offers of work from Mr. Braman had a simple motivation: "We are close personal friends. They trust us."

Mrs. Rubio's job, fielding and vetting requests for donations to one of Miami's biggest charitable foundations, has given her a major profile in the world of Florida philanthropy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

An internal Braman foundation document makes clear that Mrs. Rubio has become a crucial gatekeeper. “On hold,” read a notation next to a pending donation. “Wait to hear from Jeanette.”

At times, the foundation’s work has coincided with Mr. Rubio’s own globe-trotting political needs. In 2013, when Mr. Rubio traveled to the Middle East, Mrs. Rubio joined him, with the Braman foundation paying for her travel. According to Mr. Rubio’s aides, she was conducting work for the foundation abroad.

On four occasions, Mr. Rubio has traveled on Mr. Braman’s private plane, reimbursing him each time.

Mr. Braman acknowledged seeking the occasional “small favor” from Mr. Rubio’s Senate office. There was the daughter of the woman who does his nails, Mr. Braman recalled, who had an immigration problem, and the student from Tampa who wanted a shot at military school. In both cases, he said, Mr. Rubio’s staff was quick to respond. (Mr. Rubio’s staff said it had decided not to recommend the Tampa student.)

Mr. Braman seemed conflicted about his reputation as civic power broker, at once boasting of his ability to draw a high-ranking Miami official to his office with a single phone call and seeming anxious that he not be viewed as entitled.

“I don’t consider myself a fat cat,” he said. “Don’t make me out to be a fat cat.”

As he spoke in his office, an aide interrupted, presenting Mr. Braman with a yellow sticky note. The Florida Senate was about to vote on a bill he had sought, granting auto dealers like himself greater leverage over car manufacturers.

“That was fast,” Mr. Braman said.

Moments later, another adviser popped his head in, declaring victory. “Thirty to four,” he said of the vote, with a fist pump.

Scott Walker Woos South Carolina G.O.P. With Tough Talk on Terror // NYT // Nick Corasanti - May 9, 2015

GREENVILLE, S.C. – Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin told Republicans gathered here how the last time he was in town he swung by the local Harley-Davidson shop and picked up a T-Shirt — and before taking the stage, he even tweeted a picture of himself in the shirt.

With that, Mr. Walker was trying to say one thing: Although I’ve only been here once this year, I know South Carolina. Now get to know me.

In his address to the Freedom Summit here sponsored by Citizens United, Mr. Walker ran through an extended list of his accomplishments as governor of Wisconsin. “We did some pretty big things,” he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He recalled how he survived a recall election, lowered his state’s unemployment rate, and passed gun-friendly legislation and voter identification laws. And he spoke often of his wife and children.

“The reason I tell you that all here is not to brag — well not much,” he joked, before making the case that his actions in Wisconsin could translate to national stage.

As he does in most of his stump speeches, Mr. Walker sprinkled personal stories around references to his platform, trotting out his story of learning to shop at Kohl’s department store for discounts with his wife, recalling his “humbling” history trip to Philadelphia and discussing his time flipping burgers at a McDonald’s during high school.

But he seemed to really capture the crowd when he spoke about national security, or, as Mr. Walker described it, “safety.”

“National security is something you hear about,” Mr. Walker said. “Safety is something you feel.”

He framed the debate in personal terms, describing a fear that “it is not a matter of if” but when another “attempt is made on American soil.” And then he launched into the line that got him his biggest standing ovation of the day: “I want a leader who is willing to take the fight to them before they take the fight to us.”

Indeed, in a state with deep ties to the military, Mr. Walker knew his audience.

Walker: I’d end sequester, not cut military // McClatchy // David Lightman - May 9, 2015

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker said Saturday he would end the budget sequester requiring automatic defense and domestic spending cuts if he became president, a critical issue in South Carolina, a state with a large military economy and site of the first primary in the South.

Walker, who is weighing a bid for the Republican presidential nomination, quickly said yes when asked if he would reverse the automatic cuts due to take effect in October. “There’s no way we can adequately fund the defense budget under the sequester,” Walker said in an interview with McClatchy.

He also would end the automatic cuts for domestic programs. “The reason the sequester is there is they needed to do something to get things under control between a Republican House, a Democratic Senate and a Democratic president,” Walker said. “That was the best that could be done under the circumstances.”

South Carolina officials are deeply concerned about the impact of the automatic cuts.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Eight military bases, as well as thousands of defense contractors, are responsible for about $16 billion to the state economy annually. More than 11,000 civilians work for the military in the state, including 3,500 at Fort Jackson. It also has another 3,500 active duty military employees.

Fort Jackson is the nation's biggest training base, sending out 70,000 soldiers last year. It also serves 421,000 veterans in the state, half over 65. Its annual impact on the Midlands part of the state is about $2 billion.

While officials believe Fort Jackson's stature could insulate it somewhat from cuts, there's still a widespread feeling reductions are coming.

The Army has asked 30 of its largest bases to gauge the impact of cuts to the local economy. Not only is funding affected by the end of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, but by the sequester that would go into effect later this year unless Congress acts.

The automatic cuts were enacted in 2011 after Congress and the White House were unable to agree on spending reductions to dramatically curb the nation's escalating debt. The plan was aimed at cutting $1.2 trillion over 10 years from anticipated spending on discretionary programs, or those under legislative control. That means annual cuts of about $109 billion and about half is to come from defense.

Pentagon officials warned the cuts would create a "readiness crisis." The sequester's impact was eased under a December, 2013, bipartisan agreement, but that only stretches through the end of this fiscal year Sept. 30.

Instead of a sequester, Walker's plan for reducing spending involves sending federal functions back to the states. His key example was Medicaid, the joint federal-state health care program for the poor.

"I'd send Medicaid back as a block grant without strings attached," he said. "We could make it work more effectively and efficiently.":

The 2010 Affordable Care Act expanded eligibility for Medicaid, and Washington offered states federal money to help. In future years, though, that federal aid diminishes, meaning states have to come up with ways to make the program more efficient.

Congress is now considering a fiscal 2016 budget, and there's some hope lawmakers can reach a deal that once again eases the sequester.

Walker said he'd model his budget along the lines of those urged by former Defense Secretary Robert Gates, who served in that post under President George W. Bush and Barack Obama.

Gates has said the military needs a more modern strategy, urging a blend of conventional and unconventional tactics for what he has called "complex, hybrid warfare."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If he became president, Walker would face the challenge of working with a bitterly polarized Congress. No problem, he said.

In his campaign, Walker said he would “really lay out a blueprint for how to govern in America,” a plan that would include big changes to how government operates.

He’d urge lawmakers to “do it early,” so that people can see how changes are working, and ultimately support them.

Republican Hopefuls Push a Muscular Foreign Policy // NYT // Nick Corasanti - May 9, 2015

GREENVILLE, S.C. — A group of Republican presidential hopefuls gathered here Saturday to advocate a more muscular foreign policy and to criticize the man they hope to succeed for what they described as a weak and misguided approach to international affairs.

Declared candidates and those preparing to enter the race for the 2016 Republican presidential nomination sought to appeal to the crowd at the South Carolina Freedom Summit, which included many current and former members of the military and their spouses, by offering tough talk on terrorism and calling for a stronger American presence in the Middle East and a better relationship with Israel.

Senator Marco Rubio of Florida was cheered for his call for the United States to be “the strongest military power in the world” and for his blunt message to terrorists, which he cribbed from the movie “Taken.”

“We will look for you, we will find you and we will kill you,” Mr. Rubio said.

Others framed their speeches as critiques of President Obama’s foreign policy. Former Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, who often speaks of his commitment to religious liberty and social issues, spent more time than usual attacking Mr. Obama’s leadership on foreign affairs.

“Heck, I would just be happy if the president would be able to tell the difference between our friends and enemies,” Mr. Santorum said. “Let me give the current president a little primer: Iran, enemy. Israel, friend.”

South Carolina, which hosts the first primary in the South, could play an outsize role in the 2016 Republican nomination process, even as many Southern states have moved their contests earlier. The current and prospective candidates all promised that they would be back plenty.

“The great state of South Carolina plays a pivotal role in our nation,” Senator Ted Cruz of Texas said. “Y’all have the blessing and the curse of being an early primary state, so you’re going to see presidential candidates descend upon you like those federal regulators and locusts,” he added, referring to a joke he had made earlier about the differences between the two.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“My one request is: Please hold back on the pesticide,” he joked.

Several of the speakers were quick to acknowledge current and former military members, who are influential in the state’s primary. Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin began his speech as he has done before, by asking members of the military and their spouses to stand up to be recognized. About a third of the crowd rose.

“Thank you to each and every one of you,” he said, nodding and applauding as the crowd’s response grew to a roar.

Mr. Cruz also drew attention to the military when speaking about his support for an overhaul of the tax system. Calling, as he often does, for the abolition of the Internal Revenue Service, Mr. Cruz said: “We spend about $500 billion a year on tax compliance. That’s all wasted. That’s about the budget of our entire military.”

Mr. Walker personalized the debate over national security.

“National security is something you hear about,” he said. “Safety is something you feel.”

He described a fear that “it is not a matter of if” but when another “attempt is made on American soil.” He then delivered a line that brought his biggest standing ovation of the day: “I want a leader who is willing to take the fight to them before they take the fight to us.”

Mr. Walker, who does not have as much experience as some of his potential rivals on foreign policy, sought to demonstrate that he is working to address what could be viewed as his greatest weakness. Hours after he left the stage, he boarded a plane to Israel for what is being billed as a “listening tour,” which he has said includes a meeting with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. But aside from a quick mention during his remarks, Mr. Walker was unwilling to discuss the trip.

“Really, for us, though, we wanted to make it an educational focus, not just a media trip,” he said in an interview with reporters after his speech.

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS

The Beauty of a Big GOP Field // Real Clear Politics // Senator Joe Lieberman & Governor Jon M. Huntsman, Jr. - May 9, 2015

It’s May, and Americans are planting — not just fruit and vegetable gardens, but a large and historically diverse presidential field. Thanks to an increasing variety of candidates, the 2016 presidential crop promises to be competitive and healthy for the country.

Regardless of your party preference, it’s good to see people with different ideas and perspectives — and a lot of them — running for our nation’s highest office. The interest in the position reflects a shared sense our country can be even better. We have big problems to solve, plenty of ideas on how that should be done, and a lot of people who want to drive solutions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is all good, and the behavior deserves to be rewarded with our careful attention to each candidate — particularly when those candidates share and debate their ideas about how problems might be solved.

Our hope, in fact, is the issues debate that grows out of, and around, the presidential field will serve to reinvigorate citizens for whom political acrimony has encouraged apathy. A large presidential field has the potential to make personal attacks more difficult by diffusing the “enemy,” meaning the potential for substantive debate is greater for 2016 than it has been in past presidential cycles.

Of course, for this to happen, presidential candidates and their advisers must break old habits. The positive side of leadership is, sadly, a toolbox that has grown rusty for many. Candidates will have to get used to talking about shared goals instead of relying on the usual negative partisan talking points.

The national movement we're part of — No Labels — has made it easier for candidates to pick out and discuss goals that resonate by identifying four that already have broad and deep public support from Democrats, Republicans and Independents. These four goals make up No Labels' National Strategic Agenda:

· Create 25 million new jobs over the next 10 years

· Secure Social Security and Medicare for another 75 years

· Balance the federal budget by 2030

· Make America energy secure by 2024

This list produces an intuitive nod from most Americans as well as most politicians. You might say the goals are simply common sense, but they are actually more powerful due to their inherent optimism.

Candidates who choose to tout these — or similar — goals will lead the pack and engage the public’s interest by sparking substantive debate. Each goal has dozens of possible paths to fruition; this makes for interesting discourse.

The varying talent and experiences of the presidential candidates — governors, senators, formers and nevers — all but ensure a certain level of diverse and interesting conversation. And conversation makes our collective minds and hearts better. It makes us grow, as a people. It can us bring closer to working together, even if we don’t agree on everything.

The question that remains is whether a critical mass of candidates will be hopeful enough — and confident enough — to focus that conversation on setting goals and solving problems.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Because if the conversation drifts back toward personal attacks, this currently fascinating presidential field will become boring and a turnoff.

For now, we choose to remain optimistic that more is more and that the large number of interesting candidates planting the seeds for campaigns will ensure that the presidential harvest will produce vibrant debate, shared goals, and solutions to some of our country's biggest problems.

The Battle for DuPont // NYT // Joe Nocera - May 8 2015

Though the DuPont Company has been trying to persuade me otherwise, I feel safe in saying that Trian Fund Management is one of the better shareholder activists around. Led by Nelson Peltz, 72, it takes stakes in good companies that, in its view, are struggling operationally. It then seeks board representation, from which vantage point it examines the company from top to bottom and presses the rest of the board to make changes that will raise the stock price.

Trian tends to stick with companies for years, rather than cutting and running. Its track record for creating “shareholder value” is impressive. Even Martin Lipton, the corporate lawyer who made a career out of denouncing shareholder activists, has described Trian and Peltz as having “established credibility.”

Edward Garden, who is Trian’s chief investment officer, says, “We work constructively with companies to get their businesses back on track.”

And although Trian has been trying to persuade me otherwise, I feel equally safe in saying that DuPont is a pretty well-run company. Under the leadership of Ellen Kullman, a company veteran who became its chief executive in 2009, this once unwieldy conglomerate has undergone a great deal of change, with more still to come. It has cut some $2 billion in costs, eliminating a third of its management; announced the spinoff of its performance chemicals business; and “refreshed” its board with such corporate stalwarts as Edward Breen, who is best known for turning around Tyco International in the early 2000s. Since Kullman took over, the company has delivered 266 percent in total shareholder returns, easily outpacing the Standard & Poor’s 500-stock index. It is in the middle of a major restructuring designed to boost earnings growth.

“I am passionate about building a company that will be relevant and will deliver great value in the decades to come,” says Kullman.

Yet, since January, this activist hedge fund and this centuries-old company have been engaged in a bruising proxy fight, which culminates on Wednesday at DuPont’s annual meeting. Trian, which owns a $1.8 billion stake in DuPont, has been pushing the company to add Peltz and others to its board for the last year and a half. It’s come up with a series of white papers outlining what it views as serious deficiencies in DuPont’s operational track record, and it has suggested cutting out even more costs and perhaps breaking the company into two. DuPont’s board, meanwhile, has spent a good deal of money and time analyzing Trian’s ideas. But when it concluded they weren’t an improvement over Kullman’s own plan, Trian refused to go away. Hence the proxy fight.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There is a decent chance that Trian will win. The two biggest proxy advisory firms are backing Trian to one degree or another. Given Trian's track record, the theory goes, what would be the harm of adding Peltz to DuPont's board? "When there's doubt, companies rather than activists probably deserve the benefit of it," wrote Kevin Allison at Reuters Breakingviews. But, he added, Peltz was often a constructive force, and besides, under DuPont's bylaws, he can be on the board only for a year without a special exemption because of his age. In other words, why not give him a whirl and see how it goes?

For anyone who has followed the rise of shareholder value, this is a striking turn of events. Have we really gotten to the point where the activist now gets the benefit of the doubt, no matter how well run the company? And the corporation is expected to make whatever radical change the activist seeks, all in the name of shareholder value? In the DuPont/Trian fight, the hedge fund is on record as saying that the company is not getting a return on its research-and-development spending. Yet R.& D. — science — is at the very heart of DuPont's business model and always has been. And it can take years to turn a scientific advance into a successful product. A DuPont stripped of much of its R.& D. doesn't just hurt the company; it hurts the country.

Which brings me back to Martin Lipton, the corporate lawyer who views shareholder activism with disdain. It was the Trian side that pointed me to a note he had written to his clients — that's where he had described Peltz as credible. But when I talked to Lipton, he made it clear that he was not offering an endorsement but rather some practical advice: Activist funds are now such a powerful force in the market that many companies — even good ones — have no choice but to offer them board seats.

That doesn't mean Lipton thinks the trend is a good one. "Activism has caused companies to cut R.& D., capital investment and, most significantly, employment," he said. "It forces companies to lay off employees to meet quarterly earnings."

"It is," he concluded, "a disaster for the country."

TOP NEWS

Domestic

At least 1 death reported after tornadoes hit northern Texas // AP // May 9, 2015

DALLAS — At least two tornadoes touched down Saturday in northern Texas, and officials said homes were destroyed and at least one person was killed when one of the twisters tore through a farming and ranching area.

Cisco, Tex., Fire Chief Walter Fairbanks said one person was killed when a tornado swept through the area, but he had no other details early Saturday evening.

Eastland County Judge Rex Fields said authorities were going house to house to assess the damage in the sparsely populated area, about 100 miles west of Fort Worth, but that proved difficult amid the heavy rainfall.

"There is a considerable amount of damage," Fields, who also serves as the county's emergency services coordinator, told the Associated Press. "Homes have been lost."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The extent of injuries or fatalities was not immediately clear there or in the town of Burkburnett, about 15 miles north of Wichita Falls, where the second tornado touched down. A police dispatcher said tornado sirens could be heard in Burkburnett just before 6 p.m.

On Saturday afternoon, the weather service elevated to “moderate” the risk of tornadoes in the Dallas-Fort Worth metropolitan area and elsewhere across North Texas. Eastland County, which was part of the zone of enhanced risk, was pelted with three-inch hail as the storm rumbled through.

Storms also brought heavy rain and quarter-size hail to parts of southwest Oklahoma on Saturday afternoon, but meteorologists said there was so much rain — and so little sun — that the tornado threat there lessened throughout the day. Parts of western Kansas also were bracing for severe storms.

The threatening skies stretched beyond the Plains states, as twin weather systems stretching from the Carolinas to California produced an unseasonably early tropical storm in the Atlantic and a late-season snowstorm in the Rocky Mountains.

Beachgoers were warned away, emergency officials kept a watchful eye, and at least one graduation ceremony was forced indoors as Tropical Storm Ana plodded toward the Carolinas on Saturday in an early heaping of rough weather weeks ahead of the official start of the Atlantic hurricane season.

Ana was centered about 65 miles southeast of Myrtle Beach, S.C., on Saturday evening, according to the National Hurricane Center in Miami. The storm had top sustained winds of 60 mph but had slowed from its earlier speed, moving northwest at 3 mph, and was forecast to be “very near” the coasts of South and North Carolina sometime Sunday morning.

Universities along the Carolina coastline were monitoring the storm as a possible disruption to weekend commencements. Ceremonies scheduled for Brooks Stadium on Saturday at Coastal Carolina University in Conway, S.C., were moved indoors out of caution. In Wilmington, N.C., UNC Wilmington held graduation indoors as planned, but the university urged students and their family members to watch weather conditions and make their own determination on the safety of traveling.

Meanwhile, up to five inches of snow was possible in the Nebraska panhandle this weekend, and parts of South Dakota could receive between 12 and 24 inches of snow, according to the weather service.

Suspects in Freddie Gray Case: A Portrait of Baltimore Police in Miniature // NYT // Cheryl Gay Stolberg and Richard A. Oppel, Jr. - May 9, 2015

BALTIMORE — The first police officer Freddie Gray encountered on the morning he sustained a fatal spinal cord injury was Lt. Brian Rice, a seasoned 41-year-old white law enforcement officer who, several years earlier, had his guns confiscated by deputies who took him to a hospital after a worried ex-girlfriend expressed alarm about his well-being.

About 40 minutes later, when Mr. Gray, who was black, lay shackled in a police van and was no longer breathing, Sgt. Alicia White — a 30-year-old churchgoing black woman with a reputation as a rising star — tried to remove him. “She’s not even the type of person that would jaywalk,” one neighbor said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In between, Mr. Gray was subdued and handcuffed by two rookie bicycle officers, each in his 20s, both white. A 25-year-old black patrolman arrived to check on him. The van driver, Officer Caesar Goodson, also black, is an old-timer at 45. Described by colleagues as “passive,” he never moved up the ranks.

In this mix of officers — who now face criminal charges in Mr. Gray’s death, including, for some, murder and manslaughter — one can see a portrait in miniature of the Baltimore Police Department, an agency mistrusted by many black residents, and one suffering from its own racial divide despite a decades-long effort to integrate. As the Justice Department begins a full-fledged civil rights investigation, the Gray case throws into sharp relief the department’s shortcomings and struggles for change.

“You can’t just label this something racial,” said Representative Elijah E. Cummings, a Democrat who lives just four blocks from West North and Pennsylvania Avenues, where a burned and looted CVS store stands as a symbol of the riots set off by Mr. Gray’s death on April 19. “When you have three African-American officers involved, you’ve got to say: ‘Wait a minute, is there a system in place in which they don’t want to tell on each other? Has it become a routine?’ ”

Over the past three decades, Baltimore’s roughly 3,000-member police force has undergone a slow, painful process of integration. In 1984, the year the city settled a lawsuit that forced the department to hire and promote more minorities and women, 19 percent of officers were black. By 2007, blacks were 44 percent of the force; the city’s population is nearly two-thirds black. The commissioner, Anthony W. Batts, is black, and African-Americans hold other high-ranking posts.

Despite that, tensions between black residents and the police run deep. Last week’s decision by Mayor Stephanie Rawlings-Blake to request a “pattern or practice” Justice Department inquiry — something she had long resisted, even as she pushed for changes — emphasizes that mistrust. Civil rights advocates say it is long overdue.

So do some black police officers. In 2004, Sgt. Louis Hopson, now the board chairman of the Vanguard Justice Society, the association that represents the city’s black officers, was the lead plaintiff in a federal lawsuit alleging that the department systematically disciplined black officers more harshly than whites. In 2009, the city settled the case, agreeing to pay $2.5 million to more than a dozen plaintiffs and to hire an outside consultant to monitor the internal discipline process for three years.

But the problems have persisted, some black officers say. In March, court records show, Baltimore settled another bias suit, brought by a former officer, Richelle Johnson, a black woman who complained that she was forced to retire and that the department was more accommodating to white officers who were injured and requested light duty than to blacks. The terms of the settlement have not been made public, and a lawyer for Ms. Johnson would not discuss it.

An Internal Divide

“There are two Baltimores, and there are two Baltimore City Police Departments,” said Sergeant Hopson, 63, a 35-year veteran. “This department is a very racist police department. The issues that you see manifesting themselves on the outside are the same problems we have been dealing with on the inside for years."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The relentless drumbeat of criticism is depressing officer morale. Many police officers are furious with Ms. Rawlings-Blake, whom their union supported when she ran for mayor in 2011, for asking for the Justice Department review. They feel undermined as they work to maintain the peace in a city with a high homicide rate.

"Our police officers have a number of conflicting emotions, from anger and shock to sadness and depression," said Sgt. Robert F. Cherry, a 21-year veteran and former president of the Baltimore chapter of the Fraternal Order of Police Lodge 3, in an interview. "It is a tough time to be a police officer."

The union has stood firmly behind the six arrested in Mr. Gray's death; Sergeant Cherry accused Marilyn J. Mosby, the prosecutor who filed the charges, of "political opportunism" and wondered aloud if she had "an exit strategy for grossly overcharging our six officers." Sergeant Hopson said the Vanguard Justice Society was also planning a news conference for this week to show support for the three black officers.

Sergeant White, the lone woman among them, is an example of how the six officers reflect the two Baltimores, and the two Baltimore Police Departments. After joining the force in 2010, she caught the eye of Sergeant Hopson, who said he recruited her into a program he runs to prepare black officers to take tests required for promotions.

She became a sergeant this year, said Dana Neal, a nondenominational minister who said Sergeant White regarded her as an adopted aunt. "She is a Christian and wants to be a good role model for young black women," Ms. Neal said, adding that Sergeant White hoped to "bridge the gap between the police and the neighborhoods."

Sergeant White grew up in Baltimore and lives here; Sergeant Cherry said 35 percent of the force now lives in the city. But black residents have complained that too many officers live outside Baltimore and feel no attachment to it. Sergeant White has worked for the Police Athletic League, helping young people with homework, and her church, New Bethlehem Baptist Church, is in Sandtown-Winchester, the blighted neighborhood where Mr. Gray grew up and was arrested before his fatal injury.

Now, she faces charges of involuntary manslaughter, second-degree assault and misconduct in office; Ms. Mosby alleges Sergeant White "did nothing" to help Mr. Gray even though he was lying on the floor of the van and unresponsive.

The encounter that led to Mr. Gray's death began around 8:40 a.m. on April 12, when the three white officers — Lieutenant Rice, Officer Edward Nero and Officer Garrett Miller — were patrolling the streets around the Gilmor Homes, a public housing development in West Baltimore. Lieutenant Rice spotted Mr. Gray, making eye contact with him, police have said, and Mr. Gray ran off.

Three years earlier, amid a dispute with his ex-girlfriend over custody of their child, Lieutenant Rice had been taken to a hospital by sheriff's deputies in Carroll County, Md., who — apparently fearing he was unstable — confiscated his weapons and contacted his Baltimore police commanders, according to sheriff's records and court filings. The documents were previously reported by The Guardian newspaper and The Associated Press.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In court papers, the ex-girlfriend's husband, Andrew McAleer, a Baltimore firefighter, accused the lieutenant of a pattern of stalking and intimidation; at one point, he wrote that he feared he was "about to be killed by Brian Rice." In January 2013, a judge granted Mr. McAleer a temporary "peace order" — a type of protective order — finding "reasonable grounds" that Lieutenant Rice had committed harassment and had trespassed. The order was rescinded a week later because of a lack of proof needed to make the protective order final, records show.

Baltimore police officials declined to comment on the court filings, or to say what, if any, medical treatment or disciplinary action Lieutenant Rice received. He now faces one count of involuntary manslaughter, two counts of second-degree assault, two counts of misconduct in office and one count of false imprisonment.

Officers' Stories

The two bicycle officers who arrested Mr. Gray, Officers Miller, 26, and Nero, 29, have been on the force for just three years. Both face two counts of second-degree assault, two counts of misconduct in office and two counts of false imprisonment. The prosecutor asserts that Lieutenant Rice and the two officers failed to establish probable cause for Mr. Gray's arrest and then, after placing him in handcuffs and leg shackles, did not secure him with a seatbelt in the police van, as required by police policy. The medical examiner has concluded that Mr. Gray's fatal neck injury occurred in the van, according to a person with knowledge of the investigation.

All six officers have filed motions asserting that Ms. Mosby has multiple conflicts of interests in the case and asking that she be required to step aside or that all charges be dismissed.

In a brief interview outside his modest two-story beige brick home in the distant Baltimore suburb of Bel Air, Officer Nero declined to address the charges against him. Standing in his doorway, he said he and his family were going through a difficult time, and were getting by with "a lot" of support from relatives and friends and by concentrating on their young daughter.

Officer Nero's neighbor Seth Ranneberger, a high school science teacher, said that on one of the rare occasions when the officer spoke of his work, he described being a Baltimore police officer as "one of those jobs — the doormat job — you do it and get no thanks for it."

Officer William G. Porter, who arrived on the scene as backup when the van carrying Mr. Gray made the second of several stops — seemed to be coming to grips recently with just how tough his job was. Officer Porter grew up in North Baltimore, in a transition neighborhood of simple brick rowhouses, just one block away from Guilford, a neighborhood of stately single-family homes. One neighbor, Keysha Waters, 40, described how, as a teenager, the future officer smelled a fire that had started in her home and rushed inside to grab her children and hustle them out the door. When he dropped out of college and joined the police academy, he told Ms. Waters that he wanted to "make a difference."

She and others described Officer Porter as quiet and respectful, but said he lately had seemed a bit worn down by his job. When Olivia Whitlock, a childhood friend, sent him a Facebook message in August saying another neighbor had seen him on the television news, he replied, "I'm surprised you don't see me more often," because there is so much crime in the tough Western District, where he worked.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Now Officer Porter faces charges including involuntary manslaughter and second degree assault. Ms. Mosby says that although Mr. Gray complained he “could not breathe” and twice asked for a medic, Officer Porter and Officer Goodson, the van driver, ignored the request.

Officer Goodson, whose neighbors in the Baltimore suburb of Catonsville describe him as friendly and kind, faces the most serious charge, second-degree depraved-heart murder — in effect, murder with callous indifference, or an intent to cause an injury that could lead to death. This has led to speculation in Baltimore that Officer Goodson, who faces other charges as well, was intentionally giving Mr. Gray a “rough ride,” meaning he intended to jostle him and cause serious injury — though Ms. Mosby has not used that term.

As Baltimore tries to make sense of what happened to Mr. Gray, and the Justice Department inquiry gets underway, some say city leaders are awakening to problems that black residents knew existed all along. Even Representative Cummings, who said he had asked for a “pattern or practice” review before Mayor Rawlings-Blake, said he had learned something about Baltimore’s police. Never before, he said, had he heard the term “nickel ride,” another term for “rough ride.”

On the wall of his home, Mr. Cummings said, he keeps pictures that ran in The Baltimore Sun of people who have been beaten by the police. “That,” he said, “seems to cry out for a deep dive.”

US created 223,000 jobs in Apr vs. 224,000 expected; unemployment rate at 5.4% // CNBC // John Melloy - May 8, 2015

The U.S. economy created 223,000 jobs in April, bouncing back from a sluggish period the first three months of the year, as companies shook off the effects of a surging U.S. dollar and falling profits. The unemployment rate fell to a seven-year low of 5.4 percent, the Labor Department said Friday.

Economists expected nonfarm payrolls to rise 224,000 in April, with the unemployment rate dropping to 5.4 percent from 5.5 percent in March. It was the lowest number since lowest since May 2008.

Investors cheered the renewed strength in the economy, pushing S&P 500 futures higher by about 1 percent. The report was seen as a so-called Goldilocks scenario, showing a rebound, but not strong enough to rush the Federal Reserve to raise interest rates. Government bond yields, which had been rising, fell after the number was released.

The jobs figure vs. expectations was "close enough," said Jeffrey Saut, investment strategist for Raymond James. It's "still consistent with the Fed beginning to raise short-term interest rates later this year."

This jobs report follows a much weaker-than-expected increase for March when the number of jobs created was the lowest since December 2013.

There were conflicting readings of U.S. employment this week leading up the report. On Thursday, weekly jobless claims rose by less than Wall Street expected. However, Wednesday's data from ADP showed 169,000 private sector jobs were added in April, the fewest since January 2014.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The latest GDP reading from the government on the first quarter showed the economy expanded at just a 0.2 percent annual rate on falling exports due to the strong dollar, bad weather crimping consumer spending and dropping oil prices cutting energy sector capital spending.

This report validated the theory that economic dip was just temporary. But there were enough weak factors to keep the Fed at bay.

March nonfarm payroll growth was revised lower to 85,000 jobs, from a 126,000 gain previously reported. Another weak factor in the report was the average workweek, which came in unchanged at 34.5 hours.

"While some will say the downward revisions mitigate the positive aspect of an inline reading, we disagree," said Dan Greenhaus, chief strategist for BTIG. "What matters most about this employment report is that the winter slowdown did not bleed through into April."

Wage growth hinted at a rebound in the economy. Average hourly earnings rose 2.2 percent from a year ago, although only by 3 cents to $24.87 from March.

Hiring was up across a broad swath of industries, except for manufacturing and retail. Services added 62,000 jobs, while health care and construction sectors each added 45,000 payrolls.

Private payrolls were largely responsible for the gains, rising by 213,000. The government added 10,000 jobs.

Justice Department Launches Civil Rights Probe Of Baltimore Police // Reuters // Julia Edwards - May 8, 2015

WASHINGTON, May 8 (Reuters) - The U.S. Justice Department on Friday launched an investigation into the Baltimore police department's use of force and whether there are patterns of discriminatory policing.

The probe, announced by U.S. Attorney General Loretta Lynch, was requested by Baltimore's mayor in the aftermath of the death of Freddie Gray, a 25-year-old black man who sustained fatal injuries while in police custody, and the outrage it sparked in Maryland's largest city.

The Justice Department has conducted similar reviews of U.S. police departments. An investigation of police in Ferguson, Missouri, where a white officer shot dead an unarmed black teenager last year, concluded in March that the department routinely engaged in racially biased practices.

Though the Justice Department is already investigating Gray's death and working with the Baltimore police on reform, Lynch said last week's protests pointed to the need for an investigation.

"It was clear to a number of people looking at this situation that the community's rather frayed trust - to use an understatement - was even worse and has in effect been severed in terms of the relationship with the police department," Lynch said on Friday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The latest investigation will focus on allegations that Baltimore Police Department officers use excessive force, including deadly force, conduct unlawful searches, seizures and arrests, and engage in discriminatory policing, Lynch said.

"If unconstitutional policies or practices are found, we will seek a court-enforceable agreement to address those issues," she said.

Maryland Congressman Elijah Cummings said he asked Lynch for the investigation to "get to the bottom of the breakdown in trust between the police and the community."

Baltimore Mayor Stephanie Rawlings-Blake said in a statement her goal was for the city's police to reform through an enforceable court order.

Baltimore's chief prosecutor has brought criminal charges, including one murder charge, against six officers, three white and three black, involved in Gray's arrest.

Lynch, who took office last week, traveled to the largely black city on Tuesday to meet with Gray's family as well as thank officers for their work during the protests.

Any findings of the investigation would result in civil rather than criminal charges. Departments that have been found in violation of civil rights in the past have had to enter into court-ordered improvement plans, which can include an independent monitor, required reporting of arrest data and training for officers.

State Legislatures Put Up Flurry of Roadblocks to Abortion // NYT // Frances Robles - May 8, 2015

Oklahoma’s governor this week approved a law extending to 72 hours the mandatory waiting period before a woman can have an abortion. Here in Florida, lawmakers enacted a 24-hour waiting period that requires two separate appointments — one for an ultrasound and information about fetal development and another for the actual procedure.

These are just two laws in a surge of bills passed by Republican-controlled state legislatures this year that make it harder for women to have abortions.

Arkansas led the nation with six new abortion-related laws, including one requiring minors to present a notarized consent from a parent and another saying that a woman more than 20 weeks along must be told that her fetus can feel pain.

Arkansas, along with Arizona, also passed the most novel requirement, requiring doctors to tell patients that drug-induced abortions can be reversed, an assertion that many doctors say is wrong.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The 37 new rules in 11 states are part of a strategy accelerated by abortion opponents in 2011, when provisions restricting abortion access began sweeping state legislatures. More than 200 such laws have passed in the last four years, with Louisiana, Mississippi, Kansas, Oklahoma and Arkansas leading the charge, according to Americans United for Life, an anti-abortion legal group. This year, more than 300 regulations were proposed in 45 states.

And they keep coming: On Thursday, a bill that would ban abortions after 20 weeks was introduced in Wisconsin, where lawmakers proposed a $10,000 fine or 42-month prison sentence for physicians who break the law.

These laws have had a profound effect in states like Texas, where the number of abortion clinics dropped by half because of strict regulations governing their operation.

Advocates of legislation proposed this year say the restrictions are aimed at safeguarding the health of women. Clinics and mainstream medical groups, however, say most of these rules do not improve patient safety and are thinly disguised efforts to discourage women from having abortions and to make them more expensive, which has a disproportionate effect on the poor.

“State legislatures are restricting how doctors provide medical care related to abortion, where doctors can provide that care, what doctors can say to patients when they provide that care and more,” said Suzanne B. Goldberg, the director of Columbia Law School’s Center for Gender and Sexuality Law.

But Anna Paprocki, staff counsel for Americans United for Life, which opposes abortion, said, “The Supreme Court has been clear on this: Not every burden is unconstitutional.” She added, “A lot of the arguments made by the abortion industry against any regulation are red herrings.”

Ms. Paprocki’s group drafted 50 pieces of “model legislation” this year, which made their way to statehouses across the nation. The most frequently proposed bills from these suggestions included limitations on later-term abortions, clinic regulations, hospital admitting privilege requirements for clinic doctors and regulations on abortion-inducing drugs, Americans United for Life said in a report on the 2015 legislative session.

Several states targeted the clinics themselves by instituting costly ways to dispose of fetal remains and requiring doctors to have admitting privileges, according to the Guttmacher Institute, a private research group that supports abortion rights and tracks legislation.

Elizabeth Nash, a senior state policy associate at the Guttmacher Institute, said some states had approved so many kinds of new rules that together they served to make it difficult for women to obtain an abortion.

“In recent years, we have seen a lot become law because of shifts in state legislatures,” Ms. Nash said.

Kansas and Oklahoma recently banned a standard method in second-trimester abortions, in which the fetus is removed in pieces.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Several states have banned the use of telemedicine — treatment by phone or video — in administering abortion-inducing drugs. Arkansas limited the number of weeks that drugs to induce abortion can be used. Like Oklahoma, Arkansas extended the length of the waiting periods before a woman can have an abortion. Like Florida, Tennessee enacted a new waiting period law.

Florida enacted its law, which it calls a “reflection period,” in late April. Abortion providers say it places an undue burden on women who will be required to make two trips to a clinic to end a pregnancy.

“It adds a substantial burden to women’s lives, doubles the amount of time they have to take off work, doubles the child care required, doubles the distance traveled,” said Christopher Estes, the chief medical officer for Planned Parenthood of South Florida and the Treasure Coast. “It really adds time and expense with no medical justification whatsoever.”

Jennifer Sullivan, a freshman legislator who at 23 is the youngest woman in the Florida House, sponsored the bill.

“I have personally seen those women who are being practically dragged to a clinic against their will,” she said.

Dian Alarcón, Florida field organizer at the National Latina Institute for Reproductive Health, told lawmakers that the added obstacles would encourage illegal abortions. She said she herself once had an illegal abortion with no medical care.

Beth Harrison, 33, a personal trainer in Tavares, Fla., testified at a legislative hearing last month that she deeply regretted having an abortion 10 years ago and urged lawmakers to enact the waiting period.

“When they did the ultrasound, the screen was behind me and I happened to turn around and look at it,” Ms. Harrison, who thinks abortion should be illegal, said in an interview. “I saw this baby and I was freaking out.”

There are more than two dozen states that have a mandated waiting period before a woman can have abortion, usually 24 hours, said Michelle Richardson, the director of public policy of the American Civil Liberties Union of Florida.

Florida’s version is more stringent, though, because the first counseling session must be done in person; most allow it to be conducted by phone or electronically. She said advocates plan to fight the law, arguing that it violates the right to privacy ensured in Florida’s Constitution.

“We’ll make the policy arguments about protecting a woman’s right to choose and that hurdles are not in her best interest,” Ms. Richardson said. “The law is just out of hope that it will make it so difficult to have abortion that she won’t do it.”

Frustrated Jury in Etan Patz Trial, but No Rancor for the Holdout // NYT // Russ Buettner - May 8, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Three weeks ago, seven men and five women entered a windowless room in a courthouse in Lower Manhattan to decide the fate of Pedro Hernandez, who had confessed to killing 6-year-old Etan Patz decades earlier. After a long trial, they easily dispatched what could have been a vexing issue standing between them and a guilty verdict: the absence of a body.

“The very first thing we did was talk about whether we thought Etan Patz was actually, had actually been kidnapped and murdered, which we all agreed to without a body,” said one juror, Jennifer O’Connor.

From there, consensus became increasingly difficult. Several described their discussions as intellectual and respectful, but tense and ultimately unsatisfying, both to themselves and the millions of others who have followed the case since Etan disappeared from a SoHo street corner in 1979.

Etan Patz’s father, Stanley, said on Friday that he believed that Pedro Hernandez had killed his son and should be retried.Jurors in Etan Patz Case Fall One Vote Shy of a ConvictionMAY 8, 2015

Stanley and Julie Patz standing next to a poster of their missing son, Etan, outside their loft in SoHo in 1980.Etan Patz’s Disappearance Has a Lasting Impact on ParentingMAY 8, 2015

“Me personally, I’m very sad that we could not bring resolution for the case, for a lot of reasons, for the Patz family, for the Hernandez family, for the City of New York,” Ms. O’Connor said. “But we really tried our hardest, and I don’t think we could have done any more.”

Justice Maxwell Wiley declared a mistrial in the case on Friday, the 18th day of deliberations, after the jurors sent him a note for the third time saying they were unable to reach a verdict. In a rare post-trial news conference in the courthouse, several explained the course of their deliberations. None hinted at any negative feelings toward the one juror who, after several others changed positions, could not be persuaded to convict Mr. Hernandez.

But as they left, one juror, Alia Dahhan, had a final word for the defendant, who had already been escorted back toward his jail cell.

“Pedro Hernandez,” she yelled. “You know what you did!”

On the first day of deliberations, they took a vote. Eight were ready to convict Mr. Hernandez. But a couple of them later became unsure. Defense lawyers had raised substantial questions about Mr. Hernandez’s mental health and intellectual abilities, saying he was incapable of giving a reliable confession. The defense also offered a competing theory that the killer was Jose A. Ramos, a convicted child molester who was the prime suspect for years.

Their discussions were rigorous. Some jurors had kept several pads full of notes. They made seven spreadsheets with details from the case, including Mr. Hernandez’s medical history and timelines from the case. There were times when the discussions grew heated, though never mean spirited.

One juror, Edwin R. Thompson, said there was “camaraderie,” along with “argumentation,” some raised voices, and “tears on occasion,” most often stemming from personal disagreements over who in the jury room had said what.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The room itself did not help.

“The air is not good in there,” Mr. Thompson said. “The ceiling is 10 feet or so. It’s not claustrophobic but it’s a conference room that you’re locked in day after day.”

Mr. Thompson said he began deliberations “with a sense that the defendant was guilty, and an open mind.”

Ms. O’Connor said that frustration arose at times “because two people read the same sentence and looked at it through a different lens.”

“But there was no screaming or hitting or anything of that nature,” she said.

She was among the jurors who were initially unsure. But she said Mr. Hernandez’s descriptions of where he put the body were compelling, and the arc of his mental health problems suggested something other than his innocence.

“It seemed to be a profile of someone who did something heinous and was trying to repress it, suppress it, bury it deep down,” Ms. O’Connor said. “And that was another big piece for me.”

She also cited a chilling moment from the videotape of Mr. Hernandez’s confession, in which he describes the sound Etan made when he was choking him to death. Ms. O’Connor saw that as among several details that seemed too specific to be concocted.

The jurors did not offer a precise timeline of their votes, but as deliberations continued more of them were ready to convict Mr. Hernandez. After a split vote, another came out 9 to 3 for conviction; later, there were two 10 to 2 votes.

One juror, Douglas Hitchner, said he was the next to last holdout. He said he entered the deliberations believing Mr. Hernandez was guilty but went through what sounded like an intellectual exercise of arguing he was not guilty.

“I did that for a couple of days, and to me it just didn’t hold enough water,” he said. “Ramos factored in, but you couldn’t connect the two.”

Mr. Hitchner held onto the not-guilty position until Friday morning. He said there was “no question” that Mr. Hernandez was there that day, and Mr. Hitchner decided that the “quality” of his confessions — to friends and relatives years before he confessed to prosecutors — “is what sort of swayed me to finally go guilty.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He moved to the guilty side on Friday morning. That left only one juror unwilling to convict: Adam Sirois, 42, a consultant for an international health care strategy firm.

Mr. Sirois saw something vastly different in Mr. Hernandez's confessions.

"For me, his confession was very bizarre," Mr. Sirois said. "No matter how many times it happened, it got more and more bizarre."

He gave weight to the defense argument that Mr. Hernandez was coerced into admitting he killed Etan. He said that he had concerns about what happened in the six hours Mr. Hernandez spoke with detectives and prosecutors, but before they turned on a video camera to record his confession, and whether Mr. Hernadez understood his rights. The defendant's mental health was a "huge" issue for him, he said, as well as the possibility that Mr. Ramos committed the crime.

"Ultimately I couldn't find enough evidence that wasn't circumstantial to convict," he said.

Jurors who spoke at the news conference said they hoped prosecutors would retry Mr. Hernandez, giving a new set of people a chance to decide his fate.

Mr. Sirois was asked what it was like to be the only holdout.

"It wasn't easy, but it wasn't torture, either," he said. "I feel all of my fellow jurors were very respectful of my position. I'm proud to be on a jury with all of them, even if I don't agree with all of them about the decision."

International

In Liberia, Ebola outbreak is declared officially over // WaPo // Peter Halley - May 9, 2015

The worst Ebola outbreak in history is officially over in one of Africa's hardest hit countries, the World Health Organization announced Saturday.

Liberia, the West African nation where Ebola claimed the highest number of deaths in the largest outbreak since the virus emerged in 1976, has gone 42 days without any new Ebola cases, according to a statement released by the WHO.

The 42-day period represents double the maximum incubation period for the virus since the last victim of Ebola was buried.

The announcement marks a return from the brink for Liberia. During the outbreak's peak in August and September, the statement said, the country was reporting from 300 to 400 new cases every week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At the time, the WHO noted, the virus paralyzed the country of 4.2 million people, leading to canceled flights, fuel shortages and the closing of schools, businesses at health facilities. In the capital city of Monrovia, reports emerged of locals dumping the bodies of suspected victims in the streets while hospitals shuttered because health workers were too frightened to work.

With the nightmare fresh in their memories, officials urged residents not to let their guard down in Ebola's absence.

"We are out of the woods," Liberia's Information Ministry said on its Twitter account Saturday. "We are Ebola free. Thanks to our partners for standing with is in the fight against Ebola. We are Liberians."

Liberian President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf on Saturday referred to the devastation endured by her country as "a scar on the conscience of the world," according to the AP.

For some survivors, she added, "The pain and grief will take a generation to heal."

Following Liberia's announcement, the White House press secretary Josh Earnest released a statement praising the milestone and highlighting the Obama administration's continued support.

"We congratulate the people of Liberia on reaching this important marker, and once again pledge our commitment to ending the Ebola outbreak in West Africa and helping to rebuild Liberia and other affected nations," the statement said. "As President Obama said when Liberian President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf visited the White House last month, '"We're proud to partner with you and we intend to see this through until the job is done."'"

Since Liberia's latest outbreak began in March 2014, the country has seen more than 3,000 laboratory-confirmed cases of Ebola and another 7,400 probable cases, leading to more than 4,700 deaths, according to the WHO. A total of 375 health workers were infected and 189 lost their lives.

"Though the capital city was hardest hit, every one of Liberia's 15 counties eventually reported cases," the WHO statement said. "At one point, virtually no treatment beds for Ebola patients were available anywhere in the country."

The country's last victim, according to the WHO, was a Monrovia-area woman who died on March 27 and whose case remains under investigation. After close monitoring, the WHO noted, none of the 332 people who may have been exposed the the woman have developed symptoms.

Civil war and chronic poverty left a shortage of doctors and nurses in West Africa when Ebola swept through region last year. Early on, health workers didn't realize they were dealing with an Ebola outbreak and when seemed to diminish, officials became overconfident. By the time the virus made the leap from rural villages to crowded cities, health workers spent grueling months struggling to catch up.

"The communities were the heroes in this fight," Hassan Newland, who worked with UNICEF in Monrovia last fall told NPR. "They took on Ebola and decided enough is enough."

Newland told NPR he credited neighborhood groups that rooted out the virus by going house by house, slowly turning the tide on the outbreak.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“They were locating the sicknesses themselves,” Newland said. “They were reporting the cases themselves. So when they decided to get involved we started to defeat Ebola.”

New Ebola cases continue to be reported in the two other countries hardest hit by the virus. Both Sierra Leone and Guinea, each of which share a border with Liberia, confirmed nine new cases last week, the lowest weekly total in 2015, according to the WHO.

There have been more than 3,000 cases in Guinea and more than 8,500 cases in Sierra Leone, which has had the highest number of cases of any country since December, according to WHO figures.

With Ebola still plaguing the region, the WHO has recommended that Liberia maintain a state of “heightened surveillance” for the next 90 days due to the possibility of the virus being transmitted through sexual contact with a survivor or through an animal host.

Mamudu Salifu, Oxfam’s Country Director in Liberia, said in a statement that the Liberian government recognized early on that working with “ordinary people” was a better strategy for combating Ebola than “forcing health measures on them” because it lessened the fear and mistrust surrounding the virus.

“Liberia, Sierra Leone and Guinea should now work together to ensure the region as a whole achieves zero cases,” the statement said. “Building people’s trust is crucial and working with communities should be a priority if the region hopes to reach zero and stay there.”

With the virus continuing to spread on Liberia’s border, officials said they are cautiously celebrating the end of the Ebola considering months of hard work could be undone with a single infected individual slipping across the border, according to the AP. Officials plan to continue monitoring border areas for sick travelers, “testing all dead bodies for the virus and conducting burials with specially trained teams wearing full protective gear,” according to the New York Times.

“We’re proud of what we collectively managed to do, but we need to remain vigilant,” Peter Jan Graaff, the U.N. secretary general’s acting special representative and head of the United Nations Mission for Ebola Emergency Response (UNMEER) told the AP. “The virus is not yet out of the region, and as long as the virus is in the region, we’re still all of us potentially at risk.”

The Ebola epidemic, which began in southeastern Guinea in December 2013, is believed to have killed more than 10,600 people and infected 25,791 in Guinea, Sierra Leone and Liberia, according to the WHO.

Gunfire, explosions in Macedonia as police battle 'armed group' // Reuters // Ogenen Teofilovski - May 9, 2015

Five police officers died and dozens were wounded in a daylong gun battle in an ethnic Albanian suburb of northern Macedonia on Saturday, adding the threat of armed conflict to a deep political crisis rocking the ex-Yugoslav republic.

The Balkan country's interior ministry said an unspecified number of gunmen were also killed, but that it had no information on civilian casualties during clashes that began before dawn and stretched into the evening.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Police said that acting on information about an "armed group" they had launched an operation in an ethnic Albanian district of the northern town of Kumanovo 40 km (25 miles) north of the capital Skopje. The region saw heavy fighting during an ethnic Albanian insurgency in 2001.

Units of special police in armored vehicles locked down the neighborhood and helicopters circled overhead. A Reuters photographer reported hearing heavy automatic gunfire and loud explosions. Black smoke rose over the town and residents were seen leaving the area carrying belongings.

The events will deepen concern in the West over stability in Macedonia, where the government is on the ropes over allegations by the main opposition, the Social Democrats, of illegal wire-tapping and widespread abuse of office.

Protesters demanding the resignation of conservative Prime Minister Nikola Gruevski clashed with police this week and the opposition is threatening to rally thousands on May 17.

Observers fear political leaders on either side may try to stoke ethnic tensions as leverage.

"DARK SCENARIO"

"The situation on the ground remains highly critical," Interior Minister Gordana Jankulovska told a news conference. She said some gunmen had surrendered, without saying how many.

"The action will continue until every last terrorist is caught," Jankulovska said.

A ministry spokesman, Ivo Kotevski, said the group was planning "terrorist acts" and had "infiltrated" the country from a neighboring state, without saying which.

Macedonia's neighbors are Albania, Greece, Kosovo, Serbia and Bulgaria, and Macedonia has previously identified armed men in the country as coming from Kosovo.

Opposition leader Zoran Zaev, who has been releasing damaging wire-taps he says were recorded by the government and leaked to him by a whistleblower, appeared to suggest Saturday's operation was carried out to create a diversion.

"I call on Nikola Gruevski to immediately ... explain who wants to destabilize Macedonia, why and with what purpose," he said in a statement.

"This dark scenario will not work. The citizens see who has an interest in such a scenario."

An estimated 30 percent of Macedonia's 2 million people are ethnic Albanians. Guerrillas took up arms in 2001, clashing with security forces before the West brokered a peace deal offering the Albanian minority greater rights and representation and the insurgents entered government.

But implementation has been slow and tensions sometimes flare. Many citizens, regardless of ethnicity, are frustrated at the glacial pace of development and integration with the West. Macedonia's bid to join the European

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Union and NATO is blocked by a long-running dispute with Greece over the country's name.

"I thought it would never come to this again," an unidentified ethnic Albanian man told Macedonian television on the outskirts of Kumanovo. "It's so scary, we can't stay here."

Liberia, Ravaged by Ebola, Faces a Future Without It // NYT // Norimitsu Onishi - May 8, 2015

MONROVIA, Liberia — When a taxi dropped off a man dying of Ebola one evening in June 2014, the Logan Town clinic was defenseless.

Workers had no protective suits — only a few pairs of faded gloves and a shaky grasp of infection control. They examined the patient by candlelight and washed their hands in buckets.

That single case set off a chain of contagion that killed six of the clinic's 29 employees and at least nine of their relatives, including one of the country's top basketball players, as Liberia became the center of the deadliest Ebola epidemic in history.

Ten months after that fateful evening, the Logan Town clinic is now equipped with a triage room and hand-washing station near the entrance, an isolation room, a large generator and a water pump that feeds the taps.

"From the improvements, and how we examine the patients now, Ebola will not come back," said Bessie Johnson, 32, a nurse. "It won't happen again."

On Saturday, Liberia is expected to be declared free of Ebola by the World Health Organization, having gone 42 days since its last victim was buried, or twice the maximum incubation period of the virus.

It will be a seminal moment for a country that was once so overwhelmed by the epidemic that bodies littered the streets and hospitals shut down, leaving the sick helpless, often seeking treatment in vain.

"I am thrilled by the significant progress made by the people of Liberia," said Tolbert Nyenswah, a deputy health minister. But, he warned, "we still need to keep up vigilance."

The weak health systems in Liberia, Sierra Leone and Guinea, the three nations hit hardest by the disease, did more than just crumple in the face of Ebola's onslaught last year. They played a central role in spreading the disease.

Clinics routinely misdiagnosed the disease and discharged Ebola patients with pills for common illnesses. Infected health care workers passed the virus to their colleagues, families and communities.

Local and international health officials are now focusing on extinguishing the waning Ebola epidemic in Guinea and Sierra Leone. But they have a bigger goal as well: shoring up beleaguered health systems that were inadequate long before Ebola struck.

"I don't want to call Ebola an opportunity, but we're using the experience of Ebola to try to rebuild our health systems," said President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf of Liberia.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the decade leading up to the epidemic, the three nations made significant health gains, especially in reducing child mortality. In Liberia, immunization rates for childhood vaccines and life expectancy had risen significantly. Health programs were one of the biggest recipients of aid from the United States, the European Union and other donors.

A worker sprayed chlorine on the front mat at the Logan Town clinic in February. The clinic is now equipped with a triage room and hand-washing station near the entrance, an isolation room, a large generator and a water pump. Credit Daniel Berehulak for The New York Times

But long-running conflicts, poverty, mismanagement and corruption left the three nations with some of Africa's weakest networks of health care centers and workers.

Only 51 doctors were working in Liberia, a nation of 4.5 million people, at the time of the outbreak, the W.H.O. says. Even the biggest hospitals here in Monrovia, the capital, lacked running water, electricity and basic supplies like gloves.

Ebola has killed more than 500 health care workers in the three countries, worsening an acute shortage of medically trained personnel.

During the height of the epidemic last year, more than half of Liberia's health facilities ceased operating. Those that stayed open offered only limited services, often refusing to treat patients without proof that they were free of Ebola.

Many pregnant women were refused admission to maternity wards when workers fearful of being infected avoided delivering babies. Immunization rates for measles and other childhood diseases fell.

Many of the sick, afraid of being infected or classified as Ebola patients, stayed clear of hospitals. Unable to find treatment for malaria, diarrhea, typhoid and other common illnesses, many people are believed to have died for other reasons during the epidemic because the health system collapsed.

Dr. Bernice Dahn, who was recently picked by Ms. Johnson Sirleaf to be Liberia's new health minister, said that most of Liberia's health facilities had reopened and were providing basic services.

The Times produced more than 400 articles, including about 50 front-page stories from inside the Ebola-afflicted countries themselves. Here is a sample of work.

The government, Dr. Dahn said, will focus on raising the quality of its health work force, on emphasizing disease prevention and control and on adding triage and isolation facilities.

Physical improvements have already been made to many hospitals and clinics, where infection control training has taken place.

But there is a lot more to do, and finding the money will not be easy.

Last month, Liberia put forward an Ebola recovery plan that included its ambitions of building a "more resilient" health system — along with better schools, sanitation, and access to clean water — at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Given that Ebola delivered a huge economic blow to an already poor country, much of the money it needs to rebound from the epidemic will have to come from outside Liberia, the plan makes clear.

And some improvements can be fragile. During an Ebola outbreak in a neighborhood called St. Paul's Bridge in February, the sick scattered to community clinics, and hundreds of health care workers had to be placed under quarantine. A half-dozen clinics were shut down temporarily.

Dr. Dahn said that triage was not carried out properly at the affected clinics, adding, "It's difficult to change behavior. It requires a lot of coaching and mentoring, which need to go on."

A nurse at Logan Town checked the temperature of a patient in February with a digital infrared thermometer. Liberia's last Ebola victim was buried over a month ago. Credit Daniel Berehulak for The New York Times

Even if the country is declared Ebola-free on Saturday, the threat persists. Infections continue across the porous borders with Guinea and Sierra Leone, though in much smaller numbers, and experts warn that another outbreak at some point in the region is a near certainty.

Here in Monrovia, a major goal is rebuilding the government-run Redemption Hospital, the first health center in the capital to be crippled by Ebola. Its closing in June had a domino effect on the city's other health facilities.

Though it is the second-largest hospital in the capital, Redemption had only sporadic running water and electricity before the outbreak. Its roof leaked. Its plumbing and sewage systems did not function. Medical and regular wastes were burned together in the open. Septic tanks underground often overflowed and gave off a fetid stench.

"When you see the environment, you can be scared," said Wallah Seth, who took his ailing wife to Redemption a couple of years ago but never went back.

"You feel you want to give up; I never wanted to come to this place, Redemption, again," he said, adding that his wife managed to recover nonetheless.

Because of overcrowding, patients were often placed in any ward with an available bed; in pediatrics, two to three children often shared one bed, said Dr. Phil Afolabi, who has worked at Redemption since 2009 and is now employed by the International Rescue Committee, the aid organization based in New York that is rebuilding the hospital.

"Infection control was not a main concern at the hospital," Dr. Afolabi said, as construction crews loudly tore out walls and floors. "So many things have actually not been in place at the hospital, and that's been the case for a long while."

Nurses discussed the health of a girl brought in for treatment in February. During the height of the Ebola epidemic last year, more than half of Liberia's health facilities ceased operating. Credit Daniel Berehulak for The New York Times

In June, after a young woman with Ebola was admitted, eight health care workers at Redemption died in quick succession. The hospital, located in New Kru Town, one of the largest slums in the capital, was shut down.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The sick flooded the area's private clinics, including Logan Town. The clinic serves an area of 20,000 people, according to the aid group Oxfam, which has made $7,200 in improvements to the clinic.

By the standards of Monrovia's community clinics, Logan Town was average. Two physician assistants led the medical staff, helped by a doctor who visited twice a month.

An old generator seldom worked. Drugs and equipment were always in short supply; the staff used gloves only for deliveries and minor surgeries, and reused them until the color faded. Janitors fetched water in buckets from a neighborhood well.

"It was difficult, especially when the patients were sick and needed to use the bathroom," said Nancy Kanneh, a nurse. "Often, we didn't have water to wash our own hands."

On the evening of June 25, about a week after workers at Redemption started dying, Logan Town took in a young Ebola patient named James Fallah, the caretaker of a nearby Pentecostal church, United God Is Our Light.

The security guard who had wheeled Mr. Fallah into the building held him down a few hours later when he became violent before dying. A week later, the guard came down with Ebola and passed on the virus to two of his children and one grandchild, all of whom died.

After the guard was treated at the clinic, the contagion widened to five other clinic employees. All of them died, including the chief administrator, Edwin Dour, who fatally infected his son, Kaizer, one of Liberia's most promising basketball players. Kaizer, in turn, passed the virus on to five family members, who all died.

The clinic, which closed for three months, is now operating only during the day and seeing about half of the patients it treated before the epidemic.

"Because of the stigma, people that used to come here before are afraid to come," said Edwin Sengar, the physician assistant who is now in charge of the clinic.

Some of the staff members had not returned, either.

"I'm afraid," said Moses Safa, the physician assistant who was on duty the night the Ebola patient was brought in. "I'm not doing anything now. I'm just staying at home. Maybe I'll go back after Liberia is declared Ebola-free."

A Dark Election Day for U.K.'s Pollsters // WSJ // Charles Forelle - May 8, 2015

LONDON—Britain's vanquished Labour Party is hanging its head after a brutal defeat in Thursday's election.

So, too, are the country's pollsters.

Heading into the vote, practically every major survey firm predicted a knife's-edge contest. Yet it has been a blowout: The Conservative Party won 331 seats to Labour's 232, yielding a slender Conservative majority in the 650-seat House of Commons, an outcome predicted by practically no analysts.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Conservative Election Victory Sets Off Wave of Opposition Resignations

David Cameron's Conservatives Sweep to U.K. Election Victory

Cameron, Heading for Win, Faces Tough Challenges Ahead

"Election results raise serious issues for all pollsters," the survey company Populustweeted in the wee hours of Friday, after its forecast of a slim Labour win was upended. "We will look at our methods." The British Polling Council, an industry group, announced Friday an outside inquiry into the election polls, saying they were "clearly not as accurate as we would like."

What happened?

First, the pollsters missed the countrywide result. Many surveys put the gap in vote share between Conservatives and Labour at a point to two; the actual gap was six and a half.

But far more significantly, pollsters and statisticians failed badly when turning survey results into answers to the all-important question of who'd win how many seats.

While not easy in practice, surveying is straightforward. Even in a country the size of Britain, polling a few thousand people should give a close estimate of the whole population's views. The chief challenge is making the sample representative—every voter should have the same probability of being selected for the poll.

Several of the final election polls interviewed around 1,000 or 2,000 people. In theory, those surveys should have margins of error of around three or two percentage points.

Ipsos MORI, for instance, interviewed 1,162 adults by telephone. It eliminated uncertain voters, made minor adjustments for those who refused to answer and came up with 36% for the Conservatives and 35% for Labour. The actual outcome was 36.9% Conservative and 30.4% Labour. The Conservative result is within the margin of error and the Labour result isn't far off.

Others were further afield. Populus (2,417 people intending to vote) had Labour ahead 34% to 33%. YouGov, which polled 10,307 people (a margin of error around one percentage point), had the parties at 34% each. Survation's online poll of around 4,000 people came up with a 33% tie.

Survation's chief executive, Damian Lyons Lowe, wrote in a blog post Friday that his company had actually polled 1,045 people by telephone late on the eve of the election and had the Conservatives ahead by 37% to 31%—almost exactly the final outcome. (The total count includes voters in Northern Ireland, whom many pollsters don't survey.) "The result seemed so 'out of line,'" he wrote, "that I 'chickened out' of publishing the figures—something I'm sure I'll always regret."

The projections of how many seats those votes would translate into were much wider of the mark.

YouGov's "NowCast" prediction gave the two main parties 276 seats each. YouGov President Peter Kellner separately projected 284 seats for the Conservatives and 263 for Labour. The website FiveThirtyEight, run by statistics guru Nate Silver, who made his name with accurate predictions of U.S. presidential elections, used a model developed by British academics. It came up with 278 seats for the Conservatives and 267 for Labour, and put the probability at 90% that the Conservatives would win between 252 and 305 seats. They won 331.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Twitter, Mr. Silver said the forecasts should have had wider confidence intervals—that is, they should have been presented as less precise.

Seat projections are vastly harder than national polls. Britain has 650 parliamentary seats. Each is a winner-takes-all contest, a system known here as "first past the post." An accurate overall projection must nail both how many people vote for which party, as well as where they're voting. For pollsters, "first past the post is pretty much the most complicated electoral system you could devise," said John Curtice, a professor at the University of Strathclyde and Britain's dean of political polls.

Ben Page, chief executive of Ipsos MORI, points out that small changes in vote share can yield big changes in seat count. Labour won 35% of the national vote in 2005 and 355 seats. The Conservatives won 36% in 2010 and took 306. Thus divining seat projections from surveys of the national vote is tough. "The opinion polls are a blunt instrument," Mr. Page said.

Polling each constituency regularly is impractical. Even a national poll of 10,000 people at best only touches a dozen or so people in each constituency. As in the U.S., there are "safe" seats, but hundreds are up for grabs.

'The result seemed so 'out of line,'" he wrote, "that I 'chickened out' of publishing the figures—something I'm sure I'll always regret.'

—Damian Lyons Lowe, chief executive of Survation

And while election forecasters in the U.S. project outcomes in the Electoral College, those projections at their core are based on robust polls of the dozen or so states that are typically battlegrounds in American elections.

In the U.K., there isn't comprehensive, frequent polling data for parliamentary seats. That means seat projections use reams of assumptions to fill in gaps in the basic survey data. The model used by FiveThirtyEight, for instance, tries to intuit from historical voting patterns and demographics how people will vote, and then assigns probabilities to outcomes in each constituency.

It predicted that Labour had a 72% chance of winning a seat, held by a Conservative, in the battleground of Nuneaton in the West Midlands. It pegged Nuneaton as the "298th most likely seat to go Conservative."

The Conservative candidate won, 46% to 35%.

Simon Atkinson, of Ipsos MORI, said seat projections are difficult in any year. This year, he said, was especially fiendish because there is scant history for some of the resurgent smaller parties. The U.K. Independence Party, or UKIP, won 3.9 million votes, or a 12.6% share, to become Britain's third-biggest vote getter. In the 2010 election, it had just 3%.

There have been some individual polls of constituencies: Michael Ashcroft, a wealthy Tory peer, has commissioned scores of them, though only a small fraction are current. His poll in Nuneaton, done in mid-March, had the Labour candidate ahead 39% to 34%.

VE Day anniversary: Party leaders join in Cenotaph ceremony // BBC// Sarah Campbell - May 8, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Prime Minister David Cameron, Ed Miliband, Nick Clegg and Nicola Sturgeon laid wreaths at the Cenotaph in London's Whitehall.

The Queen later lit the first of hundreds of ceremonial beacons.

Events this weekend will commemorate the 70th anniversary of VE Day - the end of World War Two on the continent.

The Queen and her husband the Duke of Edinburgh greeted crowds gathered to watch the lighting ceremony at Windsor Great Park.

A series of beacons were also due to be lit at events throughout the country, including one at the Tower of London.

On 8 May 1945 people across the country lit hundreds of bonfires and beacons to celebrate the end of the war.

Earlier, more than 100 veterans joined Prince Andrew - a former Royal Navy helicopter pilot - along with senior politicians and military figures for the ceremony.

Among them was Mr Cameron, who was joined by Mr Miliband and Mr Clegg, in their last major roles as leaders of the Labour Party and the Liberal Democrats following their post-election resignations, to lay wreaths.

What was VE Day?

VE Day held on 8 May, 1945, celebrated the end of war in Europe

The British government had been planning the celebration from late 1944. The code word 'MOUSETRAP' alerted ministers when VE Day was imminent

Bunting was taken off rations, pubs stayed open late and searchlights were used to light public monuments

Churchill broadcast to the nation at 3pm from Whitehall. Listeners later heard their first weather forecast since war had begun

British Prime Minister Winston Churchill (1874 - 1965) waving to crowds gathered in Whitehall on VE Day, 8th May 1945.

Then prime minister Winston Churchill addressed thousands of people from the Treasury balcony 70 years ago

The Queen - who as Princess Elizabeth waved to the crowds on VE Day from the balcony of Buckingham Palace, alongside her parents King George VI and Queen Elizabeth - will attend a service of thanksgiving on Sunday at Westminster Abbey.

After the service, veterans and serving members of the armed forces will parade along Whitehall, past the Treasury balcony from which Churchill delivered his historic address.

In addition to the remembrance ceremonies taking place, there will also be street parties and concerts across the UK to recreate the spirit of celebration on the day 70 years ago.

The biggest will be at Horse Guards Parade on Saturday, where musical acts including Pixie Lott and Status Quo will perform wartime songs and actors John Simm, Julia Sawalha and Laurence Fox will give readings.

The Royal British Legion, which has worked with the government to prepare the commemorations, will host a reception for 2,000 veterans at the park.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a 24 hours which has been all about politics, the Service of Remembrance has been a time for a truly momentous day in British history to be remembered.

Seated around the Cenotaph were more than 100 veterans, sheltering under umbrellas from a light rain. Watching from behind metal barriers, the public.

Standing shoulder to shoulder were the Prime Minister David Cameron, Nick Clegg and Ed Miliband as well as Nicola Sturgeon. This was clearly no time for party politics.

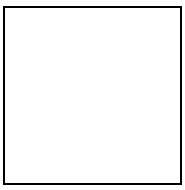
After the laying of wreaths, Randolph Churchill, the great grandson of Winston Churchill, read an extract from the speech he gave exactly 70 years ago. "We may allow ourselves a brief period of rejoicing but let us not forget the toil and efforts ahead."

Hundreds of smaller community events have been planned across the country after schools and local authorities were encouraged to take part.

There will also be commemorations in other European and Commonwealth countries.

Russia, which lost more citizens to the war than any other nation, is holding a Victory parade on Saturday in Moscow's Red Square. The UK, US and Germany have declined to send a representative in protest at Russia's actions in Ukraine.

--
Alexandria Phillips
Communications | Press Assistant
Hillary for America
https://www.hillaryclinton.com



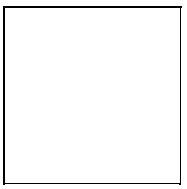
--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Amitabh Desai" <adesai@clintonfoundation.org>
To: "Hannah Richert - PC" <hannah@presidentclinton.com>
Date: 4/4/2012 4:41:06 AM
Subject: for WJC: "Wind Tops 10 Percent Share of Electricity in Five U.S. States"

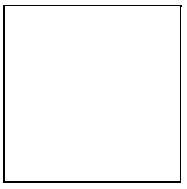
Dear Hannah, this may be of interest for the President. Sincerely, Ami

From: Earth Policy News [mailto:earthpolicynews@earth-policy.org]
Sent: Wednesday, April 04, 2012 8:56 AM
To: Amitabh Desai
Subject: Earth Policy News -- Wind Tops 10 Percent Share of Electricity in Five U.S. States



Earth Policy Release
Data Highlight
April 14, 2012

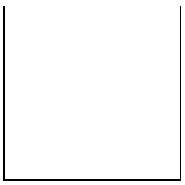
Wind Tops 10 Percent Share of Electricity in Five U.S. States



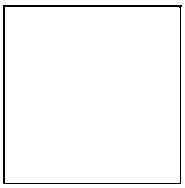
J. Matthew Roney

www.earth-policy.org/data_highlights/2012/highlights27

A new picture is emerging in the U.S. power sector. In 2007, electricity generation from coal peaked, dropping by close to 4 percent annually between 2007 and 2011. Over the same time period, nuclear generation fell slightly, while natural gas-fired electricity grew by some 3 percent annually and hydropower by 7 percent. Meanwhile, wind-generated electricity grew by a whopping 36 percent each year. Multiple factors underlie this nascent shift in U.S. electricity production, including the global recession, increasing energy efficiency, and more economically recoverable domestic natural gas. But ultimately it is the increasing attractiveness of wind as an energy source that will drive it into prominence.



Wind power accounted for just 2.9 percent of total electricity generation in the United States in 2011. In five U.S. states, however, 10 percent or more of electricity generation came from wind. South Dakota leads the states, with wind power making up 22 percent of its electricity generation in 2011, up from 14 percent in 2010. In 2011, Iowa generated 19 percent of its electricity with wind energy. And in North Dakota, wind's share was 15 percent.



The two most populous U.S. states are also harnessing more of their wind resources. While adding more than 900 megawatts of new wind farms in 2011 to its existing 3,000-megawatt wind capacity, California was able to increase its wind electricity share from 3 to 4 percent. Texas has the most wind installations of all the states, with 10,400 megawatts. In fact, if Texas were a country, it would rank sixth in the world for total wind capacity. Figures from the Electric Reliability Council of Texas (ERCOT), the independent service operator that delivers 85 percent of the state's electricity, show that wind's share of electricity in the ERCOT region jumped from 2.9 percent in 2007 to 8.5 percent in 2011.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Even though the cost of generating electricity from the wind has fallen substantially, certain policies have been needed to help it compete with the longtime support and lack of full-cost accounting for fossil fuels. Through so-called renewable portfolio standards (RPS), 29 states now require a percentage of utilities' electricity to come from renewables by a certain date. This includes 8 of the top 10 states in total installed wind power capacity. For example, California's RPS requires one third of the state's electricity to come from renewable sources by 2020. But the biggest policy driver of U.S. wind power growth thus far has been the federal production tax credit (PTC) for each kilowatt-hour of electricity a wind turbine generates. When Congress has allowed the PTC to expire, as it is scheduled to do again at the end of 2012, wind installations in the following year have plummeted.

In the short term, extending the PTC will be critical for the U.S. wind industry, which boasts more than 400 turbine component manufacturers and employs some 75,000 people. Ultimately, moving away from the recurring boom-bust threat by establishing a national RPS or a carbon tax would encourage even greater manufacturing growth and wind installations.

In a country where wind resources could power the entire economy, there is still great potential to be realized. Four states in northern Germany have set the mark, with each getting more than 40 percent of their electricity from the wind. Which U.S. state will get there first?

# #

For more information and data on wind energy in the United States and around the world, see Earth Policy Institute's Wind Indicator, "World Wind Power Climbs to New Record in 2011," at www.earth-policy.org.

Feel free to pass this information along to friends, family members, and colleagues!

Media Contact: Reah Janise Kauffman (202) 496-9290 ext. 12 | rjk@earthpolicy.org
Research Contact: J. Matthew Roney (202) 496-9290 ext. 17 | jmroney@earthpolicy.org

Earth Policy Institute
1350 Connecticut Avenue NW, Suite 403, Washington, DC 20036
Follow us on:

You are currently subscribed to public as: adesai@clintonfoundation.org
To unsubscribe send a blank email to leave-public-5360117I@lists.earth-policy.org

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Ilan Goldenberg" <igoldenberg@nsnetwork.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 9/2/2008 9:04:11 AM
Subject: [big campaign] The Disastrous Foreign Policy Legacy of George W. Bush

The Disastrous Foreign Policy Legacy of George W. Bush

"If we're an arrogant nation, they'll resent us; if we're a humble nation, but strong, they'll welcome us." -- George W. Bush, October 12, 2000

As the Republican National Convention embraces the Bush Administration, it is important to reflect on the President's foreign policy legacy – one of the most disastrous in the history of the United States.

President Bush inherited a peerless military and global respect for the U.S. and its values created over six decades of US engagement in the world. After 9/11, the President had an opportunity to unite the world behind us, eliminate the threat from Al Qaeda, and create a new security framework for the 21st century. Rather than finish the job against those who attacked us, President Bush squandered that chance by launching an ill-advised war in Iraq. Today Al Qaeda has regrouped in Pakistan, the situation in Afghanistan is deteriorating and Osama Bin Laden is still on the loose.

Meanwhile, 4,000 American troops have been killed in Iraq and the average American family of four has absorbed a cost of $16,500 to pay for a war that has destabilized the Middle East, empowered Iran and not made us safer.

The Bush policies have overstretched our military and crippled our ability to respond to unforeseen threats. They have put an incredible strain on our fighting men and women, undermining overall operational readiness and making it difficult to deal with new threats that might arise. The medical care, particularly mental healthcare, for returning troops has ranged from inadequate to disgraceful and repeated deployments have created enormous burdens for military families. It will take years to repair this damage and get the military back to where it needs to be.

The President has claimed that nuclear proliferation in the hands of our enemies is the greatest danger facing our country. And yet under his watch Iran has gone from zero to 4,000 centrifuges; North Korea has tested a nuclear device and dramatically expanded its arsenal; and our deteriorating relationship with Russia has undermined proliferation agreements.

The President's policies have undermined our most important alliances and damaged our credibility around the world. That lack of credibility has real consequences, making it more difficult to get our allies to stand with us on key issues such as sending more NATO troops to Afghanistan or standing up to Russian expansionism in Georgia.

Finally, contrary to President Bush's lofty rhetoric on democracy promotion, his tenure has seen the rollback of democracy around the world as autocratic states such as China and Russia have gotten stronger, while President Bush has abandoned his initial support for democracy promotion in the Middle East.

There is no doubt that the last eight years have been a disaster for American foreign policy, squandering sixty years of American prestige and principle.

The Bush Administration has Failed to Focus on the Greatest Danger in the Afghanistan-Pakistan Border

"I don't know where bin Laden is. I have no idea and really don't care. It's not that important. It's not our priority." – President George W. Bush, March 13, 2002

America's 16 intelligence agencies say that al Qaeda is growing stronger and that the threat emanating from the Afghanistan-Pakistan border is the single greatest danger to American security. The 2006 and 2007 National

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Intelligence Estimates both concluded that al Qaeda "will continue to pose the greatest threat to the Homeland and US interests abroad." The 2006 National Intelligence Estimate on terrorism also "cites the Iraq war as a reason for the diffusion of jihad ideology." The GAO, in concert with the unclassified 2007 NIE and State and embassy documents, Defense, State and other officials found that "al Qaeda's central leadership, based in the border area of Pakistan, is and will remain the most serious terrorist threat to the United States…" and "…is now using the Pakistani safe haven to put the last element necessary to launch another attack against America into place…" [NIE, 4/06 . NIE, 7/07 . NY Times, 9/24/06 . GAO, 4/08]

Rather than focus on the greatest threat, the Bush administration has consistently diverted resources away from Afghanistan to Iraq. The New York Times reports that "the White House shifted its sights, beginning in 2002, from counterterrorism efforts in Afghanistan and Pakistan to preparations for the war in Iraq." According to current and former military and intelligence officials the war in Iraq has consistently diverted resources and high-level attention from the fight against al Qaeda. Intelligence officials report that by 2006, the Iraq war had drained away most of the C.I.A. officers with field experience in the Islamic world. "You had a very finite number" of experienced officers, said one former senior intelligence official. "Those people all went to Iraq. We were all hurting because of Iraq." In fact, "when American military and intelligence officials requested additional Predator drones to survey the tribal areas, they were told no drones were available because they had been sent to Iraq." [NY Times, 6/30/08]

Military officials have also warned about how Iraq is hurting the fight in Afghanistan. Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Admiral Michael Mullen has asserted that more U.S. troops are needed in Afghanistan to help control an increasingly active insurgency but, due to the war in Iraq, insufficient forces are available for such action. "I don't have troops I can reach for, brigades I can reach to send into Afghanistan until I have a reduced requirement in Iraq," Mullen said. "Afghanistan remains an economy of force campaign, which by definition means we need more forces there. We have the ability in almost every single case to win from the combat standpoint, but we don't have enough troops there to hold. That is key to the future of being able to succeed in Afghanistan." In the most blunt assessment of all, General Dan McNeill, former NATO commander for Afghanistan, called the regional mission an "under-resourced war." [Washington Post, 7/2/08 . New York Times, 7/2/08]

Bush Administration neglect has thrown the Afghanistan-Pakistan region into misery. The state of affairs in the Afghanistan-Pakistan region is grim. Retired Gen. Barry McCaffrey, in a harrowing assessment, said that Afghanistan "is in misery," a result of poor coordination, inept management, and a dearth of resources and troops. Indeed, violence is up 40% along the volatile Afghanistan-Pakistan border, and the Taliban have grown so brazen that they now mount attacks on US-ISAF military bases. In northwest Pakistan, Al Qaeda has reconstituted and is now capable of "blending into Western society" to plot attacks against the US and its allies, and Taliban forces are resurgent, having carried out bombings that killed 200 people in the last two weeks of August alone. [General Barry McCaffrey, 7/30/08 . LA Times, 6/25/08 . NY Times, 8/19/08 . NY Times, 8/13/08 . AP, 8/29/08]

The War in Iraq Has Made Us Less Secure

"Major combat operations in Iraq have ended. In the battle of Iraq, the United States and our allies have prevailed." - President Bush, 5/1/03

The costs of the Iraq War both in terms of blood and treasure have been tremendous. More than 4,000 American troops have been killed in Iraq and another 30,000 have been wounded. Already more than $600 billion has been allocated in direct costs and the costs to the U.S. economy already exceed $1 trillion. Five and a half years after the start of the war, 140,000 American troops remain in Iraq. All of this after the Bush administration promised us that we would be greeted as liberators and that the war would cost less than $50 billion. [Brookings Institution, 8/21/08 . Congressional Joint Economic Committee, 2/28/2008 . CBS News, 11/15/02]

Iran has been the biggest strategic beneficiary of the war in Iraq. By eliminating Saddam Hussein and the Taliban and replacing those governments with security vacuums, the United States allowed Iran to dramatically expand its regional influence. As Ray Takeyh explained, "Iran now lies at the center of the Middle East's major problems -- from the civil wars unfolding in Iraq and Lebanon to the security challenge of the Persian Gulf -- and it is hard to imagine any of them being resolved without Tehran's cooperation." Moreover, many of the Shi'a political groups, whom the U.S. empowered in Iraq, have deep ties to Iran, including the Islamic Supreme Council of Iraq (ISCI), which represents one of the two largest Shi'a political movements in Iraq, was originally formed in Iran. [Ray Takeyh, Foreign Affairs, March/April 2007 . Rand Beers, Testimony Before the Congressional Joint Economic Committee, 2/28/08]

The Iraq War has further destabilized the Middle East. Hundreds of thousands of Iraqis have been killed in sectarian fighting. More than 4 million Iraq have been displaced, including 2 million refugees, most of whom have fled to Syria and Jordan threatening the stability of those countries. The war has roped in regional players with Turkey briefly entering

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Northern Iraq in late 2007 to fight the Kurdistan Workers Party (PKK), Iran playing an active role in arming and supporting various militias, and Saudi Arabia working to counter Iranian influence by funding Sunni groups. [New England Journal of Medicine, 1/31/08 . Financial Times, 1/10/2008 . Brookings Institution, 8/21/08 . UNHCR]

Our Military is Overstretched and Misused

"As you know, you go to war with the Army you have. Not the Army you might want or wish to have at a later time." – Donald Rumsfeld, 12/04/04

Army Chief of Staff: Iraq is hurting the Army's ability to sustain itself and plan for future contingencies. Gen. George Casey, Army Chief of Staff, stated that "The cumulative effects of the last six-plus years at war have left our Army out of balance, consumed by the current fight and unable to do the things we know we need to do to properly sustain our all-volunteer force and restore our flexibility for an uncertain future." [AP, 2/26/08]

Former Army Vice Chief of Staff says the Iraq War poses "significant risk" to all-volunteer army, as the army can't absorb anymore. Gen. Richard A. Cody, who recently retired as the Army's Vice Chief of Staff told Congress that the "heavy deployments are inflicting 'incredible stress' on soldiers and families and that they pose 'a significant risk' to the nation's all-volunteer military. 'When the five-brigade surge went in, that took all the stroke out of the shock absorbers for the United States Army,' Cody testified. 'Our readiness is being consumed as fast as we build it. Lengthy and repeated deployments with insufficient recovery time have placed incredible stress on our soldiers and our families, testing the resolve of our all-volunteer force like never before.'" [Washington Post, 4/2/08 . NYT, 4/6/08]

Multiple deployments are taking a heavy psychological and physical toll on our troops. "More than a quarter of U.S. soldiers on their third or fourth tours in Iraq suffer mental health problems partly because troops are not getting enough time at home between deployments, the Army said. 'Soldiers are not resetting entirely before they get back into theater,' said Lt. Col. Paul Bliese, who led the Army's Mental Health Advisory Team survey for 2007." [Reuters, 3/06/08]

It will take years for our military to rebuild. "It will take years for the Army and Marine Corps to recover from what some officials privately have called a 'death spiral,' in which the ever more rapid pace of war-zone rotations has consumed 40 percent of their total gear, wearied troops and left no time to train to fight anything other than the insurgencies now at hand." "The combat readiness of the total Army (active units, the National Guard, and the Army Reserve) is in tatters. The simple fact is that the United States currently does not have enough troops who are ready and available for potential contingency missions in places like Iran, North Korea, Pakistan, or anywhere else" [Lawrence Korb, Testimony Before House Armed Services Committee, 7/27/07 . Washington Post, 3/19/07]

Nuclear Proliferation Has Continued Unabated

"The gravest danger our Nation faces lies at the crossroads of radicalism and technology. Our enemies have openly declared that they are seeking weapons of mass destruction, and evidence indicates that they are doing so with determination." – President Bush, 9/17/02

The Bush administration has stubbornly refused to engage in tough diplomacy as under its watch Iran's uranium enrichment program has gone from zero to 4,000 centrifuges. Despite bipartisan calls from the Iraq Study Group, former Bush administration officials, and progressives, the administration has refused to engage Iran. Instead it has stubbornly continued a failed policy that has not worked for the past five years. As a result, Iran's uranium enrichment program has continued to progress and it has gone from zero to 4,000 of the centrifuges processing enriched uranium. [Washington Post, 8/29/08 . American Prospect, 6/25/08]

Under the Bush administration's watch North Korea tested a nuclear device and has significantly expanded its nuclear arsenal. Rather than pursue the Clinton administration policy of engaging directly with North Korea – a policy that was working – the Bush administration took a much harder line. Since then North Korea has developed enough material for approximately 10 nuclear bombs and even tested a device in late 2006. After six years of failure the Bush administration returned to the Clinton policy and is now offering economic incentives in exchange for North Korea dismantling its program. [Washington Post, 10/9/06 . LA Times, 8/27/08]

Our deteriorating relationship with Russia is threatening to undermine cooperation on nuclear proliferation issues. "But one potential casualty that causes special worry for some analysts is the suspension of cooperation on nuclear nonproliferation and other arms control efforts. The Wall Street Journal reported on August 23, the Bush administration's 'landmark nuclear-cooperation agreement' with Moscow could be derailed following Russia's moves in Georgia. The deal, which the White House had hoped to finalize in September, aimed to increase U.S.-Russia cooperation on peaceful nuclear technology. But as one U.S. official told the paper, nuclear deals are 'no longer business as usual.' The Financial Times reported on August 25 that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is expected to call on President Bush to recall the civil nuclear deal with Russia from Congress. 'At this point, it's dead,' a congressional staffer told the paper." [Council on Foreign Relations, 8/26/08 . Wall Street Journal, 8/23/08 . Financial Times, 8/25/08]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Our Credibility With Our Allies is Weakened

"Every nation, in every region, now has a decision to make. Either you are with us, or you are with the terrorists." – President George W. Bush, September 20, 2001

Global respect for the United States is evaporating, even among our closest allies. Only 30 percent of Germans now have a positive view of the United States, down from 78 percent before Bush took office in January 2001. In Turkey, a Muslim democracy and NATO ally, only 9 percent now have a favorable view, down from 52 percent in late 2001. Most alarming is that just 51 percent of Britons – our partner in Iraq and our most reliable ally - now hold favorable views of the United States, down from 75 percent before the Iraq invasion. [IHT, 6/27/07 . Pew Global Attitudes Project, 6/27/07 . NY Times, 2/07/08]

Our diminished prestige is hurting our ability to deal with major crises such as Georgia and Afghanistan. In Afghanistan, we need a greater military commitment from our NATO allies to help stabilize the country and prevent the reemergence of a terrorist haven. Yet, public opinion in Europe has conflated the necessary war in Afghanistan with the unnecessary war in Iraq. The whole venture is now so unpopular, and the domestic political cost of providing more troops for Afghanistan has become so high, that it has created a major impediment in getting the support we need for the mission. Meanwhile, the fraying of the NATO alliance also weakened the response to the Russian invasion of Georgia. As Jamie Rubin explained, "Let's remember it was Chancellor Merkel of Germany who became the power broker when leaders at the NATO summit debated the subject of Georgia this spring. The United States, which has traditionally led NATO on such subjects, failed to push through a so-called Membership Action Plan for Georgia. That failure, as much as anything, gave Moscow a crucial signal that the West could not muster a serious response should it crack down on its troublesome neighbor." [NY Times, 2/07/08 . Huffington Post, 8/13/08]

Our image in the Muslim world is hurting our ability to fight Al Qaeda. In countries across the Muslim world from Pakistan to Morocco our image is so tainted that local politicians who work closely with the United States are viewed with suspicion or simply discredited, making it far more difficult for us to win the ideological struggle with Al Qaeda. [Rand Beers, Testimony Before the Congressional Joint Economic Committee, 2/28/08]

Democracy Around the World Has Suffered

So it is the policy of the United States to seek and support the growth of democratic movements and institutions in every nation and culture, with the ultimate goal of ending tyranny in our world. – President Bush Second Inaugural Address , 1/20/05

2007 was a year "marked by a global setback" for the advance of freedom and democracy. Across the world, in countries like China, Russia, Egypt, Venezuela and Zimbabwe, freedom and democracy are in distress. According to Freedom House's 2008 report on the state of global freedom, the "world's most important autocracies have engaged in what has been called a pushback against democracy promotion," using the policies of the Bush administration as a rationale to crackdown on their own troublesome advocates for democratic reform. [Freedom House, Freedom in the World 2008]

Where President Bush sought to bring democracy through his own persona and personal relationships, freedoms have disintegrated and instability reigns. "More than many of his predecessors, President Bush has invested heavily in trying to forge a strong bond with key foreign leaders. But as his term winds down, new crises in Georgia and Pakistan are underscoring the limits of Bush's personal diplomacy, as the president is receiving criticism for overpersonalizing relations with Putin, the Russian prime minister, and with Pervez Musharraf, who resigned as Pakistan's president last week" Today, a revanchist Russia has curtailed freedoms and threatens its democratic neighbors, while in Pakistan, the collapse of military rule, supported by the Bush Administration, has introduced political strife, and a new wave of terrorist attacks. [Washington Post, 8/27/08 . Freedom House, June 2007 . The Guardian, 8/22/08]

In the Middle East, the advance of democracy has faltered. Despite President Bush's pronouncement of a "forward strategy of freedom" for the Middle East, today, in places like Iraq, Egypt, and Lebanon the forces of democracy and moderation are in retreat, and intemperate, authoritarian, even extremist rule is at an apex. In Iraq, the US and the Iraqi government have failed to translate security improvements into political reconciliation, and ethno-sectarian cleavages continue to fester. Egypt's government continues to crackdown on reformers and dissidents, and in Lebanon, where 2005's Cedar revolution is but a memory, Hezbollah "stands unquestioned as the single most powerful force" in the country. And finally, Iranian President Ahmadinejad and his conservative, anti-western allies, have been newly strengthened by the Supreme

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Leader's endorsement of Ahmadinejad's leadership. [President George W. Bush, 2/04/04 . NSN, 8/21/08 . AP, 8/03/08. Washington Post, 5/18/08 . AP, 8/24/08]

National Security Network | 1225 Eye St. NW | Suite 307 | Washington, DC, 20005 | US

Unsubscribe from future marketing messages from National Security Network

DELIVERED BY

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Ian Sams" <isams@hillaryclinton.com>
To: hrcrapid <hrcrapid@googlegroups.com>
Date: 4/14/2015 5:02:51 PM
Subject: Christie taking some shots at HRC

Boilerplate.

He also took a swipe at the Democratic front-runner on foreign policy, criticizing Clinton's "reset" with Russia while secretary of state as akin to "allow[ing] Vladimir Putin to believe that he can move in on Crimea." "There would be no misunderstandings between Mr. Putin and I if I were president," he added.

Read more: http://www.politico.com/story/2015/04/chris-christie-targets-hillary-clinton-116986.html#ixzz3XLaDjCnr

Chris Christie targets Hillary Clinton, talks up swing-state appeal

By ADAM B. LERNER

4/14/15 9:55 PM EDT
Updated 4/14/15 10:31 PM EDT

Gov. Chris Christie spent Tuesday reassuring his supporters that he's still bold, still brash and should still very much be in the 2016 conversation.
On the Hugh Hewitt show, the New Jersey Republican told the host outright, "If I run, I will beat [Hillary Clinton]." He mentioned Pennsylvania, New Mexico, New Hampshire and Colorado as four states won by President Barack Obama in 2008 and 2012 that he believes he could put in play.
Story Continued Below

He also took a swipe at the Democratic front-runner on foreign policy, criticizing Clinton's "reset" with Russia while secretary of state as akin to "allow[ing] Vladimir Putin to believe that he can move in on Crimea." "There would be no misunderstandings between Mr. Putin and I if I were president," he added.
In an interview with Yahoo News' Matt Bai, Christie dismissed comparisons between 2016 and 2012, when the Garden State governor decided to forgo a presidential bid despite numerous Republican heavy-hitters urging him to run.
"The only way you're going to perform well is if you believe in your heart that you're ready to be president. And I didn't. And so there was no way I would have won in 2012. I wouldn't have, because I wasn't ready."

ALSO ON POLITICO
Christie jump-starts campaign in New Hampshire
ELI STOKOLS and ALEX ISENSTADT

When asked whether he now considers himself ready, he responded "Yes."
The comments came after an awkward interaction with a reporter at an event in New Hampshire, when Christie said people believe that he's a moderate only because he's a Northeasterner and "a little ethnic."
With other Republicans announcing their candidacies in recent weeks — and reaping substantial funds from donors in their rollouts — Christie has struggled to stay a part of the conversation.
In a USA Today poll released Tuesday, Christie sits at 1 percent of the early GOP vote, right next to Ohio Gov. John Kasich and Donald Trump.
Still, Christie is betting that he can gain momentum with a successful rollout and pitch himself as a blue-state governor able to win in a general election.
"You don't have to theorize [winning a general election] with me," Christie told Hewitt of his potential. "You've seen I've [won reelection] in what is one of the bluest states in America after governing as a conservative for four years."

Read more: http://www.politico.com/story/2015/04/chris-christie-targets-hillary-clinton-116986.html#ixzz3XLaYHxqd

--
Ian Sams | Rapid Response Associate
Hillary for America
(423) 915-6592 | @IanSams
Gchat: icsams

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/CABd81JJ96hm7RU8nTRp_5nd1WF%2BTyugC_5AZBEmd0rV0amPeyg%40mail.gmail.com.
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Karen Finney" <kfinney@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Ian Sams" <isams@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 4/12/2015 2:31:36 PM
Subject: Re: draft surrogate talkers -- responding to day 1 attacks

Can we start with a positive line like - despite the overwhelmingly positive response to Hillary's message, the GOP went into attack mode.

On Sun, Apr 12, 2015 at 9:15 PM, Ian Sams <isams@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

> Hey folks. Here are some points we pulled together for surrogates going on TV -- not a wide blast -- on how to respond to day one attacks on HRC. Thoughts? Adrienne/Karen/etc. can get to surrogates once we're all good.
>
> Thanks.
> Ian
>
> OPENING DAY -- SURROGATE TALKING POINTS ON GOP ATTACKS
>
> Today we've seen a wide range of attacks from the entire GOP field and their allies. Below are some points to respond -- keeping the focus on Hillary's desire to focus on voters while the Republicans are trotting out tired attacks on her.
>
> - Republicans can focus on attacking her, but Hillary is focused on meeting voters and having real conversations about issues facing everyday Americans. This is the start of the different kind of campaign that Hillary wants to run -- one that is squarely focused on having a conversation with voters -- answering their questions, asking them questions and sharing ideas.
>
> - Meanwhile, Republicans want to be the champions for those at the top. While Hillary is talking to voters and focused on everyday Americans, every single Republican candidate has offered the same tired attacks and the same economic agenda that Americans know rob them of the stability they've worked so hard for -- with a top-down agenda that would stack the deck even more in favor of those at the top.
>
> - Americans have responded clearly that they appreciate Hillary's focus on their issues and their lives, so if Republicans want to keep their focus on tired political attacks, that's their choice.
>
> If pressed on specific GOP attacks on foreign policy/HRC's record at the State Department, stemming from Jeb Bush's video or other attacks:
>
> Job number one for Hillary as Secretary of State was to restore America's leadership after it was badly eroded by eight years of the Bush administration's foreign policy -- two wars, damaged alliances, diminished moral standing, no stopping Iran's nuclear program, and no action on climate. She's proud of her accomplishments.
>
> - Hillary led the effort to build a worldwide coalition to impose the toughest sanctions in history against the Iranians, which forced them to the negotiating table and gave us our best shot at preventing them from acquiring a nuclear weapon.
> - Hillary brokered a ceasefire between Israel and Hamas in Gaza, which prevented a wider war and protected Israel's security.
> - Hillary stood up to Putin by strengthening NATO, encouraging Europe to find alternative sources of energy, and called him out for trying to rebuild the Soviet Empire.
> - Hillary worked with President Obama to get every major developing country, including China and India, to agree for the first time to reduce their carbon emissions and be held accountable for it.
> - Hillary put internet freedom, LGBT rights, and women's rights on the global agenda, and defending human rights advocates on the frontlines around the world.
> - And, of course, she was part of the President's team making the decision to launch the raid against bin Laden.
>
> Jeb Bush may attack Hillary's time as Secretary of State now, but it's just negative politics meant to gin up his Republican base.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Jeb Bush in 2013: “Former Secretary Clinton has dedicated her life to serving and engaging people across the world in democracy. These efforts as a citizen, an activist, and a leader have earned Secretary Clinton this year’s Liberty Medal.” [National Constitution Center, 6/27/2013]

Jeb Bush is advocating for the same failed foreign policy that led us to misguided wars and degraded our nation’s standing in the world.

- Jeb Bush on George W. Bush: “I will tell you that I’m the only Republican that was in office when he was office as President that never disagreed with him. And I’m not going to start now. Why would I do that now after two years? …I’m not going to start now. It’s just – ‘til death do us part.” [CNN interview]

--
Ian Sams | Rapid Response Associate
Hillary for America
(423) 915-6592 | @IanSams
Gchat: icsams

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/CABd81JJxcSiv95x3%3Duc5H1fSQ5M9CZZ0deNmoNAwM%2BHKiO-p3Q%40mail.gmail.com.
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/CANOiRV9voo87eQ%2B49MXGxRrOM5gUxNkP0nCAL5ybLthiBFQVhA%40mail.gmail.com.
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara Du Bois" <sdubois@progressivemediausa.org>
To: "Sara Du Bois" <SDuBois@progressivemediausa.org>
Date: 4/30/2008 1:39:59 AM
Subject: [big campaign] '08 Daily News Clips - 4/30

08 Election Daily News Clips
April 30th, 2008

Candidate Tracking:

11:20am BUSH: Remarks to the 2008 National and State Teachers of the Year in the White House Rose Garde n

12pm McCain: Luncheon in Bethlehem, PA

2pm McCain: Speech in Allentown, PA
- Tracking scheduled for this event
3:45pm McCain: Media Availability in Allentown, PA
- Tracking scheduled for this event
6:55 pm BUSH: Attends NRCC Reception at a private residence in Fairfax, Virginia

News Clips:

MCCAIN HEALTH CARE NEWS

McCain Offers Market-Based Health Plan (Washington Post 4/30/08)
By Michael D. Shear; A01
Sen. John McCain on Tuesday rejected calls by his Democratic opponents for universal health coverage, instead offering a market-based solution with an approach similar to a proposal put forth by President Bush last year.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/04/29/AR2008042902706.html
Link to transcript of speech: http://www.realclearpolitics.com/articles/2008/04/mccain_at_miamis_children_hosp.html

Federal Money in Health Care Plan From McCain (NY Times 4/30/08)
By MICHAEL COOPER and KEVIN SACK
Senator John McCain, detailing his plan to solve the nation's health care crisis, called Tuesday for federal intervention with the states to assure coverage for people who have been denied insurance.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/04/30/us/politics/30mccain.html

McCain Pushes a Health-Care Plan With Less Regulation (WSJ 4/30/08)
By LAURA MECKLER; Page A6
Sen. John McCain laid out his vision for the U.S. health-care system Tuesday, rejecting universal health insurance and embracing a system with fewer regulations in which consumers shop for coverage on their own rather than get it from an employer.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB120949803079953667.html?mod=special_page_campaign2008_leftbox

McCain health plan eyes 'uninsurables' (USA TODAY 4/29/08)
By David Jackson
John McCain said Tuesday he will work with states to create insurance pools for people who have trouble getting coverage because of pre-existing illnesses.
http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/election2008/2008-04-29-mccain-uninsurables_N.htm

The Folly of McCain-Care (New Republic 4/29/08)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

by Jonathan Cohn
His great new plan isn't new or great. And it still wouldn't help Elizabeth Edwards get decent insurance.
http://tnr.com/politics/story.html?id=a88ab4f7-d570-47ad-ab80-a7e817ddab6b

Edwards Targets 'GAP' in McCain Plan (ABC 4/29/08)
By TEDDY DAVIS and TALAL AL-KHATIB
GOPer's Plan Ripped for 'Gross Underfunding'
http://abcnews.go.com/Politics/TheNote/story?id=3105455&page=1

Return Of The Mack (Hotline blog 4/29/08)
By JENNIFER SKALKA
A trail note of interest to those counting the lobbyists and former lobbyists in John McCain's orbit: Former U.S. Sen. Connie Mack (R-FL) introduced McCain today at his health care policy event in Florida. Mack is chairman of the board of directors of the H. Lee Moffitt Cancer Center & Research Institute, where McCain's event was held. Mack is also, we should note, a registered state lobbyist, working for Liberty Partners of Florida and, drumroll, advocating for health insurance companies.
http://hotlineblog.nationaljournal.com/archives/2008/04/return_of_the_m_1.html

McCain on health care (MSNBC 4/29/08)
By Adam Aigner-Treworgy
TAMPA, Fla. -- Despite receiving top billing during McCain's weeklong health-care tour, this morning's speech at the University of Southern Florida featured only an expansion of the healthcare proposal McCain has been advocating on the stump for months.
http://firstread.msnbc.msn.com/archive/2008/04/29/956979.aspx

MCCAIN NEWS

McCain Strengthening His Political Marriage (NY Times 4/30/08)
By CARL HULSE
Senator John McCain's recent harsh critique of the Republican-led response to Hurricane Katrina no doubt reminded some of his newfound allies in Congress that his independent image was often honed at his party's expense.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/04/30/us/politics/30repubs.html?_r=1&ref=politics&oref=slogin

McCain Missing in Action (Washington Post blog 4/29/08)
By Ben Pershing
His name was never mentioned, but as Republican and Democratic lawmakers took turns praising each other this afternoon for backing legislation that would greatly expand veterans' education benefits, presumptive Republican nominee John McCain was the Republican elephant not in the room.
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/capitol-briefing/2008/04/mccain_missing_in_action.html?hpid=news-col-blog

Union Ad Criticizes McCain on Health Care (NY Times blog 4/29/08)
By Kate Phillips
As Senator John McCain spends the week talking about health care and health insurance coverage, the Service Employees International Union has begun broadcasting an ad against his plans in Ohio and Washington, D.C.
http://thecaucus.blogs.nytimes.com/2008/04/29/union-ad-criticizes-mccain-on-health-care/
Link to video of ad: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=2bGfKu5CfXQ

McCain eyes voting 'no' on the farm bill (The Hill 4/29/08)
By Manu Raju
Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) is leaning against backing a massive farm bill that would rewrite agriculture policy over the next five years, a choice that puts him in between his fiscal conservative base and rural states important in the general election.
http://thehill.com/leading-the-news/mccain-eyes-voting-no-on-the-farm-bill-2008-04-29.html

Maverick McCainomics Could Alter Our Fiscal Future (US News & World Report blog 4/30/08)
James Pethokoukis

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Uncle Sam has plenty of dough. That's the core belief at the center of McCainomics. Or maybe we should call it "maverick economics," since John McCain's approach toward taxes and government spending has the potential to change the rules of the Washington budget game. Actually, it has the potential to change the game itself and perhaps create a long-term solution to America's fiscal problem—with trillions left over. See, that's what the Wall Street Journal didn't seem to understand when one of its reporters wrote the following last week:
http://www.usnews.com/blogs/capital-commerce/2008/4/29/maverick-mccainomics-could-alter-our-fiscal-future.html

McCain the Anti-War Warrior? (OutsideTheBeltway 4/29/08)
James Joyner
In the cover story of the new American Prospect, Matt Yglesias describes John McCain ... But this is wrong in almost every sense imaginable. Can anyone seriously doubt that a man who spent 5-1/2 years being tortured by the Viet Cong hates war? But one can simultaneously hate war and think it preferable to allowing despots to gain nuclear weapons.
http://www.outsidethebeltway.com/archives/2008/04/mccain_the_anti-war_warrior/

Wash. Post's Murray: 'Just wait' until after the primaries for media to scrutinize McCain (ThinkProgress 4/29/08)
In a Washington Post discussion yesterday, Post reporter Shailagh Murray inadvertently admitted that the media is currently scrutinizing Sen. John McCain (R-AZ) less than they potentially could http://thinkprogress.org/2008/04/29/wash-posts-murray-just-wait-for-media-to-scrutinize-mccain/

Is "Falsely" Comment in Story on Anti-McCain Ad Accurate? (Editors & Publishers 4/29/08)
In a news account, The Associated Press today reports on charges of a "false" political ad -- but did it go too far in accepting the Republicans' complaint?
http://www.editorandpublisher.com/eandp/news/article_display.jsp?vnu_content_id=1003795869

Late Night Laughs on McCain Veep Prospects (NY Times blog 4/29/08)
By Kate Phillips
The headline may be a little bit misleading, but despite our early a.m. blogging duties, we were up last night watching Jay Leno banter with Bobby Jindal, the new, exceptionally young governor of Louisiana.
http://thecaucus.blogs.nytimes.com/2008/04/29/late-night-laughs-on-mccain-veep-prospects/

OPINIONS AND EDITORIALS

Getting to Know John McCain (WSJ 4/30/08)
By KARL ROVE; Page A17
It came to me while I was having dinner with Doris Day. No, not that Doris Day. The Doris Day who is married to Col. Bud Day, Congressional Medal of Honor recipient, fighter pilot, Vietnam POW and roommate of John McCain at the Hanoi Hilton.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB120951606847454685.html?mod=opinion_main_commentaries

Dumb as We Wanna Be (NY Times 4/30/08)
By THOMAS L. FRIEDMAN
The McCain-Clinton energy proposal is a reminder that the biggest energy crisis we have in our country today is the energy to be serious.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/04/30/opinion/30friedman.html

McCain's Progress (WSJ 4/30/08)
The Grand Guignol between Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama has to end eventually, and then the public discomfort over health care will resurface as a genuine policy dispute between the Democratic and Republican nominees. For a man whose heterodoxies have no doubt triggered GOP heartburn, John McCain delivered another speech yesterday on health care that offered a sophisticated set of policies that could lead to some of the most constructive changes to the system in decades.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB120951260482454447.html?mod=opinion_main_review_and_outlooks

Candidates' plans to cut gas prices (LA Times 4/30/08)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's and McCain's plans for a summer gas-tax suspension won't solve anything.
http://www.latimes.com/news/opinion/la-ed-gastax30apr30,0,399014.story

Obstacle course (Washington Times 4/30/08)
By Terence P. Jeffrey
One of the most surprising things about the presidential election four years ago is that the already unpopular war in Iraq was not the top issue in voter's minds. Nor was it the top national security issue. To get elected, Sen. John McCain needs something similar to happen this year. To construct such a scenario, it is helpful to reconstruct what happened four years ago.
http://washingtontimes.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20080430/COMMENTARY/197375934/1028/ELECTION

What war? (LA Times 4/30/08)
At home, the economy soars and Americans let the good times roll. Meanwhile, Iraq burns.
http://www.latimes.com/news/opinion/la-oe-ferguson30apr30,0,7557486.column

The Many Faces of John McCain (Huffington Post 4/30/08)
Jayne Lyn Stahl
While Barack Obama is said to be outraged about the latest sound bites coming from his former minister, Reverend Jeremiah Wright, where is our outrage at all the nonstop coverage of this nonsense, and the egregious efforts to abort the First Amendment guarantee of separation between church and state?
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/jayne-lyn-stahl/the-many-faces-of-john-mc_b_99310.html

McCain's disturbing lack of Mideast realism (Dallas Morning News 4/30/08)
By Trudy Rubin
As the Democratic candidates battle each other, Sen. John McCain's ideas about America and the world have gotten too little coverage. In an obvious effort to distinguish himself from President Bush, Mr. McCain describes himself as "realistic idealist." Yet his speeches and comments reveal a disturbing lack of realism about the world, especially the Middle East. Mr. McCain's global outlook is that of a man still living in the 1990s, when America's power and the dollar reigned supreme.
http://www.dallasnews.com/sharedcontent/dws/dn/opinion/viewpoints/stories/DN-rubin_30edi.ART.State.Edition1.4687ed4.html

BUSH NEWS

Bush Blames Democrats for Sliding Economy (Washington Post 4/29/08)
By William Branigin
President Bush today blamed Congress for many of the nation's economic woes, charging that lawmakers have blocked his proposals for dealing with problems ranging from soaring gasoline prices to the increasing cost of food.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/04/29/AR2008042900698.html?hpid=topnews
Link to video: http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/video/2008/04/29/VI2008042901048.html

Bush Prods Lawmakers on Economy, Energy Prices (WSJ 4/30/08)
By MICHAEL M. PHILLIPS, GREG HITT and SARAH LUECK; Page A3
President Bush blamed the Democratic-controlled Congress for failing to reduce gasoline prices, stave off foreclosures and sufficiently fund student loans, kicking off what is likely to be weeks of cutthroat politicking between the White House and Capitol Hill.
http://online.wsj.com/article/SB120947778128652773.html?mod=special_page_campaign2008_rightbox

Bush Says Pain From Economy Defies Easy Fix (NY Times 4/30/08)
By SHERYL GAY STOLBERG and DAVID M. HERSZENHORN
WASHINGTON — With consumer confidence slipping and gasoline and food prices soaring, President Bush delivered an unusually dark assessment of the economy on Tuesday, saying the nation was in "very difficult times, very difficult."
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/04/30/washington/30bush.html?ref=todayspaper

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush Ignores His Own Administration's Guidelines, Refers To Terrorists As 'Jihadists' (ThinkProgress 4/29/08)
In his Rose Garden press conference today, an exasperated President Bush lashed out at critics who question whether he is presenting too rosy of an assessment when he says that the U.S. is making progress in Afghanistan. "The notion that somehow we can let these people just kind of have their way," said Bush. "Let's don't stir them up, is naive or disingenuous."
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/04/29/bush-jihadist-language/

Bush to N. Korea: We know what you're doing (CNN 4/29/08)
Bush seeks to increase pressure on Iran, North Korea, Syria
Bush says people looking to Congress for action and only getting delay
Bush asks Congress to focus on energy, food prices, mortgages, student loans
Bush calls on Congress to send him sensible and effective bills
http://www.cnn.com/2008/POLITICS/04/29/bush.economy/index.html

Bush hits all-time low on handling of the economy (ThinkProgress 4/29/08)
In a NBC/WSJ poll to be released tomorrow, "only 21% approve of President Bush's job in handling the economy — his lowest number ever as president on that question." Additionally, the poll found that 81% of Americans "believe the US is currently in a recession."
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/04/29/bush-hits-all-time-low-on-handling-of-the-economy/

OTHER TOP NEWS

Senior Iraqi government official assassinated in Baghdad (AP 4/29/08)
An Iraqi official says a roadside bomb has killed a senior government official in northern Baghdad.
http://talkingpointsmemo.com/news/2008/04/senior_iraqi_government_offici.php

Iraq budget cut by $171M after oil-profit windfall (CNN 4/29/08)
Congress demands Iraq spend its recent oil windfall on reconstruction projects
U.S. to seek "full funding from the government of Iraq," says Defense secretary
"I think it's time to take the training wheels off," says Sen. Mel Martinez Remaining $439 million reconstruction project funds should continue, says Gates http://www.cnn.com/2008/POLITICS/04/29/iraq.reconstruction/index.html

Obama strongly denounces former pastor (AP 4/29/08)
Candidate calls Wright's recent comments 'wrong and destructive' http://www.msnbc.msn.com/id/24371827/

IE WATCH

Outside groups compete for political ad time (AP 4/29/08)
By Jim Kuhnhenn,
For months, Barack Obama and Hillary Rodham Clinton have dominated political advertising. Increasingly, they are not alone.
http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/2008-04-29-2187728261_x.htm

Brock's Third-Party Group Launches "McCain Fact-Check" Site (TPM 4/29/08)
By Greg Sargent
Progressive Media U.S.A., the third-party pro-Dem group that has vowed to raise $40 million to target McCain in advance of the general election, is already feeling the influence of its new leader, Media Matters' David Brock.
http://tpmelectioncentral.talkingpointsmemo.com/2008/04/brocks_thirdparty_group_launch.php

--
Sara L. DuBois
Progressive Media USA
Sdubois@progressivemediausa.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Joshua Dorner" <jdorner@americanprogress.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 8/30/2012 8:18:54 AM
Subject: [big campaign] The Ultimate Viewer's Guide to Romney's Post-Truth Campaign

Good morning everyone,

If Paul Ryan's fact-free speech is any indication, Mitt Romney will be cranking the lies up to 11 tonight. In anticipation, we've put together a comprehensive list of Romney's most well-worn whoppers -- and why exactly they are not true.

Enjoy!

-Josh

http://thinkprogress.org/romney-facts-matter/

FACTS MATTER: The Ultimate Guide To Mitt Romney's Convention Speech

By ThinkProgress on Aug 30, 2012 at 10:36 am

Politicians from both parties twist facts or spin policy, but Mitt Romney's presidential campaign has had a particularly strained relationship with the truth, repeating false claims with impunity — even after fact checkers, mainstream media organizations, and blogs have all debunked their assertions.

From claiming that "Obama gutted the welfare work requirement" to insisting that his own policies won't deregulate Wall Street, Romney has led a post-truth campaign. A top adviser even admitted earlier this week, "We're not going to let our campaign be dictated by fact-checkers."

ThinkProgress has compiled a Viewer's Guide comparing what Romney says with the facts:

Romney On His Tax Plan || Romney On Wall Street || Romney On The Budget
Romney On Bain Capital || Romney On Obamacare || Romney On Medicare
Romney On Women's Health || Romney On Energy || Romney On Global Warming
Romney On The Auto Bailout || Romney On Welfare Reform || Romney On Food Stamps
Romney On Security || Romney On LGBT rights

Romney on His Tax Plan

"The highest income people will continue to pay the largest share of the tax burden and middle-income taxpayers, under my plan… So, we're not going to reduce taxes for high-income people." [CBS, 8/12/2012]

> REALITY: Under Romney's plan, someone in the richest 1 percent of Americans would receive a $60,000 tax cut, while someone in the richest 0.1 percent would receive a $264,000 tax cut. Even under the most generous assumptions about the elimination of tax deductions — so assuming Romney eliminates loopholes and deductions in the most progressive way possible — millionaires still receive an $87,000 tax cut, while the middle-class sees their taxes go up. [Tax Policy Center, 2/23/2012 ; Tax Policy Center, 8/1/2012]

"The people in the middle, the hard-working Americans, are the people who need a break, and that is why I focused my tax cut right there." [GOP debate, 10/11/2011]

> REALITY: A Tax Policy Center analysis of Romney plan showed that — even under the most generous assumptions — Romney's plan raises taxes on everyone making less than $200,000. Middle-class families would see their taxes go up by $2,000 per year. [Tax Policy Center, 8/1/2012]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The U.S. economy's 35 percent corporate tax rate is among the highest in the industrial world, reducing the ability of our nation's businesses to compete in the global economy and to invest and create jobs at home," Romney's website reads. [MittRomney.com, 8/16/2012]

REALITY: While America has the second-highest corporate tax rate on paper, once all of the loopholes, credits, and deductions are accounted for, its corporate tax rate is the second-lowest in the developed world. The U.S. raises far less in corporate taxes as a percentage of its economy than other nations, including the UK and Canada. Many of America's most profitable corporations pay literally no taxes. [Citizens for Tax Justice, 6/30/2011, 4/9/2012 ; Center for American Progress, 6/10/2011

Romney on Wall Street

"Look, no one is talking about deregulating Wall Street." [ThinkProgress , 8/15/2012]

REALITY: Romney has called for the full repeal of the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform Act, the first major overhaul of the nation's financial regulatory system since the Great Depression, and while he has supported a "streamlined regulatory framework," the only specific regulations he mentions in his plan are already in Dodd-Frank. His own running mate is certainly talking about deregulating Wall Street: the House GOP budget authored by Ryan dismantles key parts of the law. [ThinkProgress, 8/25/2011 , 8/13/2012 , 8/15/2012]

"The rate of regulatory burden has increased four-fold since Obama has become president. Four times the amount of regulation coming out per year as in the past. And so businesses say, 'gosh, I'm not sure I want to invest in America.'" [ThinkProgress, 12/12/2011]

REALITY: Obama approved 613 new rules during his first 33 months, 4.7 percent fewer than Bush did in the same timespan. The campaign initially claimed that "the governor misspoke" in levying the charge, but Romney keeps using it. [NPR, 9/9/2011 , Bloomberg, 10/25/2011]

Romney on the Budget

Romney claims that, as governor of Massachusetts, "we didn't just slow the rate of growth of our government, we actually cut it." [CBN, 5/14/2012]

REALITY: Government spending increased by an average of 5 percent per year during Romney's tenure in office. [Politifact, 5/21/2012]

President Obama has "racked up as much debt as almost all of the other presidents combined." [NYT, 12/16/2011]

REALITY: When Obama took office, the national debt stood at $10.626 trillion. When Romney made this claim in December 2011, the national debt was a bit over $15 trillion. That $4.5 trillion increase is nowhere near as much debt as all the other presidents combined. Even if you just consider the portion of the debt that is owed to private investors, as Romney's campaign has pointed to, the numbers still don't add up. When Obama took office this figure was at $6.307 trillion and had increased by approximately $4 trillion when Romney made this claim. [NYT, 12/16/2011]

"The President's vision is one of a larger and larger government, taking more and more, and trying to provide more and more to you…It takes us on a road to Europe." [Toledo Blade,8/25/2012]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

REALITY: Romney is calling for the sort of austerity that's been adopted in Europe, which has unnecessarily blunted economic growth. In fact, the European governments that have embraced austerity the most have seen the largest contractions in their economies. The U.S. is doing better in terms of economic growth than both the Eurozone and the United Kingdom, both of which have adopted the kind of heavy spending cuts Romney favors. [ThinkProgress, 7/26/2012 , 5/7/2012]

"What the president is proposing is therefore a massive tax increase on job creators and on small business. Small businesses are overwhelmingly being taxed not at a corporate rate but at the individual tax rate. So successful small businesses will see their taxes go up dramatically, and that will kill jobs." [Los Angeles Times, 7/9/2012]

REALITY: President Obama's plan to allow the Bush tax cuts to expire on income in excess of $250,000 would affect exceedingly few small businesses. The Joint Committee on Taxation estimated that the expiration would affect only three percent of individuals with any business income, from a business large or small. [Joint Committee on Taxation, 7/12/2010]

"I will remove the crippling uncertainty that is preventing businesses from hiring." [Real Clear Politics, 8/14/12]

REALITY: Several surveys and economic analyses have shown that there is no truth to the claim that uncertainty is preventing businesses from hiring; they're not hiring because they simply don't have enough customers with the economy still recovering. Conservative economist Bruce Bartlett said, "regulatory uncertainty is a canard invented by Republicans that allows them to use current economic problems to pursue an agenda supported by the business community year in and year out." [Daily Kos, 2/15/2012 ; Wall Street Journal,7/17/2011 ; Economic Policy Institute, 9/27/2011 ; ThinkProgress, 10/4/2011]

Romney on Bain Capital

"I'm very happy in my former life; we helped create over 100,000 new jobs," Romney says, suggesting that he helped create more jobs than President Obama. [ThinkProgress, 1/4/2012]

REALITY: The 100,000 statistic is a cherry-picked jobs number from a few companies that did well after they were bought by Bain and "does not include job losses from other companies with which Bain Capital was involved — and are based on current employment figures, not the period when Romney worked at Bain." In January, the Romney campaign finally conceded that Romney could not have created a total of 100,000 jobs at Bain, admitting, "This tally obviously does not include job losses from other companies with which Bain Capital was involved — and are based on current employment figures, not the period when Romney worked at Bain." The campaign has since downgraded the number of jobs to "thousands." [Washington Post, 1/4/2012]

Romney on Obamacare

Romney claims repealing Obamacare "saves" $90 billion over the next four years. [ThinkProgress, 11/4/2011]

REALITY: Repealing Obamacare would increase the federal budget deficit by about $109 billion from 2013 to 2022, the Congressional Budget Office concludes. "Deficits would be increased under H.R. 6079 because the net savings from eliminating the insurance coverage provisions would be more than offset by the combination of other spending increases and revenue reductions," the budget office says. [Congressional Budget Office, 7/24/2012]

"Obamacare adds trillions to our deficits and to our national debt." [The Hill, 6/28/2012]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

REALITY: According to the Congressional Budget Office, Obamacare reduces the deficit by $124 billion over 10 years and even more after that. [Politifact,6/28/2012]

After the Supreme Court upheld the individual mandate, Romney declared, "And while I agreed with the dissent, that's taken over by the fact that the majority of the Court said it is a tax, and therefore it is a tax." [CBS, 7/4/2012]

REALITY: Romney instituted a similar requirement in Massachusetts and insisted as governor that the penalty is a way to discourage free-riders. Incidentally, Obamacare will provide millions of families with large tax credits to help purchase coverage and only about 1 percent of Americans who could afford health care but don't buy insurnace would pay the fine, which would average about $600. [CAP, 7/5/2012]

Romney on Medicare

"And my campaign has made it very clear: the President's cuts of $716 billion to Medicare, those cuts are going to be restored if I become President and Paul Ryan becomes Vice President." [CBS, 8/15/2012]

REALITY: Obama is not robbing Medicare. In fact, the billions in Obamacare savings will slow the growth of Medicare over the next decade by eliminating overpayments to private insurers, reforming provider payments to encourage greater efficiency, tying reimbursements to improvements in economic productivity, and reducing fraud and abuse. As a result, the program's trust fund will remain solvent until 2024. If Romney restores these savings — which Ryan included in his own budget — he would hasten Medicare's insolvency to 2016. [Politifact, 8/15/2012 ; NYT 8/22/2012]

Romney says that he and Ryan "want to make sure that we preserve and protect Medicare." [CBS, 8/13/2012]

REALITY: The claim that "premium support" will save Medicare for future generations is highly misleading. The federal government will spend less on the program because future will have to pay more. [CAP, 8/24/2012]

"Nothing changes for current seniors or those nearing retirement," Romney's website claims. [MittRomney.com, 8/30/2012]

REALITY: Here is how Ryan's Medicare plan will affect current seniors: 1) by repealing Obamacare, the 16 million seniors receiving preventive benefits without deductibles or co-pays and are saving $3.9 billion on prescription drugs will see a cost increase, 2) "premium support" will increase premiums for existing beneficiaries as private insurers lure healthier seniors out of the traditional Medicare program. [CAP, 8/24/2012]

Romney on Women's Health

Romney claimed that under Obamacare, "the Catholic Church had to provide for insurance that provided contraceptives, sterilization, morning after pills to the employees of the Church." [ThinkProgress, 2/21/2012]

REALITY: All houses of worship, including the Catholic Church, are specifically exempt from the rule requiring employers to provide preventive services like contraception to their employees. And for religiously affiliated organizations, the insurance company will be required to offer the coverage free of charge and the employer will not pay for it. [ThinkProgress, ">3/23/2012]

Romney argued that the contraception mandate would force employers to offer "abortive pills" free of charge. [ThinkProgress, 5/8/2012]

REALITY: Forms of contraception like hormonal birth control pills and the morning after pill do not work as "abortive" medication. These benefits will only prevent a pregnancy before fertilization. [ThinkProgress, 3/2/

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2012]

Romney on Energy

Obama has "already taken over" the energy industry, and is "waging a war" on coal and oil. [LA Times, 8/14/2012]

> REALITY: In the last four years, oil production has exploded, hitting an eight-year high as oil exports shrunk to less than 50 percent for the first time since 1949. According to the Mine Safety and Health Administration, coal industry employment has grown to reach its highest level since 1996, up 6.7 percent in West Virginia, and 2.3 percent in Pennsylvania. Coal layoffs and shuttered plants Romney points to can be blamed on economic forces, not regulations, as utilities move toward attractive investment in cheap natural gas. [Charleston Gazzette, 11/18/2011; West Virginia Center on Budget & Policy, 5/12/2012 ; EIA,11/30/2011 ; Climate Progress, 6/23/2012]

"An independent inspector general looked at [the Solyndra] investment and concluded that the administration had steered money to friends and family and campaign contributors." [Fortune,6/4/2012]

> REALITY: No investigation of Solyndra has ever found any "smoking guns."Another independent review of all Department Of Energy loan programs by Herb Allison found no wrongdoing. CNN Money reported that Romney thoroughly mischaracterized the Solyndra facts, and "to make the other guy look bad." A majority of the loan-application process for Solyndra occurred under the Bush administration. [Fortune, 3/27/2012 ; Politico, 5/29/2012]

Romney says he would would end tax credits for wind energy to create "a level playing field on which all sources of energy can compete on their merits." [Des Moines Register, 8/5/2012]

> REALITY: Romney has no interest in closing $4 billion tax loopholes that benefit oil and gas companies. His tax plan even doubles the $2.4 billion the five largest oil companies already receive in taxpayer dollars. While the Congressional Research Service notes that closing oil's loopholes would have little to no impact on production or gas prices, wind tax credits has been essential to spurring billions in private investment in the relatively young industry. [American Progress, 7/26/2012 ; CRS, 5/11/2012 ; Energy.gov,8/14/2012]

"[Obama] rejected the Keystone XL pipeline, which would have dramatically increased the supply of Canadian oil to the U.S. market, and now Canada plans to send that oil to China instead," Romney's energy plan says, promising to approve the project. [MittRomney.com, 8/23/2012]

> REALITY: The Keystone XL pipeline would ship tar sands crude across the country to be processed at Gulf Coast refineries and sold on the international market. Therefore, the pipeline would do virtually nothing to make America more energy independent. In some cases, it would actually raise the price of gasoline in the Midwest because the pipeline would surpass refineries in the region. In fact, the Congressional Budget Office recently concluded that the only way to protect Americans from oil and gas price shocks is to become more efficient and use less oil, not increase consumption. Finally, construction and operation of Keystone XL would only create 6,000 jobs, according to figures from TransCanada, the company building the project – not 20,000 as Romney and other proponents have claimed. [Washington Post, 3/2/2012 ; Congressional Budget Office, 5/9/2012 ; Inside Climate News, 1/18/2012]

Romney on Global Warming

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"My view is that we don't know what's causing climate change on this planet. And the idea of spending trillions and trillions of dollars to try to reduce CO2 emissions is not the right course for us." [ThinkProgress, 10/28/2011]

REALITY: 97 percent of published, leading scientists agree that carbon pollution is causing climate change. The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change has documented in exhaustive detail that global warming is 90 percent likely to be due to man-made greenhouse pollution. And a Koch-funded scientist has reversed himself, convinced by his own data that "humans are almost entirely the cause" of global warming, and even finding the IPCC didn't go far enough. [NYT, 7/30/2012]

Romney on the Auto Bailout

"I pushed the idea of a managed bankruptcy, and finally when that was done and help was given, the companies got back on their feet. So I'll take a lot of credit for the fact that this industry's come back." [The Hill, 5/8/2012]

REALITY: Romney claimed credit for the outcome of a process that played out in direct opposition to his preferred game plan. In a 2008 op-ed, Romney called for managed bankruptcy, but later opposed the government's bailout, claiming that unions were not forced to make sufficient sacrifices. Auto industry insiders have called Romney's preferred approach "fantasy." [CNBC, 6/12/2012]

Romney on Welfare Reform

"Under Obama's plan, you wouldn't have to work and wouldn't have to train for a job. They just send you your welfare check," a Romney campaign ad says. [CBS, 8/7/2012]

REALITY: The administration's welfare waiver initiative would strengthen work requirements by empowering states to innovate on strategies that could move 20 percent more of the caseload into sustainable employment. As the government's directive announcing the initiative notes, "The Secretary is only interested in approving waivers if the state can explain in a compelling fashion why the proposed approach may be a more efficient or effective means to promote employment entry, retention, advancement, or access to jobs that offer opportunities for earnings and advancement that will allow participants to avoid dependence on government benefits." Republican and Democratic governors — and even Romney and Paul Ryan — have all promoted flexibility before Obama embraced it. [HHS, 7/12/2012]

Romney on Food Stamps

"What unfortunately happens is with all the multiplicity of federal programs, you have massive overhead, with government bureaucrats in Washington administering all these programs, very little of the money that's actually needed by those that really need help, those that can't care for themselves, actually reaches them," Romney said of the food stamp program. [MSNBC, 1/8/12]

REALITY: The food stamp program has relatively little overhead administrative costs — about 15.8 cents on the dollar. That's about an average for the cost of a government-administered program. Plus, as the Washington Post points out, "That means almost 85 cents gets to the people who need the help." [Brookings, 3/2008 ; Washington Post, 1/8/2012]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Romney on Security

"He went around the world and apologized for America," said Mitt Romney, reiterating a common Romney campaign and right-wing talking point. [9/22/11]

> REALITY: The Washington Post's fact checker gave this statement "four Pinocchios," saying, "Take it from us: The apology tour never happened." PolitiFact.com also took aim at Romney's false claim, giving it a "Pants on Fire" rating. "We found not a single, full-throated apology" in Obama's speeches while abroad, PolitiFact says, adding, "we think it's a ridiculous charge." [The Washington Post 12/10/11 ; PolitiFact.com 9/22/11]

President Obama alone is responsible for the $500 billion in military spending sequester. [Chicago Tribune, 5/19/2012]

> REALITY: In fact, under the Budget Control Act, many Republicans voted in favor of the spending sequester. 28 Republican senators and 174 Republican members of the House backed the measure. [ThinkProgress, 5/20/2012; Roll Call, 8/2/2011 ; Roll Call, 8/1/2011]

In an op-ed attacking Obama's Iran policy and ratcheting up the war rhetoric, Romney claimed that the Islamic Republic has a "nuclear bomb program." [Washington Post, 3/5/2012]

> REALITY: Top American officials, the International Atomic Energy Agency and U.S. and Israeli intelligence all recently said that while Iran may be moving toward a nuclear weapons capability, the regime has not made a decision to build a bomb. [ThinkProgress, 3/5/2012]

Obama has thrown Israel "under the bus." [Bloomberg, 7/3/2012]

> REALITY: Obama has ramped up security cooperation with Israel, providing specialized bombs that the Bush administration had once refused to hand off, funding Israel's "Iron Dome" missile defense system to the tune of $275 million, and approving the billions of dollars in defense aid packages passed by Congress every year. Israel's top leaders are immensely appreciative — Defense Minister Ehud Barak has said, "this administration under President Obama is doing in regard to our security more than anything that I can remember in the past," President Shimon Peres claimed that "When I look at the record of President Obama concerning the major issue security I think it's a highly satisfactory record from Israeli point of view," and Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu said Obama merited "a badge of honor" for diplomatic support during the Palestinian statehood bid at the United Nations. [Newsweek, 9/23/2011 ; Arutz Sheva 7, 5/17/2012 ; CNN, 7/30/2012 ; CNN,7/31/2012 ; Politico, 9/21/2011]

Romney claimed Obama "went before the United Nations" and "said nothing about thousands of rockets being rained in on Israel from the Gaza Strip." [CNN, 1/26/2012]

> REALITY: In his 2011 U.N. address, Obama said, "Israel is surrounded by neighbors that have waged repeated wars against it. Israel's citizens have been killed by rockets fired at their houses and suicide bombs on their buses." The 2009 speech also decried rocket fire falling on the Israeli town of Sderot, saying "We must remember that the greatest price of this conflict is not paid by us. It is paid by the Israeli girl in Sderot who closes her eyes in fear that a rocket will take her life in the night. It is paid by the Palestinian boy in Gaza who has no clean water and no country to call his own." [White House Transcript,9/21/2011 ; New York Times, 9/23/2009]

Romney on LGBT Rights

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Romney claims that he "fully supports the rights of gay individuals and homosexuals." [NBC,12/16/2007

REALITY: Romney often makes this claim in the same sentence as he expresses his opposition to marriage equality. He also opposes federal nondiscrimination protections for LGBT people. [Salt Lake Tribune, 10/7/2010]

Romney says same-sex couples have a "legitimate interest" in adoption and "obviously, that's their right." [Boston Globe, 3/14/2006]

REALITY: Though Romney "acknowledges" that some states recognize same-sex adoptions, he has said multiples times that same-sex parents are harmful to children, telling Religious Right groups in 2006 that "the price of same-sex marriage is paid by the children." [CNS News, 10/12/2011 ; RightWingWatch.org,5/15/2012]

"We're not going to force people of faith to violate their faith in order to carry out their profession," Romney said, explaining that Catholic Charities in Massachusetts "had to get out of adoptions because they would not, under their faith, place children in the homes of same-sex couples." [ThinkProgress, 9/5/2011]

REALITY: Catholic Charities received public funds but refused to place children with same-sex couples in spite of Massachusetts' inclusive law. It could have continued making this distinction by continuing to operate on private funding only, but it voluntarily chose to shut down instead. Romney believes the government should subsidize religious groups even if they discriminate against gays. [Palmetto Freedom Forum, 9/5/2011]

--

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to dubois.sara@gmail.com

E-mail dubois.sara@gmail.com with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara DuBois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 10/15/2008 5:32:33 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: Palin Rally in Dover, NH 10/15/08

Hello All,
Unfortunately our tracker was not allowed to enter this "closed" event. But good news: we were able to capture the event via online-streaming video. Below are the notes from that effort.

Big Highlights

- Again brings up Americans' "anger" and "frustration" about Wall St, Washington elite, lobbyists and "unconscionable voter fraud" and says mccain will "turn that anger into action"
- Has incorporated her experiences with Trig into stump speech, says "there are the world's standards of protection and you can read about them in the magazines and on TV and there are god's standards, and they are the final measure"
- Insists McCain-Palin pro growth, "pro-private sector" agenda will get economy back on track

Dover, NH: Palin Rally 10/15/08

(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background details

- 25 demonstrators (anti-Palin), incl. guy dressed up in a polar bear suit with a sign that asked "Do you know the real Sarah Palin?"; other signs read "Bush with Lipstick," etc
    - According to one demonstrator, they were (nicely) told to move, as were all lingering people on sidewalk, by Secret Service - reason given that buses were coming
- Venue (high school gym) 800-person capacity -- 300 people were not allowed into venue, were placed on adjacent baseball field where they could listen to rally through speakers (a lot of ppl who were told this left)
- Rep. Jeb Bradley intros John Sununu
    - lets first pay tribute to Cpl. scott diamond who paid ultimate price of sacrifice for nation - may he RIP and god bless -- let's pay tribute to ppl like Sen. Jack Barnes and all who have proudly defended the liberties and made our country so great - and while we're saying TY, let's take note of PeaceGreeters who faithfully are at every flight
    - let's welcome "the leader of the 'J Team'" working w/ Jennifer Horn and ? and who helped me become member of Congress in 2002 when I was proud to take his place and who, like everyone in this room, is working on the most important election of our time to make sure JM is in the Oval Office with his partner Sarah Palin -- praises Sununu
- John Sununu
    - im the youngest member of Senate, i'm not the most experienced, but I do have more experience than Barack Obama
    - Obama/Biden are classic Big Govt liberals vs. McCain/Palin put their trust in you
    - Big Govt liberals like Obama and Biden [someone yells "socialist"] defended Freddie and Fannie -- I wrote the legislation w/ Chuck Hagel 5 YEARS AGO to rein them in and McCain supported it - every GOP voted for it, every Dem on Banking Cttee, Big Govt liberals like Obama, opposed it
    - Big Govt liberals like Obama and Biden fought to keep you off the Internet - we GOP fought taxes on it
- Palin 40 min late to start rally - 25 min wait between last introducer and her arrival

Speech Highlights

- TY so much for warm welcome to Dover - while we were late on the tarmac and i apologize, the guy on the tarmac handed me a lil piece of granite and ill keep it for the rest of campaign - i feel right at home in HS basketball court - and when we were driving in, God has blessed you so richly w/ beautiful state and beautiful ppl too - before we get going i want to take a moment to recognize those who have secured our frdm - those who have served, will you raise your hand and let us honor you? sincerely we TY for your service and sacrifice
- i also want to take moment to honor Cpl. Scott Diamond, from NH, he died yesterday - i know you join w me in sending our thoughts and prayers to that fam - god bless them
- we are just 3 wks away from election day - w/ your help we'll win war on terror and the econ war we're in - we'll get econ turned back aroudn b/c we'll take maverick, patriot of Senate and put him in WH
- i know we can count on NH b/c youre a lot like AK - we all love moose-hunting, we enjoy great lands and abundant wildlife and good fishing and we both take seriously your state's motto, i think it should be ours too: live free or die
- and here we ahve that love and support for mccain b/c he always puts his country first
- last jan the critics had counted mccain out and said he wouldnt win primary here - you turned the underdog into the victor, mccain has history of overcoming the odds in this state and thats what you can help us do on nov 4. are you ready to help carry this state to victory? [cheers] are you ready to make mccain next POTUS? are you ready for us to get there and shake things up
- so much at stake: econ in crisis, retirements at risk, jobs vanishing - now more than ever we need someone ready to lead on day 1, a man w/courage and judgment and truthfulness and a bold plan to take country in new direction - mccain will lead us there

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- all across america. right now there's a lot of anger. there's frustration and anger about the insider dealing of lobbyists and anger at the greed and the corruption on wall street and anger about the arrogance of the washington elite and anger about the "unconscionable voter fraud" that's going on. and with serious reforms to change washington and wall street, john mccain is going to turn that anger into action.
- now, yesterday john mccain set forth a plan to help those who have been hardest hit by our cris. now, the pension and the security plan that he talked about yesterday, that will get our country through a time of testing and get this economy on the right track. on this plan we will help american families keep their homes and save failing neighborhoods and bring stability to the housing market.
- predatory lenders had so taken advantage of hard working american families and now too many of those americans are struggling under the weight of the wrong mortgage. we're going to work with them to get them a fixed rate mortgage that will help them keep their homes. it is not a handout but a hand up that will help stabilize the housing market.
- right now there are a lot of retirees and good folks close to retirement age that are worried about their loss of savings in this crisis. they're worried about those investments that they had worked so hard for and trusted other people to invest wisely and manage that money. and only john mccain has a plan to change the tax code immediately to help protect them so americans can keep money in their retirement accounts and rebuild their savings. he's the only one with a plan to do this.
- so instead of just giving more billions of tax dollars to the wall street bankers and the brokers who got us into this mess, john has a plan to help america's workers and small business owners because they're the ones who make our economy run, they're the ones who are deserving that help from the federal government, not the guys that got us in this mess. so john and i will also bring tax relief to every american so every business can have the opportunity to grow, to thrive to, prosper, business owners so you can hire more people. that's how jobs are created. that's how jobs are created, is to allow you to hire more people. allowing you to keep more of what you produce and earn and reinvest that then into growing your business.
- we're going to eliminate the unfair tax on unemployment benefits also because those folks who are sincerely and aggressively really looking for work, they shouldn't have to worry about paying yet another tax to the federal government.
- john has the backbone too to confront the $10 trillion debt that the federal government has run up. we will balance the federal budget by the end of our term. we must do this because the federal government is in a hole. what do you do if you're in a hole and you don't want to be there? the first thing you do is stop digging. we have dug ourselves in a hole.
- the first thing we have to do as president, john mccain will impose a spending freeze to cover all but the most vital functions of government like worker retraining and taking care of our veterans.
- in this great community here in new hampshire and others just like it across the u.s., all that working people are asking for is for government to be on their side, be on our side so that we can have a good job in our own hometown. and with lower taxes and a pro growth agenda, pro private sector agenda and spending under control finally in washington we're going to get this economy moving again. yes.
- americans cannot afford another tax increase, not at this time. barack obama voted 94 times for higher taxes. 94 times he had the opportunity to be on the right side of the issue, on your side. instead, 94 times he voted to support higher taxes even on hard-working middleclass americans, individuals making $42,000 a year, increasing taxes. no.
- taxes are already too high, and he wants to raise them. and government already spends too much, and he now wants to spend almost a trillion dollars more in new government spending. but he won't bother to tell you where that money is going to come from from all these new proposals. america is deep in debt, and he is going to get us deeper in debt. we cannot afford this at this time. we cannot afford this. folks, in times like these, the last thing we need is a tax increase.
- you know, i hear that here in dover there's home to two kinds of people, the fine people of new hampshire and then the fine people of massachusetts who got sick of paying all those taxes. i think the rest of the country is looking at this area and saying, okay, what is it that new hampshire wants? kind of a microcosm in this state of the rest of the U.S.
- the people in new hampshire, and i know people back home in alaska, they know that you don't have to tax people that much if you would cut down down the federal government's expenditures. we know that to get our economy moving again we must cut that wasteful spending and balance the budget and keep taxes low so that americans can keep more of what they produce, what they earn, so they can reinvest in their priorities. you know best. you know better than government knows, making decisions for you on where your money should go? you know best. and john mccain and i trust you.
- new hampshire, it's very nice to be here because as you showed in the primary, you just get it. and it's nice to be here with a group of people who understand what the federal government's proper role should be and how the private sector should be allowed to grow and to thrive, to prosper, our families, too. and i know you agree american can't afford another big spender in the white house. and that's why we need to elect john mccain the next president of the united states.
- as a senator, remember, he's been the maverick, patriot there in the senate. john mccain has confronted the corrupt ways of washington. he hasn't been part of the problem. he's confronted the wasteful spending and abuses of power. and as president he's going to end those abuses, whatever it takes.
- john mccain, too, he and i were the only ones in this race with track records that actually prove we can reform. it hasn't been just talking the talk. we've walked the walk. walking the walk. and we've obviously ruffled a few feathers along the way. you've got to do what you've got to do to serve the people who hire you. as mayor of a city up there in alaska, here's what i did to improve my track record.
- i eliminated personal property taxes and i eliminated small business inventory taxes. those things that i could do to literally be able to hang that, we're open for business sign outside of our city door. letting businesses know we wanted you in there so that our community would be a better community. our families, even more importantly, would have tools, would have resources to grow and thrive and prosper. it is small business that is the backbone of this country.
- as gov, we cut state fuel taxes and cut wasteful spending
- we got back to basics and put govt back on side of ppl. in mccain-palin admin, we'll never forget, we'll be there working for you, the ppl of america.
- john and i have a couple of missions. first, set country firmly on path toward energy indep. w'ell develop new energy sources and find better ways to tap into what we've got. drilling and coal and nuclear. we'll create thousands of jobs for americans by being energy indep. when price was as high as it was in summer, we were circulating $700b to other countries, incl. those that dont like us
- biden last month told a voter "we're not supporting clean coal" he's called offshore drilling "raping" OCS - of course theyve flipflopped recently in debates, we just want some straight talk, give us some Straight talk -- when they keep saying 'no' to energy solutions, americans will have choice in nov.
- whehter biden approves it or not, mccain and i will develop clean coal technology in america. there is more clean coal potential in america than there is oil in saudi arabia. clean coal will create 30k new jobs. we'll drill for billions of gallons of oil we have here. we'll drill here and drill now. drill baby drill. you bet. drill baby drill and mine baby mine. its dangerous for us to be reliant on foreign sources of energy, incl. form countries who want to use energy as weapon and can cut off supplies at any time. dangerous. and when we have these domestic supplies we can tap into.
- another mission that he'd like me to focus on, and im so honored: help fams who have kids w/ special needs. an issue that has touched my heart for yrs and now todd and i have special added perspective w/ birth of Trig [cheers] we join many fams that know that some of lifes greatest joys come w/ unique challenges. we'll make sure govt on their side. Gov. Casey was once asked how you treat the most vulnerable, and he said you put them first in line. he understood that we need to show them . what ive learned from Trig is everyone belongs in circle of protection and every child has something to contribute , there are the world's standards of protection and you can read about them in the magazines and on TV and there are god's standards, and they are the final measure. as gov, i secured more funding for kids w/ special needs in public schools. ill make sure they have an advocate in the WH.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- in this campaign, for a campaign that says this is all about the future, they're talking a lot about the past b/c that's where you find the balme. mccain and i are joining you looking to future. theyre looking to past b/c theyre trying to make you think they're running against Bush, more of the same. that strategy, thank the lord, is wearing really thin. america knows mccain is his own man.
- from enemy prison camp to halls of congress, mccain has always put self aside adn country first and fought for you
- our opponents give speech after speech, itd sure be nice if just once he said he wanted america to win
- mccain served country in uniform for 22 yrs, 5.5 yrs as POW, he knows how to face adversity, overcome challenges, he knows how to win the war. as mom of troop, exactly the kind of man i want as Commander-in-Chief
- on nov 4th, gosh its gonna come down to what we believe in. we believe in what reagan believed in: fwd mvmt of frdm and not constant expansion of govt, govt too often the problem, we must trust the ppl, we'll fight whoever we must fight to put govt back on your sdie, we believe best in america is not concentrated all in DC, it's found here in the goodness and kindness of every day ppl who grow our food and fight our wars and protect our frdms. we believe in the promise of america. we believe america is not the problem - we dont have to apologize for being americans. [sarah! sarah!]
- truly america is not the problem, its the solution. its the shining city on a hill. he's a real leader, he inspires w/ heroic and trustworthy deeds adn not just words.
- our opponents will go on and on about how they'll "fight for you" - since my RM isnt here to say it for himself and he wouldnt say it anyway, there's only 1 man in this race who has ever really fought for you and the only man w/ courage to go on fighting for you. pls go on w/ what you did in primary and help us win this. god bless you and god bless america.

--

Sara DuBois
Tracking / Communications Manager
ProgressiveAccountability.org
sara@progressiveaccountability.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "German Marshall Fund" <press@gmfus.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 7/7/2015 7:52:03 AM
Subject: Transatlantic Take: United States calls for Flexibility on Greece

If you have problems viewing this email, you can view it as a web page. To view the mobile-friendly web page click here

G | M | F The German Marshall Fund of the United States
STRENGTHENING TRANSATLANTIC COOPERATION

Transatlantic Take

Our Organization | Our Work | Our Events | Our Experts | Support GMF

United States calls for Flexibility on Greece

Michael Leigh July 7, 2015

BRUSSELS—For the United States, Greece is a valued NATO ally and a land of relative stability, between the faltering Balkans, North Africa, and the Middle East. Its strategic importance throughout the Mediterranean has increased following the failure of the Arab uprisings and the falling-out of two U.S. allies, Turkey and Israel. Greece's cooperation is crucial in counter-terrorism and in efforts to cope with the flow of refugees from Syria and the Horn of Africa. It has become a security partner for Israel, a relationship reflected in growing links between the Greek and Jewish communities in the United States.

The United States has an interest in Europe's drive for greater energy security and diversification of supply away from Russia. Greece aspires to an important role in Europe's energy security through its own offshore exploration for oil and gas and potential future production and through new interconnectors to the Balkans and up into central Europe.

Overall, the "Europeanization" of Greece has saved it from the tribulations of its Balkan neighbors. Much would be lost for the Greek people, the region, the EU, and the United States if Greece became a failed state in an increasingly troubled neighborhood. Russian President Vladimir Putin's efforts to seduce wayward European states might then have greater success...

FULL ARTICLE

Sir Michael Leigh is senior fellow at The German Marshall Fund of the United States.

The views expressed in GMF publications and commentary are the views of the author alone.

Policy Leadership Civil Society

Follow

Strengthening Transatlantic Cooperation

Our Organization
About GMF
Career Opportunities
Press Room

Our Work Leadership Policy
Civil Society
Research & Analysis
Transatlantic Academy

Our Events
Major Conferences & Forums
Recent & Upcoming Events

Our Experts
Find an Expert

Manage preferences | Forward email | Unsubscribe | Subscribe

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
	"Kristina Schake" <kschake@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	6/23/2015 12:45:22 PM
Subject:	RE: Daily Media Report 6.23.15

That is the right question.

From: John Podesta [mailto:john.podesta@gmail.com]
Sent: Tuesday, June 23, 2015 7:42 PM
To: Jennifer Palmieri; Kristina Schake
Subject: Fwd: Daily Media Report 6.23.15

Why is Jake Tapper such a dick?

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: "Melissa Cantrell" <mcantrell@hillaryclinton.com >
Date: Jun 23, 2015 3:45 PM
Subject: Daily Media Report 6.23.15
To: "HRC Rapid" <HRCRapid@hillaryclinton.com >, "Jennifer Palmieri" <jpalmieri@hillaryclinton.com >, "Julie McClain" <jmcclain@hillaryclinton.com >, "Kristina Schake" <kschake@hillaryclinton.com >, "Meredith Thatcher" <mthatcher@hillaryclinton.com >
Cc:

National:

-- Report on how presidential candidates were talking about the Charleston church shooting; reported that HRC was having a discussion about race near Ferguson, Missouri; showed footage of HRC talking about race in Missouri today; reported that HRC addressed segregation in schools in America; panel with Michael Eric Dyson and Charles Ogletree; Dyson said what HRC was doing is "exceptionally good" because she was talking about structural realities; Ogletree said he appreciated that HRC would move beyond the issues and have a deep discussion about race; played footage of HRC talking about the Confederate flag. MSNBC's The Ed Show, 2015 06 23 Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Michael Eric Dyson Charles Ogletree HRC race talk.mp4

-- Discussion about the SC Confederate flag controversy; Eric Bolling said he had a problem with who was weighing in on the controversy; Bolling mentioned HRC said she was against the flag in 2007 when she ran for POTUS; Bolling said HRC was in the White House (sic) as First Lady when WJC signed a bill in Arkansas to create the top star on the Arkansas flag that was a hat tip to the Confederacy; Bolling asked where HRC was then. Fox News' The Five , 2015 06 23 Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Eric Bolling on WJC and the Confederate flag.mp4

-- Discussion about how GOP contenders responded to the SC Confederate flag controversy; panel with SE Cupp and Bill Burton; Cupp mentioned that HRC has the added burden of explaining to voters why Democratic policies over the last seven years helped blacks while by almost every metric life for blacks has gotten worse. CNN's The Lead With Jake Tapper , 2015 06 23 Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, SE Cupp on HRC and black voters.mp4

-- Roundtable discussion about South Carolina getting closer to moving the Confederate flag off the State Capitol grounds; panel included Nick Confessore; Alex Wagner read an excerpt from HRC's Missouri speech, "We can't hide from hard truths on race. We have to name them, own them, and change them;" Wagner reported that HRC has been speaking to young people, people of color; Wagner said it would seem that the Confederate flag would be a good issue for HRC to take up; Confessore said he didn't think the flag would last long as an issue for HRC's campaign, said HRC's platform on social problems would be what attracted young people and people of color to HRC's campaign; Wagner said the flag gives HRC a central locus to unite other issues she's been talking about behind. MSNBC's Now With Alex Wagner , 2015 06 23, Hillary Clinton Clips, National, Nick Confessore on HRC and the Confederate flag.mp4

-- Roundtable discussion about South Carolina getting closer to moving the Confederate flag off the State Capitol grounds; panel included Jess McIntosh; McIntosh said she was concerned we would turn our focus to symbols and less on the effects of the evil institution of slavery; McIntosh briefly noted that HRC talked in her speech about everything from income inequality faced by African Americans to the higher rates of asthma among African American kids. MSNBC's Now With Alex Wagner , 2015 06 23Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Jess

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McIntosh on HRC and racial inequality effects.mp4

--Report on HRC and Race Relations: HRC talking about race relations at a church near Ferguson, MO. Jake Tapper questions whether she is genuine in her interest in race or whether she is just trying to gain support for her bid at the presidential nomination. CNN's The Lead with Jake Tapper . 2015.06.23., Clips, National, Jake Tapper on HRC.mp4

--Report on HRC in Missouri: Brooke Baldwin speaks about HRC giving a speech in Florissant, Missouri. Clips of HRC giving her opinion about the Confederate flag as a symbol of racism that existed in our country in Florissant, MO. South Carolina is agreeing to debate on removal of the Confederate flag and no longer issuing the Confederate flag emblem on license plates and other items. CNN's CNN Newsroom with Brooke Baldwin.2015.06.23., Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Brooke Baldwin on HRC speech.mp4

--Report on HRC's Poll Numbers: David Asman claims that HRC's poll numbers have not gone down despite her negative coverage. Asman claims that HRC may be in trouble with socialist, Bernie Sanders, pushing her more to the left. Fox's Fox After the Bell. 2015.06.23., Hillary Clinton; Bernie Sanders, Clips, National, HRC poll numbers.mp4

--Report on HRC and Her Presidential Run So Far Compared to Nixon: Abby Huntsman claims that HRC has focused on speaking to the public in her campaign, but she has not focused on speaking to the media. For this reason, a new WSJ OP-ED has compared HRC to President Richard Nixon. In the OP-ED, Nixon and HRC both see enemies everywhere and is not a good campaigner. According to Evan Thomas, Nixon was shy and awkward, but fear of his enemies drew him into the White House. Thomas claims that HRC tries to manipulate the press, and it will not work because it did not work for Nixon. Nixon and HRC share personality flaws. Evan Thomas claims that she will have small scandals that will constantly come back to her. Thomas claims that she is not the person she positions herself as, and that she has a husband who has committed a number of scandals himself. Ari Melbur claims that it is not proactive to compare anyone to Nixon, and that HRC has not done anything that is relatable to Nixon's impeachment or wrongdoings while in office. Melbur claims that HRC has not done anything that could compare her to Nixon in a negative light. Evan Thomas claims that Nixon plays on fears, and that it is important to look at what Nixon did versus what he said and then compare to HRC. Thomas claims that he integrated Southern public schools. Thomas claims that Nixon would have taken the Confederate flag down. Nixon was pro affirmative action. Evan Thomas claims that when he governed, he was similar to HRC. MSNBC's The Cycle . 2015.06.23., Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, HRC compared to Nixon.mp4

--Report on HRC's Faults in Her Last Run for Presidency: Howard Fineman claim that HRC followed in the footsteps of WJC. Now, she is running as the heir of BHO's coalition. Fineman claims that now she is especially going after race as an issue to keep BHO's supporters. Fineman claims that HRC must appeal to racial justice, cultural justice, and social justice. Abby Huntsman asks whether Bernie Sanders pushing HRC to the left will cause people to vote for Jeb Bush, who is more moderate. Fineman claims that HRC will be more hesitant on economic and trade issues during the general election. Fineman claims that HRC's strategy is to be appealing through social issues and hesitant on economic issues. MSNBC's The Cycle .2015.06.23., Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Fineman on HRC.mp4

--Report on HRC and the Dynasty Issue: Howard Fineman speaks about the dynasty issue. Fineman claims that the number one concern about politics is not dynasty politics but the money in politics. Fineman claims that the public is more worried about the huge floods of money coming into politics and corporations. Fineman claims that name recognition and name familiarity is generally a good starting point. MSNBC's The Cycle . 2015.06.23., Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, HRC Dynasty.mp4

-- Report that HRC would speak in Missouri near the scene of the Michael Brown shooting; said HRC would participate in a community meeting; reported that an HFA statement said HRC's conversation would address the massacre in Charleston and broader issues around strengthening communities; interviewed Alex Seitz-Wald; Seitz-Wald said HRC was leaning very far in on race; Seitz-Wald said this would be the third time HRC addressed race in a week, said this would be the keystone speech; Seitz-Wald said HRC was trying to repair some damage from 2008; Tamron Hall said HRC may be trying to repair some damage from her delay in commenting on Ferguson. MSNBC's News Nation . 2015.06.23, HRC in Missouri and race.mp4

-- Report on NBC/WSJ poll; panel with Anne Gearan and Alex Seitz-Wald; Gearan said the numbers were very good news for HRC; Gearan said as much as HFA's strategy had been criticized that something is working; Andrea Mitchell also noted that the numbers would tell HFA that their strategy was working for HRC. MSNBC's Andrea Mitchell Reports. 2015.06.23, Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, HRC poll.mp4

-- Report on HRC's speech on Tuesday at a church near Ferguson; interviewed Alex Seitz-Wald; Seitz-Wald said HRC was "leaning way in on race"; noted HRC was going to meet with local elected officials in a private meeting about an hour before her main event; noted two pastors would participate in HRC's main event, said that HFA

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

officials told him that it was HRC's idea to do this; shifted into a report about the NBC/WSJ poll; ASW said HRC is talking about voting rights and criminal justice reform to get black voters to go to the polls. MSNBC's Live with Thomas Roberts, 2015.06.23, Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, HRC in MO.mp4

-- Report on the WSJ/NBC poll; angle is that HFA is trying to tamp down expectations as Bernie Sanders pulls in big crowds; Andrea Tantaros noted that Maria Cardona said she wouldn't be surprised if Sanders won Iowa or New Hampshire, said that was a sign HFA is trying to keep expectations low; Tantaros said HRC needed the base to think HRC didn't have the primary in the bag so they would show up for her; guest Taya Kyle said HRC was good at twisting the facts, said that HRC lacked morality; guest Charles Payne said HRC would be devastated if HRC lost Iowa or New Hampshire. Fox News' Outnumbered , 2015.06.23, Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, HRC and reporters lash out.mp4

-- Report on BHO's decision to allow families to pay ransoms in international hostage situations; guest Taya Kyle; Kyle said HRC saying that people die in America every day was in the face of what it was like for the family member of a hostage; Kyle said if Chelsea was in a hostage situation that she didn't think HRC would have the same take on it. Fox News' Outnumbered . 2015.06.23, Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, HRC and Benghazi.mp4

-- Report on HRC and Confederate flag; discussion about HRC's tweet that the Confederate flag should come down. Fox News' Outnumbered .2015.06.23, Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, HRC confederate flag tweet.mp4

-- Report on the NBC/WSJ poll; panel with Eliana Johnson and Betsy Woodruff; Johnson said HRC was doing well in polls due to name recognition because Marco Rubio and Scott Walker are still unknowns to most Americans; Woodruff said the percentage of Democratic primary voters who could see themselves voting for HRC has gone up since March; Johnson said Democrats weren't excited about HRC. Fox News' Happening Now , 2015 06 23 Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Eliana Johnson w Betsy Woodruff on HRCs good polls.mp4

-- Report on the NBC/WSJ poll; panel with Kasie Hunt; Hunt said Bernie Sanders is getting a lot of crowds in many places, said she was not convinced that anyone was convinced that Sanders would be nominated over HRC; Hunt said she thought the early states represented the biggest risks for HRC given their small size and unpredictable natures, said HRC was still the really strong frontrunner at this point. MSNBC's The Rundown With Jose Diaz-Balart, 2015 06 23 Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Kasie Hunt on HRCs front-runner status.mp4

-- Report that candidates embraced the removal of the Confederate flag after hedging; panel with SE Cupp; Cupp mentioned that she hoped HRC got the same amount of questions as the Confederate flag as the GOP candidates given that WJC celebrated Confederate flag day as Governor of Arkansas and signed a bill that allowed one of the stars on the Arkansas flag to stand for the Confederate States. CNN's CNN Newsroom With Carol Costello, 2015 06 23 Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, SE Cupp on HRC and Confederate flag.mp4

-- Report that HRC planned to speak at a Missouri church near Ferguson; interviewed Alex Seitz-Wald; Seitz-Wald said he expected HRC to address race and policing; Seitz-Wald said this would be the third time in a week that HRC talked about race; Seitz-Wald said the black voting block was important for HRC in the primary and the general election "if she makes it there." MSNBC's The Rundown With Jose Diaz-Balart , 2015 06 23 Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Alex Seitz-Wald on HRCs race and policing stances.mp4

-- Report on the NBC/WSJ poll; panel with ; reported that the majority of Democrats wanted there to be a competitive primary; showed footage of Lincoln Chafee on "Your World" on Monday; Mark Hannah and Rich Lowry; Lowry said Sanders is nipping at HRC's heels in some of the early states; Hannah said people were curious about Sanders because no one knew who he was six months ago; Hannah noted that 92 percent of Democrats said they could support HRC; Lowry said HRC tacking left was a general election strategy to motivate her base; shifted into report about HRC's answer about The Clinton Foundation to WMUR on Sunday; Hannah said HRC has faced media scrutiny and the GOP candidates have taken HRC to task but HRC's favorability is still hire than her unfavorability. Fox News' America's Newsroom With Bill Hemmer and Martha MacCallum, 2015 06 23 Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Mark Hannah and Rich Lowry on HRCs good polls.mp4

-- Report on how politicians responded to SC governor's call for the Confederate flag's removal from the State Capitol; mentioned that HRC tweeted that Nikki Haley was right to call for the removal of the Confederate flag. Fox News' America's Newsroom With Bill Hemmer and Martha MacCallum , 2015 06 23 Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Report on HRCs tweet about SC Confederate flag.mp4

-- Report on GOP grappling with Confederate flag issue; panel with Paul Begala and Tara Setmayer; Chris Cuomo mentioned that HFA pointed to HRC's comment on South Carolina's display of the Confederate flag in 2007; Cuomo asked Begala whether HRC had to answer for her time as FLOAR when WJC stood by the Arkansas flag; Begala said yes, said times change; Begala mentioned that Zell Miller with WJC's help tried to get the Confederate flag off the Georgia flag; Setmayer noted that WJC and HRC celebrated Confederate Flag Day in Arkansas; Setmayer said HRC have to explain her evolution like Republicans do; shifted into report on the NBC/WSJ poll; Setmayer said the polls were what she'd expect at this time because the election is so far away;

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cuomo asked Begala whether Biden or Kerry would be a bigger threat to HRC; Begala dodged, said there would be a tough primary battle but HRC would win. CNN's New Day , 2015 06 23 Hillary Clinton Clips, National, Paul Begala on HRC and Confederate flag.mp4

-- Report on HRC's comments about the Russian uranium deal; interviewed Laura Ingraham; Ingraham said HRC passed off good questions as partisan drumbeating; reported on Peter Schweizer's NY Post op-ed; reported that HRC said there were nine agencies involved in the decision; Ingraham asked rhetorically who in the BHO administration would not do what HRC asked them to do if she wanted something done; shifted to report on the NBC/WJC poll that showed 67 percent of voters were satisfied with a Bush-Clinton election; Ingraham said Democrats were happier with that pairing than Republicans. Fox News' Fox and Friends ,2015 06 23 Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Laura Ingraham on Peter Schweizer and HRCs polls.mp4

-- Report on BHO using the "N" word during a podcast interview; panel with Nia-Malika Henderson and Sara Murray; Henderson said the question was how other Democrats pick up the conversation of race; Henderson noted that HRC gave a major speech on Saturday about race, said HRC would have more conversations about race in Missouri; shifted into report about the NBC/WSJ poll; Murray said HRC was able to gain a lot of ground since the relaunch; Murray said the relaunch was optically very good for HRC; Murray said the poll shows the panic surrounding HRC may have been overblown; Chris Cuomo said Joe Biden was not in the race, said Biden's potential entry could give people on the Left pause for concern. CNN's New Day , 2015 06 23 Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, NiaMalika Henderson Sara Murray on polls and race.mp4

-- Report that Bernie Sanders drew 5,500 people to his event in Denver; panel with Daniel Halper and Jessica Tarlov; Tarlov said people are interested in Sanders but will absolutely not vote for him; Halper said Sanders is the heart and soul of the Democratic Party; Halper said Sanders could win Iowa and New Hampshire; Tarlov questioned how Sanders could win Iowa when he was 40 points behind; Halper said Democrats rejected HRC last time around and could do it again this time; Halper brought up John Kerry, Al Gore, Elizabeth Warren, and Deval Patrick as people who may jump in if they weren't satisfied with HRC; Tarlov said the only person who could shake up the primaries would be Warren. Fox News' Fox & Friends , 2015 06 23 Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Daniel Halper and Jessica Tarlov on HRCs polls.mp4

-- Report that HRC was expected to talk about race on Tuesday when she campaigned in Missouri; noted that HRC dominated the NBC/WSJ poll; Joe Scarborough said this poll was out-of-line from most of the polls over the last month or two; Scarborough said it would likely be an all-nighter if HRC and Bush face one another in the general election; Brzezinski said she thought there was a real disconnect between the conversation inside Washington and America on HRC; Brzezinski said Americans ("they") will just vote for HRC, "they go crazy"; Mike Barnicle noted that HRC is on her own clock. MSNBC's Morning Joe , 2015 06 23 Hillary Clinton Clips, National, Brzezinski said Americans go crazy for HRC.mp4

-- Report on HRC's answer from WMUR on Sunday about the 20% of uranium that was transferred to Vladimir Putin; Ed Henry (guest host) said Peter Schweizer thought HRC's comments about people wielding the partisan axe were about him; reported on Schweizer's op-ed in the NY Post; reported that nine of the investors who profited from the uranium deal donated to The Clinton Foundation; Henry said now that HRC's coming out with specifics that Schweizer's come back in this op-ed and refuted HRC's statements line-by-line. Fox News' Fox and Friends, 2015 06 23 Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Peter Schweizer oped about HRC Russia uranium deal.mp4

States:

Nevada:

--Report on HRC on Confederate Flag: HRC tweets about Confederate flag. Several other 2016 presidential candidates also tweeted about this controversy. KTNV(CBS)'s Channel 2 Morning News , Reno (NV). 2015.06.23., Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, HRC flag controversy.mp4

South Carolina:

--Report on HRC and flag: HRC's campaign claims that HRC wanted the Confederate flag to be removed since 2007. WTAT-CHS(FOX)'s Morning News at 7 , Charleston (SC). 2015.06.23., Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, HRC flag.mp4

--Report on HRC and racism: HRC will join with church members near Ferguson Missouri. She will address race and strengthening communities. WTOC-SAV(CBS)'s WOTC News at Daybreak 7A , Savannah (GA). 2015.06.23, Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, HRC race church.mp4

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

--Report on HRC support: Reporters claim that HRC is ahead of the Democratic candidates by a land slide. Reporters also claim that HRC has a lead in terms of her Republican counterparts as well. WMBF (NBC)'s WMBF News at 11, Myrtle Beach (SC).2015.06.23., Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, HRC leading Democrat and Republican.mp4

Iowa:

--Report on HRC and flag controversy: HRC tweets about Confederate flag and Charleston, South Carolina, shooting. Reporters claim that HRC wants the flag removed, according to her campaign. KMEG(CBS)'s Siouxland News at Sunrise , Sioux (IA). 2015.06.23., Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, HRC flag campaign.mp4

--Report on HRC in Missouri: Reporters claim that HRC will be making a campaign stop in Missouri, her first stop there since she became a Presidential Candidate. HRC will make statements about Michael Brown and race, according to reporters. KTVO(ABC)'s KTVO News at 5 , Ottumwa (IA) . 2015.06.23., Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, HRC in Missouri.mp4

New Hampshire:

--Report on HRC polls: According to the NBC News/Wall Street Journal polls, HRC is in the lead on the Democratic side with 75%, 15% for Bernie Sanders, 4% for Jim Webb, and 2% for MOM. WHDH-BOS(NBC)'s 7 News Today in New Englan d, Boston (MA) .2015.06.23., Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, HRC leading in polls.mp4

--Report on HRC in NH: HRC and her campaign have claimed that it is difficult for any candidate to get more than 50 percent of the vote in a New Hampshire state primary. WBIN's NH1 News Tonight , Boston (MA). 2015.06.23., Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, HRC in NH.mp4

Bernie Sanders:

--Repot on Bernie Sanders and Flag Controversy: Reporters claim that Bernie Sanders tweeted about the flag controversy in support of removing the flag. KTVN(CBS)'s Channel 2 Morning News , Reno (NV). 2015.06.23., Bernie Sanders, Clips, National, Sanders flag.mp4

--Report on Bernie Sanders and Poll: 15% of primary voters claim that they would vote for Sanders. Sanders comes in at second place after HRC in the NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll. WHDH-BOS(NBC)'s 7 News Today in New England, Boston (MA). 2015.06.23., Bernie Sanders, Clips, National, Sanders and new poll.mp4

--Report on Bernie Sanders and Poll: 15% of primary voters claim that they would vote for Sanders. Sanders comes in at second place after HRC in the NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll. WHO-DM(NBC)'s Early Day, Des Moines (IA). 2015.06.23., Bernie Sanders, Clips, National, Sanders and new WSJ poll.mp4

--Report on Bernie Sanders and Poll: 15% of primary voters claim that they would vote for Sanders. Sanders comes in at second place after HRC in the NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll. WMBF(NBC)'s WMBF News at 11, Myrtle Beach (SC). 2015.06.23., Bernie Sanders, Clips, National, Sanders and new WSJ poll.mp4

--Report on Sanders as opposition: Bernie Sanders came in second in a recent NBC/Wall Street Journal poll. HRC won with a massive percentage over Sanders. Reporters claim that Sanders will only be useful for some competition, but he will not win the Democratic nomination. MSNBC's The Rundown with Jose Diaz Balart. 2015.06.23., Bernie Sanders; HRC, Clips, National, Sanders and HRC in new poll.mp4

--Report on Sanders and HRC stances: Reporters claim that Sanders might pull HRC to the left, and this leftist stance may hurt her in the general election. Fox Business Network's Varney & Company . 2015.06.23., Bernie Sanders, Clips, National, HRC and Sanders leftist.mp4

--Report on Bernie Sanders and HRC: Reporters claim that Sanders is inching up on HRC in some of the early states such as Iowa and New Hampshire. CNN's New Day . 2015.06.23., Bernie Sanders; Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Sanders and HRC early states.mp4

--Report on new NBC/WSJ Poll: Bernie Sanders comes in second with 15% of primary voters claiming they would vote for him in the primaries. MSNBC's Morning Joe . 2015.06.23., Bernie Sanders, Clips, National, Sanders

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WSJ.mp4

--Report on Sanders likelihood of success: Reporters claim that sanders does not have that presidential persona to do well; however, despite these facts, he is doing well and drawing numbers of crowds. Reporters claim that because Sanders is doing well in Iowa and New Hampshire, he will do a decent job in the primaries. Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor . 2015.06.23., Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Sanders' success.mp4

--Report on Bernie Sanders and Obama: Sanders claims that what President Obama has done is not enough, and that as president, more must be done in terms of economy and taxes. Fox Business Network's Cavuto: Coast to Coast. 2015.06.23, Bernie Sanders, Clips, National, Sanders on Obama.mp4

--Report on Bernie Sanders and Trade Deal: Sanders claimed that he is differentiating himself from other candidates. Reporters showcase Sanders speaking out on the trade deal in the Senate. Al Jazeera America. 2015.06.23., Bernie Sanders, Clips, National, Sanders on Trade.mp4

--Report on Bernie Sanders and African American vote: Reporters claim that Sanders comes from a dominantly Caucasian state. Therefore, he may have difficulty getting this vote. HRC stands as the strongest for this group of voters. MSNBC's Live with Thomas Roberts . 2015.06.23., Bernie Sanders, Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Sanders on the African American vote.mp4

--Report on Bernie Sanders as a Threat: David Asman claims that it is possible that Sanders could win New Hampshire. Ed Henry claims that there is anger on the left because HRC is seen as a centrist. Henry claims that HRC must declare herself on trade and taxes because Sanders is appealing largely to the left. Henry claims that this leftist approach might hurt her in the general elections. Fox Business Network's After the Bell. 2015.06.23., Clips, National, Sanders on HRC.mp4

--Report on Bernie Sanders interview on The Ed Show: In an interview with Bernie Sanders, Sanders claims that he is grateful for the support that he has gotten from Elizabeth Warren's supporters. Sanders claims that today in Congress was a major defeat and a setback. Sanders claims that the trade agreement is the cause of major setbacks in our economy and for jobs for American people. MSNBC's The Ed Show . 2015.06.23., Clips, National, Sanders intereview.mp4

Martin O'Malley:

--Report on MOM and WSJ/NBC poll: MOM comes in at last place with 2% on NBC/WSJ poll. CNN's New Day. 2015.06.23., Martin O'Malley, Clips, National, MOM poll.mp4

--Report on MOM and African American Vote: Reporters claim that MOM will not do well with the African American vote because he has "baggage" with African Americans after the Baltimore unrest. MSNBC's Live with Thomas Roberts. 2015.06.23., Bernie Sanders, Hillary Clinton, Clips, National, Sanders on the African American vote.mp4

--Report on MOM and Flag Controversy: MOM tweeted saying that the Confederate flag should be removed from South Carolina.WTAT-CHS(FOX)'s Morning News at 7, Charleston (SC) . 2015.06.23., Martin O'Malley, Clips, National, MOM Flag Controversy.mp4

--Report on MOM and New Poll: 2 percent say that they would support MOM in the primaries. WHDH-BOS(NBC)'s 7 News Today in New England , Boston (MA). 2015.06.23., Martin O'Malley, Clips, National, Polls.mp4

--Report on MOM in New Hampshire: MOM will be in New Hampshire and speak to the Greater Dairy London Dairy Chamber of Commerce on July 8. WMUR-MAN(ABC)'s News 9 Tonight , Manchester (NH) . 2015.06.23., MOM in NH.mp4

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Joshua McNeil" <joshua_mcneil@lcv.org>
To:	"David Sandretti" <david_sandretti@lcv.org>
Date:	11/19/2008 3:43:26 AM
Subject:	[big campaign] Clean, Baby, Clean - Election Day poll shows overwhelming support for clean energy
Attachments:	LCV poll results - November 2008.pdf

NEWS RELEASE

For Immediate Release
November 19, 2008
Contact: Josh McNeil; joshua_mcneil@lcv.org; 202.454.4573

Clean, Baby, Clean

Election Day poll shows overwhelming support for clean, renewable energy agenda

Today, the League of Conservation Voters released results from an Election Day poll showing that the policies of investing in wind and solar, requiring energy efficient appliances and raising fuel economy standards are widely supported by all sectors of the public and should be a top priority for the next congress and the Obama administration. The electorate preferred candidates who supported investment in clean, renewable energy and Republican attempts to harness offshore drilling as a campaign issue failed. The poll, conducted by Greenberg Quinlan Rosner Research, sampled 851 voters in 11 battleground states.

"'Drill, baby, drill' may have echoed in the halls of the Republican convention, but the party faithful were the only ones chanting," LCV President Gene Karpinski said. "The choice for most voters was clear: a clean energy future that will create jobs and protect our planet or the failed energy policies of the Bush Administration. Outside of Sarah Palin's rallies, the vast majority of Americans were voting for 'clean, baby, clean'."

While many candidates sought to use drilling to sway voters, that message failed to influence a significant number of voters. Opposition to more oil drilling ranked last of six possible reasons to oppose Democratic candidates, with only 14% of voters citing it as a reason to vote against Senator Obama and only 18% of voters citing it as a reason to oppose a Democratic House or Senate candidate.

30% cited support for clean energy as a reason to support Democratic candidate, ranking it the #2 reason after the economy.

Meanwhile, candidates' support for tax breaks for oil companies and the expansion of nuclear power ranked 4th and 3rd, respectively, as reasons to vote against these candidates. 25% believed that Senator McCain's ties to the oil industry were cause to vote against him (only 3% fewer than cited his choice of Governor Sarah Palin as his running mate and 8% more than cited a continuation of the war in Iraq). 27% cited such ties as reason to vote against Republican House and Senate candidates.

"This election was in many ways a referendum on America's clean energy future, and the results have given President Obama and the 111th Congress a clear mandate to take immediate action," Karpinski continued. "Those members of Congress who will continue to stand in the way of meaningful global warming and clean energy legislation should take note of these numbers and be prepared to defend their actions in 2010."

See the attached memo for more details from the poll on the role of clean energy in the 2008 election.

###

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail lori@progressiveaccountability.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.

-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
To:	jbenenson@bsgco.com "Robby Mook" <robbymook2015@gmail.com>
Date:	2/6/2015 6:33:46 PM
Subject:	Re: NYT | Econ Story

Here's what I sent them, with one line added at their request of something we'd previously sent off the record. New line is in brackets.

Expanding opportunities for hardworking Americans so that families can get ahead has been a constant fight she has waged in every job she's held. [She has a record of bringing people together to solve big problems, while also putting a real premium on accountability]. You heard it from her last fall when she was campaigning for Democrats all over the country and repeatedly laid out the challenges many Americans still face as our economy makes gains. She’s casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics. There's no red X on a calendar somewhere, but make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote."

On Feb 6, 2015, at 7:00 PM, Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com> wrote:

Looks like the NYT is getting close to closing their story. After our conversation yesterday, I think it makes the most sense to just repurpose what we have the Journal a week ago. I think it makes sense for us to be in this story, but no need to mix it up or complicate things. Same message, different paper.

I'd like to send this this evening, let us know if disagree on approach.

"Expanding opportunities for hardworking Americans so that families can get ahead has been a constant fight she has waged in every job she's held. You heard it from her last fall when she was campaigning for Democrats all over the country and repeatedly laid out the challenges many Americans still face as our economy makes gains. She’s casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics. There's no red X on a calendar somewhere, but make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote."

On Feb 6, 2015, at 12:18 PM, Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com> wrote:

I’m passing along a document that came from one of our friends, written for and sent directly to Amy Chozick for this NYT piece she’s working on. Gives you a sense of what we’re all up against!

From: "jbenenson@bsgco.com<mailto:jbenenson@bsgco.com>"
<jbenenson@bsgco.com<mailto:jbenenson@bsgco.com>>
Date: Monday, February 2, 2015 at 10:27 AM
To: Robby Mook <robbymook2015@gmail.com<mailto:robbymook2015@gmail.com>>
Cc: Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com<mailto:gruncom@aol.com>>, NSM
<nmerrill@hrcoffice.com<mailto:nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>>, Cheryl Mills
<cheryl.mills@gmail.com<mailto:cheryl.mills@gmail.com>>, John Podesta
<john.podesta@gmail.com<mailto:john.podesta@gmail.com>>, Jacob Sullivan
<Jake.sullivan@gmail.com<mailto:Jake.sullivan@gmail.com>>, Philippe Reines
<pir@hrcoffice.com<mailto:pir@hrcoffice.com>>, Huma Abedin
<huma@hrcoffice.com<mailto:huma@hrcoffice.com>>, Dan Schwerin

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

<dschwerin@hrcoffice.com<mailto:dschwerin@hrcoffice.com>>, Jim Margolis <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com<mailto:Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>>, "john@algpolling.com<mailto:john@algpolling.com>" <john@algpolling.com<mailto:john@algpolling.com>>, "cmills@cdmillsgroup.com<mailto:cmills@cdmillsgroup.com>" <cmills@cdmillsgroup.com<mailto:cmills@cdmillsgroup.com>>, Jennifer Palmieri <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com<mailto:jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com>>, Kristina Schake <kristinakschake@gmail.com<mailto:kristinakschake@gmail.com>>
Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

Mandy is right. We keep emphasizing that the most significant pain point for people is that the belief the decked is stacked against them in favor of this at the top. And they're not wrong.

Sent from my iPhone

On Feb 2, 2015, at 10:07 AM, Robby Mook <robbymook2015@gmail.com<mailto:robbymook2015@gmail.com>> wrote:

Agree

On Feb 2, 2015, at 9:41 AM, Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com<mailto:gruncom@aol.com>> wrote:

I think this piece turned out well.

But when we define our goals, we have to be clear that we are concerned with helping people who are getting crushed by rising costs and stagnant incomes, not that we're worried about offending high income groups (our donors). My guess is that this sentence will cause us some problems on the left.
One of Mrs. Clinton’s broader goals is to develop ways to address economic anxiety without sounding like a combative populist or demonizing high-income groups, said a person familiar with her thinking.

Mandy Grunwald
Grunwald Communications
202 973-9400

-----Original Message-----
From: Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com<mailto:nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>>
To: Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com<mailto:jbenenson@bsgco.com>>; Cheryl Mills <cheryl.mills@gmail.com<mailto:cheryl.mills@gmail.com>>
Cc: Mandy Grunwald <gruncom@aol.com<mailto:gruncom@aol.com>>; Robby Mook <robbymook2015@gmail.com<mailto:robbymook2015@gmail.com>>; John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com<mailto:john.podesta@gmail.com>>; Jake Sullivan <jake.sullivan@gmail.com<mailto:jake.sullivan@gmail.com>>; Philippe Reines <pir@hrcoffice.com<mailto:pir@hrcoffice.com>>; Huma Abedin <huma@hrcoffice.com<mailto:huma@hrcoffice.com>>; Dan Schwerin <dschwerin@hrcoffice.com<mailto:dschwerin@hrcoffice.com>>; Jim Margolis <Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com<mailto:Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>>; John Anzalone <john@algpolling.com<mailto:john@algpolling.com>>; Cheryl Mills <cmills@cdmillsgroup.com<mailto:cmills@cdmillsgroup.com>>; Jennifer Palmieri <jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com<mailto:jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com>>; Kristina Schake <kristinakschake@gmail.com<mailto:kristinakschake@gmail.com>>
Sent: Sun, Feb 1, 2015 11:38 pm
Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.wsj.com/articles/clinton-consults-experts-to-define-economic-pitch-1422837490

Clinton Consults to Define Economic Pitch

By Peter Nicholas

Hillary Clinton <http://topics.wsj.com/person/C/Hillary-Clinton/6344> has been consulting with an array of economists and academics—including liberal Joseph Stiglitz, former Fed chairman Paul Volcker and new faces outside the traditional orbit of Democratic policy experts—as she prepares for a likely presidential campaign that would make sluggish wage growth and middle-class prosperity a central focus.

One of Mrs. Clinton's broader goals is to develop ways to address economic anxiety without sounding like a combative populist or demonizing high-income groups, said a person familiar with her thinking. It isn't clear whether that particular question has come up in the meetings she has been having with various policy experts. She has been using the meetings to prepare herself for a possible campaign, ground herself in the issues and tease out fresh approaches to stubborn domestic and foreign policy problems, people familiar with the matter said.

As the former secretary of state keeps a low public profile ahead of announcing her near-certain candidacy, the meetings offer clues to which issues she believes merit attention and whose advice she values. Many, but not all, participants served in Bill Clinton 's administration; others are distinguished primarily by expertise in subjects that are certain to be front-and-center in the 2016 presidential race.

Some of the meetings had the feeling of a high-octane faculty symposium and lasted for hours, say people familiar with the sessions. Pen and pad in hand, Mrs. Clinton typically has gone around the room to ask for ideas, offering comments now and then and inviting participants to make suggestions down the road.

In December, Mrs. Clinton presided over a meeting at a midtown Manhattan hotel that focused on middle-class Americans feeling pinched by slow wage growth.

Among those attending: Mr. Volcker, the architect of the "Volcker Rule," a regulatory measure barring banks from making risky bets with their own money; Jonathan Cowan, co-founder of the centrist think tank Third Way, which has been critical of some of the populist rhetoric coming from the Democrats' liberal wing; and Alan Blinder <http://topics.wsj.com/person/B/Alan-Blinder/4> , a Princeton professor and former Fed vice chairman and economics adviser to Mr. Clinton.

Also at the meeting, according to people familiar with it, were Robert Hormats, who worked in the State Department during Mrs. Clinton's tenure and was a former vice chairman of Goldman Sachs; Richard Ravitch <http://topics.wsj.com/person/R/Richard-Ravitch/5985> , a former Democratic lieutenant governor in New York, who helped New York City avert bankruptcy during a fiscal crisis in the 1970s; and Teresa Ghilarducci, a labor economist and proponent of ideas to shore up Americans' retirement savings. The Clinton team has asked her to help evaluate various policy ideas.

The participants examined a range of ideas to boost economic security, such as tax cuts for the middle class, expanded access to prekindergarten education and new ways to pay for improvements to roads and tunnels, said people familiar with the session.

"One major focus of the meeting was the miserable recent performance of wages in general and middle-class wages in particular, and what if anything the government can do about that," said Mr. Blinder.

Bernard Schwartz, a longtime Democratic donor and contributor to the Clinton Foundation, was among those who helped arrange the meeting, said people familiar with the session. Mr. Schwartz is a former chairman of Loral Space & Communications Ltd. Mrs. Clinton also has consulted with Mr. Stiglitz, a former economic adviser to Bill Clinton and author of a book about the perils of economic inequality.

The policy interests of some participants point to the issues Mrs. Clinton is likely to prioritize, notably the financial pressures faced by middle-class families. Prospective Republican presidential candidates also are talking about shoring up the middle class and, in some cases, narrowing the wage gap in America—a sign that those topics will be flashpoints in the general election.

Mrs. Clinton is the overwhelming front-runner for the Democratic nomination, but some liberals would like to see her challenged by U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren <http://topics.wsj.com/person/W/Elizabeth-Warren/8131> (D., Mass.), a populist firebrand who has described the American economic system as "rigged" in favor of the wealthy. Ms. Warren has said she won't run. In targeting income inequality, Mrs. Clinton would address a substantive issue facing the country while also making inroads with Ms. Warren's liberal followers.

Mrs. Clinton also has held foreign policy meetings in New York and Washington. A New York meeting in the summer was a "tour" of global hot spots, among them the war in Syria and Russia's incursions into Ukraine, according to people familiar with what took place.

Mrs. Clinton asked for a diagnosis of the problem and a "strategic" view of how the U.S. should act, one person familiar with the meeting said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Those who attended included Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, who worked under both Republican presidents George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush; David Rothkopf, author of a new book on foreign policy-making in the George W. Bush and Obama <http://topics.wsj.com/person/O/Obama/4328> administrations; and Dennis Ross, a diplomat with many years of experience in the Middle East peace negotiations.

More informally, Mrs. Clinton has also spoken to trusted Democratic confidants about appointments to high-level positions in her campaign, should she decide to run.

A campaign apparatus is already taking shape. John Podesta, a senior adviser to President Barack Obama, is likely to become a senior adviser to the campaign, while two Obama campaign veterans, pollster Joel Benenson and media adviser Jim Margolis, are expected to take top positions on Mrs. Clinton's campaign team, people familiar with the matter said.

"She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics" said Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton. "Make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote."

On Feb 1, 2015, at 6:54 PM, Nick Merrill < nmerrill@hrcoffice.com<mailto:nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>> wrote:

Ran the quote past HRC and she asked (with no prompting) that "average" come out. So here's what I shipped off to Peter Nicholas at the Journal. AS for the NYT, looks like it won't run for a few days if not next Sunday, so will circle back on that as it develops.

Thanks again to all for the feedback.

Go Seahawks!

"Expanding opportunities for hardworking Americans so that families can get ahead has been a constant fight she has waged in every job she's held. You heard it from her last fall when she was campaigning for Democrats all over the country and repeatedly laid out the challenges many Americans still face as our economy makes gains. She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics. There's no red X on a calendar somewhere, but make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote. "

From: Joel Benenson < jbenenson@bsgco.com<mailto:jbenenson@bsgco.com>>
Date: Sunday, February 1, 2015 at 5:39 PM
To: Cheryl Mills < cheryl.mills@gmail.com<mailto:cheryl.mills@gmail.com>>
Cc: NSM < nmerrill@hrcoffice.com<mailto:nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>>, Mandy Grunwald < gruncom@aol.com<mailto:gruncom@aol.com>>, Robby Mook < robbymook2015@gmail.com<mailto:robbymook2015@gmail.com>>, John Podesta < john.podesta@gmail.com<mailto:john.podesta@gmail.com>>, Jacob Sullivan < Jake.sullivan@gmail.com<mailto:Jake.sullivan@gmail.com>>, Philippe Reines < pir@hrcoffice.com<mailto:pir@hrcoffice.com>>, Huma Abedin < huma@hrcoffice.com<mailto:huma@hrcoffice.com>>, Dan Schwerin < dschwerin@hrcoffice.com<mailto:dschwerin@hrcoffice.com>>, Jim Margolis < Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com<mailto:Jim.Margolis@gmmb.com>>, John Anzalone < john@algpolling.com<mailto:john@algpolling.com>>, Cheryl Mills < cmills@cdmillsgroup.com<mailto:cmills@cdmillsgroup.com>>, Jennifer Palmieri < jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com<mailto:jennifer.m.palmieri@gmail.com>>, Kristina Schake < kristinakschake@gmail.com<mailto:kristinakschake@gmail.com>>
Subject: RE: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

Definitely

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: Cheryl Mills [mailto:cheryl.mills@gmail.com]
Sent: Sunday, February 01, 2015 5:35 PM
To: Joel Benenson
Cc: Nick Merrill; Mandy Grunwald; Robby Mook; John Podesta; Jake Sullivan; Philippe Reines; Huma Abedin; Dan Schwerin; Jim Margolis; John Anzalone; Cheryl Mills; Jennifer Palmieri; Kristina Schake
Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

can we test every day americans next time?

On Sun, Feb 1, 2015 at 5:27 PM, Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com<mailto:jbenenson@bsgco.com>> wrote:
When we tested deck is stacked against “average Americans, with too many breaks for those at the top” vs. Gov regs and rules hurging biz and stopping them from creating jobs – by 49-41 among all voters and 56-33 with our MOR (middle of the road voters) . I think it’s how they see themselves in this environment, which remains their big pain point that she is fighting to fix.

For the moment it also creates a slight language difference with POTUS – not a big deal but a nuance.
Joel

From: Cheryl Mills [mailto:cheryl.mills@gmail.com<mailto:cheryl.mills@gmail.com>]
Sent: Sunday, February 01, 2015 5:22 PM
To: Nick Merrill
Cc: Joel Benenson; Mandy Grunwald; Robby Mook; John Podesta; Jake Sullivan; Philippe Reines; Huma Abedin; Dan Schwerin; Jim Margolis; John Anzalone; Cheryl Mills; Jennifer Palmieri; Kristina Schake

Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories

Looks good. I think you can take out average and still communicate you mean folks in middle with "hardworking" (who likes to be average?)

if average is important I might use everyday.

cdm

On Sun, Feb 1, 2015 at 4:36 PM, Nick Merrill <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com<mailto:nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>> wrote:
Great, thank you.

Robby to your point about letting her speak for herself, I¹ve been reminding people that they should be careful to acknowledge that this is part of a process. She laid out challenges that we face in the midterms, and now she¹s thinking through how we would address them should she run. Will reinforce that when I circle back with these guys today.

Here¹s the quote again incorporating peoples¹ thoughts. John Anzalone, I think Joel addressed what you were trying to get at so I left his edits as is, but let me know if you think we¹re missing anything. Otherwise will push this in the next little while. Thanks all.

"Expanding opportunities for average hardworking Americans so that they and their families can get ahead has been a constant fight she has waged in every job she's held. You heard it from her last fall when she was campaigning for Democrats all over the country and repeatedly laid out the challenges many Americans still face as our economy makes gains. She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a range of specific topics. There's no red X on a calendar somewhere, but make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

> On 2/1/15, 4:05 PM, "Joel Benenson" <jbenenson@bsgco.com<mailto:jbenenson@bsgco.com>> wrote:
>
> Yes.
>
> -----Original Message-----
> From: Mandy Grunwald [mailto:gruncom@aol.com<mailto:gruncom@aol.com>]
> Sent: Sunday, February 01, 2015 4:05 PM
> To: Robby Mook
> Cc: Joel Benenson; Nick Merrill; John Podesta; Jake Sullivan; Philippe
> Reines; Cheryl Mills; Huma Abedin; Dan Schwerin; Jim Margolis; John > Anzalone; Cheryl Mills; Jennifer Palmieri; Kristina Schake
> Subject: Re: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories
>
> I like it too.
>
> There's a word missing toward the end. I assume it should say "...she > will present SOLUTIONS to our toughest challenges..."
>
> Thx
>
> Mandy Grunwald
> Grunwald Communications
> 202 973-9400<tel:202%20973-9400>
>
>
>> On Feb 1, 2015, at 3:39 PM, Robby Mook
<robbymook2015@gmail.com<mailto:robbymook2015@gmail.com>> wrote:
>>
>> Adding Jenn and Kristina
>> Joel I agree w your edits. In particular I want to avoid any >> expectations around how big or bold her ideas will be.
>> Nick I'm sure you're already doing this but I also would push hard on >> background that we can't judge a candidate who has yet to announce--give >> her a chance to speak for herself. I know that's impossible but worth >> trying to get them to acknowledge that she's not a candidate and this is >> all speculation.
>>
>>
>>> On Feb 1, 2015, at 3:14 PM, Joel Benenson <jbenenson@bsgco.com<mailto:jbenenson@bsgco.com>> wrote:
>>>
>>> Thanks Nick.
>>>
>>> Going for a little more conversational here with this:
>>>
>>> "Expanding opportunities for average hardworking Americans so that >>> they and their families can get ahead has been a constant fight she has >>> waged in every job she's held. You heard it from her last fall when >>> she was campaigning for Democrats all over the country and repeatedly >>> laid out the challenges many Americans still face as our economy makes >>> gains. She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on >>> a range of specific topics. There's no red X on a calendar somewhere,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

>>> but make no mistake, if she runs, she will present to our toughest >>> challenges and she will take nothing for granted and she will fight >>> for every vote."
>>>
>>> -----Original Message-----
>>> From: Nick Merrill [mailto:nmerrill@hrcoffice.com<mailto:nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>]
>>> Sent: Sunday, February 01, 2015 2:46 PM
>>> To: John Podesta; Jake Sullivan; Philippe Reines; Robby Mook; Cheryl >>> Mills; Huma Abedin; Dan Schwerin; Jim Margolis; John Anzalone; Mandy
>>> Grunwald; Cheryl Mills; Joel Benenson
>>> Subject: NYT & WSJ | Econ Stories
>>>
>>> As I mentioned on our call on Thursday, both the WSJ and the NYT are >>> working on stories about how HRC might approach economic policy issues >>> as a candidate. Both will have a dose of personnel name-gaming, and >>> I've spoken to both to steer them towards progressive names, which they >>> seem to both have on their own.
>>>
>>> I want to give both stories something on the record that addresses the >>> core of the story, but also speaks some of the things we all felt >>> needed a little proactive addressing, like inevitability and timing.
>>>
>>> On the inevitability question, John I tried to stick to the language >>> you suggested, though I did take the liberty of striking the word
>>> "idiot."
>>>
>>> "Increasing access to opportunity and fighting for upward mobility has >>> been an uninterrupted pursuit of hers in every job she's held. You >>> heard it from her on the campaign trail last fall, where she laid out >>> the challenges we face. She's casting a wide net, talking to a wide >>> range of people on a range of specific topics. There's no red X on a >>> calendar somewhere, but make no mistake, if she runs, she will take >>> nothing for granted, she'll present bold ideas, and she will fight for >>> every vote."
>>>
>>> Feedback welcome, but I'd like to ship this later today.
>>>
>>> Nick

<Rothschild Econ Doc for Chozick.pdf>

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To:	CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date:	10/31/2014 8:09:49 AM
Subject:	10.31.14 CTR Weekend TPs
Attachments:	10.31.14 Weekend Package.docx

Hello all,

Please find Correct The Record's weekend talking points package both below and attached. Happy Halloween!

10.31.14

1. Hillary Clinton: A Lifetime Champion of Income Opportunity
2. Hillary Clinton on Immigration
3. Eleven Things You Should Know About Hillary

HILLARY CLINTON: A LIFETIME CHAMPION OF INCOME OPPORTUNITY

"With all due respect, it is not rich people who made America great. It is the vast American middle class. It is the upward mobility of people who thought they could do better than their parents."

–Hillary Clinton

BACKGROUND: Hillary Clinton has dedicated her life to ensuring that all hardworking Americans have the chance to succeed, no matter their circumstances. Leading the charge for equal pay for equal work, expanding access to early childhood education and healthcare, working to raise the minimum wage, and advocating for out-of-work Americans, Hillary's record reflects the belief that every American should have the right to achieve economic security and income opportunity.

Hillary Clinton's record proves she believes that every American should be able to earn an equal day's pay for an equal day's work. As a Senator, Hillary Clinton introduced the Paycheck Fairness Act and was an original cosponsor of the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act.

In the Senate, Hillary Clinton supported increasing the minimum wage and voted repeatedly to protect and increase it. She was an original cosponsor of the Fair Minimum Wage Act of 2007, and authored the 2006 and 2007 Standing with Minimum Wage Act to tie Congressional salary increases to an increase in the minimum wage.

As a Senator, Hillary Clinton supported progressive tax policies that required millionaires to pay their fair share. She opposed the Bush tax cuts in 2001 and 2003, and she supported a variety of middle-class tax cuts, including tax credits for student loan recipients, and keeping in place the tax cuts for those who make under $250,000 a year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

o Clinton has said "that inherited wealth and concentrated wealth is not good for America," and she has consistently voted against repealing the estate tax on millionaires, doing so in 2001, 2002, and 2006.

Hillary Clinton supported working families going through difficult times through no fault of their own. In the Senate, she was a bipartisan leader on fighting to extend emergency unemployment benefits.

Hillary Clinton knows that tomorrow's shared success starts with today's child, and her dedication to children began long before she ever entered public office. In fact, her first job out of law school was for the newly-formed Children's Defense Fund, an organization she would later chair.

Hillary Clinton has worked to increase health coverage for millions of children in low-income and working families through the State Children's Health Insurance Program, a program she helped created as First Lady. In the Senate, Hillary Clinton looked for ways to strengthen the program, introducing bills to allow states to expand it.

Hillary Clinton has worked to expand access to early childhood education for children of lower-income families. As First Lady of Arkansas, Hillary Clinton introduced her husband to the HIPPY program, which expanded early childhood education to economically disadvantaged children. In the Senate, Clinton partnered with Kit Bond in an effort to expand voluntary full-day pre-K for children from low-income families.

o Today, as part of the Too Small to Fail Initiative to improve the health and well-being of children five and under, Hillary Clinton is working to close the "word gap" for kids in low-income families who often have smaller vocabularies than their classmates.

BOTTOM LINE: The lack of income opportunity is hurting working families across the country and poses a threat to the American ideal that if you work hard and play by the rules, you should have the opportunity to succeed. Hillary Clinton's record reflects the belief that your ability to get ahead should be determined by your hard work, ambition, and goals – not by your circumstances.

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON ON IMMIGRATION

KEY POINTS:

Hillary Clinton has been a vocal supporter of comprehensive immigration reform and a path to citizenship.

In the Senate, Hillary Clinton consistently voted in favor of comprehensive immigration reform.

Clinton is a supporter of the DREAM Act and advocated for it on the Senate floor.

In the Senate, Hillary Clinton introduced an amendment to reunite families separated by the immigration system. The amendment would have reclassified the spouses and minor children of lawful permanent residents as immediate relatives.

Clinton introduced a bill to restore access to Medicaid and SCHIP benefits for legal immigrant pregnant women and children.

Clinton introduced a bill to provide more funding for job training for people with limited English language skills.

BACKGROUND: HILLARY ON Immigration

Hillary Clinton: "I'm a huge supporter of immigration reform and a path to citizenship and will continue to advocate for that." As former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton recently told a tearful young undocumented immigrant, "I'm a huge supporter of immigration reform and a path to citizenship and will continue to advocate for that." Clinton's remarks came at the Clinton Foundation's "No Ceilings" forum in New York. Clinton went on to say, "I believe strongly we are missing a great opportunity by not welcoming people like you and 11 million others who have made contributions to our country into a legal status so you don't have to worry, you can go to school, you can work, you can pursue your dreams." Clinton also said she is "strongly in favor" of the bipartisan Senate bill and that the House's opposition is "a big missed opportunity for our country." [Washington Post, 4/17/14]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton has been a strong supporter of the DREAM Act. As Senator Clinton stated during a debate over the DREAM Act on the Senate floor, "There is a solution to this crisis, but sadly, the Senate today failed to act. The DREAM Act – which I have proudly cosponsored for several years – would help expand opportunities for our nation's immigrant children. For those students who have grown up in the United States, have demonstrated good moral character, and are pursuing a college education or have enlisted in the military, the DREAM Act will provide an opportunity to earn legal status in this country." [Clinton floor remarks, 10/24/07]

Sen. Clinton consistently voted in support of comprehensive immigration reform. In the Senate, Hillary Clinton voted for the bipartisan Comprehensive Immigration Reform Act of 2006 and voted to invoke cloture on S.1639, the 2007 comprehensive immigration reform bill. [Vote #157, S.2611, 5/25/06 , Vote #235, S.1639, 6/28/07]

Sen. Clinton introduced legislation to restore access to Medicaid and SCHIP benefits for legal immigrant pregnant women and children. In 2007, Hillary introduced the Legal Immigrant Children's Health Improvement Act "which amends titles XIX (Medicaid) and XXI (Children's Health Insurance) (SCHIP) of the Social Security Act to grant states the option of covering certain categories of eligible pregnant women and child resident aliens, including targeted low-income children, under the Medicaid and SCHIP programs." [S.764, 3/5/07]

Sen. Clinton introduced legislation to provide more job training funds for individuals with limited English language skills. In 2003, Hillary Clinton introduced the Access to Employment and English Language Acquisition Act which "Amends the Workforce Investment Act of 1998 to provide for: (1) job training that integrates occupational skills training with language acquisition; and (2) specified services for individuals who are Limited English Proficient (LEP). Authorizes the Secretary to award incentive grants to States for exemplary performance in carrying out integrated training programs." [S.1543, introduced, 7/31/03]

Sen. Clinton introduced an amendment to reunite families who had been separated by the immigration system. In 2007, during a debate over the Comprehensive Immigration Reform Act, Sen. Clinton introduced an amendment "to reclassify the spouses and minor children of lawful permanent residents as immediate relatives." As she said before the vote, "It is time to take all the rhetoric about family values and put it into action and show that we mean what we say when we talk about putting families first. That is what my amendment does. This amendment is a bipartisan amendment offered with Senator Hagel and Senator Menendez. It is our view we must make reuniting families a priority in our immigration system, that we should show compassion for those living apart from their spouses and minor children, that we should reform immigration in a way that honors families and brings them together." The bipartisan amendment, introduced with Sens. Hagel and Menendez failed, 44-53. [Vote # 195, 6/6/07]

ELEVEN THINGS YOU SHOULD KNOW ABOUT HILLARY

Secretary Clinton helped restore America's leadership and standing in the world during a time of global challenges and changes. Secretary Clinton worked tirelessly to revitalize American diplomacy and strengthen alliances by traveling nearly a million miles for hundreds of meetings with foreign leaders in 112 countries. As America's lead diplomat, Secretary Clinton understood the importance of engaging the public and took diplomacy directly to people around the world. Just as she was as a senator, Secretary Clinton was a workhorse, often taking on difficult challenges and addressing them directly around the world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Secretary Clinton built and maintained a coalition to enact the toughest sanctions in Iran's history. Secretary Clinton helped impose the toughest sanctions in Iran's history by getting Russia and China on board. Even the Wall Street Journal editorial board noted that, "Clinton surely pulled out every stop to get Russia and particularly China…on board." And as Howard Dean recently told CNN , "Hillary Clinton cranked up the sanctions for the first time under President Obama that actually made the Iranians come to the table."

Secretary Clinton played an integral role in the New START Treaty with Russia. Secretary Clinton played an active role in reaching a missile reduction agreement with Russia, working to push it through the Senate and securing more than the necessary two-thirds majority. She entered the treaty into force in Munich with her Russian counterpart. As a result of the treaty's passage, there will be fewer nuclear missile launchers . Simply put, the world is safer.

Secretary Clinton supported the raid that brought Osama bin Laden to justice. As NBC's Brian Williams reported on his website, "Secretary of Defense Robert Gates recommended an air strike with no forces on the ground. CIA Director Panetta supported a raid by Special Forces and so did Secretary of State Clinton."

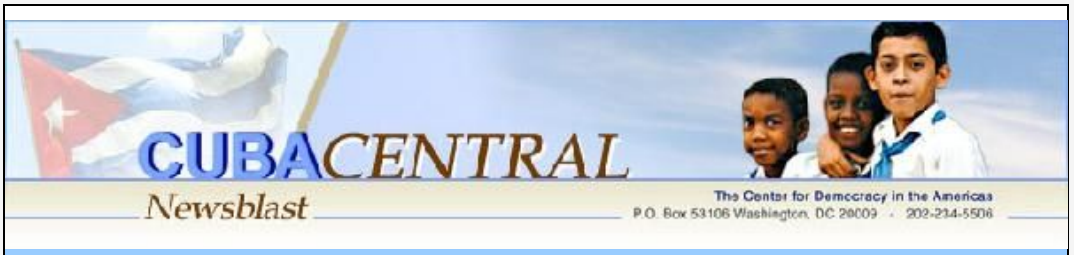
Secretary Clinton helped avert all-out war in Gaza by negotiating a cease-fire between Israelis and Palestinians. In November 2012, after eight days of violence, Secretary Clinton negotiated a Gaza cease-fire with Egyptian president Mohamed Morsi. In an article titled "Hillary Clinton scores Gaza cease fire success," Politico noted that, "Secretary of State Hillary Clinton got a Gaza cease-fire right at the moment hope seemed dead for a rapid end to the violence…"

Secretary Clinton played a role in bringing one war to an end and planning for the end of another. Working closely with Department of Defense colleagues and as part of the President's national security team, Secretary Clinton played a role in the end of war in Iraq and in beginning a transition in Afghanistan, with all NATO allies having agreed to stand-up a post withdrawal support plan. As President Obama told 60 Minutes , it was "all a consequence of the great work that Hillary did and her team did and the State Department did in conjunction with our national security team."

Secretary Clinton was critical in America's "pivot to Asia" strategy. As Martin Indyk of the Brookings Institute wrote in Foreign Policy , "The 'pivot' to East Asia will probably be Obama's most lasting strategic achievement… [but] it is Clinton's too. She laid the groundwork, built the relationships, and developed the complex architecture of the new strategy — and she turned up at that pivotal moment in Vietnam in July 2010 to declare the U.S. commitment to the region." Secretary Clinton earned praise for her work in opening up Burma, a place that had not been visited by a Secretary of State in 50 years.

Secretary Clinton worked to build the coalition to oust Qadhafi and stop massacres in Libya. As the Washington Post reported upon the end of NATO operations in Libya, "U.S. officials and key allies are offering a detailed new defense of the approach and Clinton's pivotal role – both within a divided Cabinet and a fragile, assembled-on-the-fly international alliance. What emerges from these accounts is a picture of Clinton using her mixture of political pragmatism and tenacity to referee spats among NATO partners, secure crucial backing from Arab countries and tutor rebels on the fine points of message management."

Secretary Clinton engaged in economic statecraft. Secretary Clinton's focus on economic engagement resulted in increased investment through three new free trade agreements (Colombia ,Panama and South Korea) and 15 Open Skies agreements including with Japan, Brazil, Saudi Arabia and Israel.



This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Secretary Clinton brought the State Department into the 21st Century. Secretary Clinton helped the State Department adapt to emerging issues such as cyber security by creating the Center for Strategic Counterterrorism Communications to combat Al-Qaeda's growing influence online. She recognized the important role of energy in U.S. foreign policy and helped create the Bureau of Energy Resources to protect our energy infrastructure and influence how nations move to cleaner fuel.

Secretary Clinton elevated the cause of women's rights to new heights. Secretary Clinton recognized women's rights as a major foreign policy issue. It is, according to Newsweek, the area of "hardships faced by women and girls across the world–that her impact has been most profound." Hillary convinced the White House to allow her to create a new position at the State Department: Ambassador-at-Large for Global Women's Issues. Newsweek continued, "Across the world, in diverse and deeply reactionary cultures, Clinton and [Ambassador-at-Large] Verveer have spoken and fought to liberalize attitudes on women's role in the economy, girls' schooling, women's health, domestic violence, issues arising from war and conflict, and myriad other concerns."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "The Cuba Central Team" <sarah@democracyinamericas.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 2/19/2016 11:05:42 AM
Subject: Obama to Follow Coolidge to Cuba, U.S. Media Reports

February 19, 2016

Dear Friends:

President Obama continues to keep the promises he made during the heat of the 2008 presidential campaign. Since coming to the White House, he reopened the door that was cruelly shut by his predecessor and encouraged Cuban Americans to make unlimited visits to their families on the island. He also opened a dialogue with Cuba's government "without preconditions," and promised to meet with Cuba's President Raúl Castro "at a time and place of my choosing."

"Trust," we learned in Cuba last week, "is a series of promises kept." The President will fulfill this promise when he travels to Cuba accompanied by Mrs. Obama on March 21-22. On those dates, as the U.S. media has repeated ad nauseam in the last 36 hours, he will become the first president to do so since President Calvin Coolidge made the trip in 1928 to address a meeting of the Pan American Conference.

Is there something of value to be learned from Coolidge's visit some 88 years ago?

For more than half of the 20th Century, Cuba danced at the end of a string held tight in Washington's grasp. Prior to the Coolidge presidency, an amendment to the Cuban Constitution was adopted which gave the United States carte blanche to intervene, and U.S. soldiers were deployed on multiple occasions to do exactly that. As Bill LeoGrande and Peter Kornbluh write in their essential Back Channel To Cuba , "Treaties and laws promulgated by the U.S. military governors gave U.S. businesses unmatched advantages in the Cuban market."

Coolidge was welcomed to Cuba by the nation's President Gerardo Machado who, as Lars Schoultz recalls, was nicknamed "the Butcher of Las Villas." The U.S. government was forgiving of Machado's brutality, corruption, and fraudulent reelection to his second term in office, and he was admired by U.S. investors for the stability he brought to the island.

Following a florid introduction by Machado, President Coolidge spoke for over a half-hour, reading a text that exceeded 4,000 words, clearly crafted with the U.S. audience in mind.

> "Thirty years ago Cuba ranked as a foreign possession, torn by revolution and devastated by hostile forces. Such government as existed rested on military force. Today Cuba is her own sovereign. Her people are independent, free, prosperous, peaceful, and enjoying the advantages of self-government...
>
> "They have reached a position in the stability of their government, in the genuine expression of their public opinion at the ballot box, and in the recognized soundness of their public credit that has commanded universal respect and admiration."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Machado must have basked in the glory of Coolidge's remarks. Cubans, if they even heard what the man nicknamed "Silent Cal" said, must have been troubled by the contrast between his fact-free description of their country and the reality of Cuba's politics and economy they knew all too well.

A few years later, Cubans drove the despot Machado into a comfortable Miami exile, and they have waited nine decades for an American President to speak to them again, and to use words that reflect their realities.

We don't have a single doubt about how the President will be received in Cuba. In Havana, we saw their eyes glow with pride on the day Mr. Obama shook hands with President Raúl Castro at Nelson Mandela's memorial service; a year later, their joyful tears wet our faces as we celebrated the announcement that Cuba and the United States would resume diplomatic relations. After cheering the President for quoting Jose Martí in an address carried on state television, Cubans described the sensation of a burden being lifted from their country as they saw our half-century long isolation finally coming to an end.

Because they have seen the first American president in their lifetimes treat Cuba with respect, President Obama will surely receive a hero's welcome from the Cuban people when he arrives there in March.

That moment - covered in real time on global television - will surely be a teachable moment for the U.S. audience, which is already giving the President high marks for his Cuba diplomacy, as the Gallup polling organization said today. A strongly positive welcome for the President holds the promise of galvanizing momentum for further reforms in U.S. policy. It will also give lie to assertions by the President's bilious opponents that his rapprochement with Cuba's government is a self-out of Cuba's people.

If bilious seems strong, how better to describe the written statement from a Senator of his own party who called the upcoming visit "unacceptable" and against "enduring American values," or the assertion by another who said that visiting Cuba will be "damaging to our national security interests" and will "send the message to the oppressed Cuban people that you stand with their oppressors"? The latter comment is drawn from Senator Marco Rubio's letter to the President demanding that he not make the trip at all.

Rather than sitting out history now, as his opponents want him to do, or spinning fantasy for reality as Calvin Coolidge did nine decades ago, Mr. Obama is striving to do better - to make a nuanced case that reflects the aspirations of Cubans, expresses his devotion to American values (as he did Thursday on Twitter), highlights the benefits to U.S. interests, and respectfully encourages Cuba's leadership to use the remainder of his term and Raúl Castro's time in office to address issues that must be resolved to normalize relations fully.

If the President can slice through the noise coming from his opponents, his visit can advance the cause of normalization in the United States by gaining support for more executive actions to loosen restrictions on Cuba and for Congress ultimately repealing the travel ban and the embargo entirely.

Even more, as Sarah Stephens of CDA said in her statement Thursday, "this visit can affect how the leaders and people of both countries decide what they want the definition of normal to be. Are we neighbors at peace with a wall between us, or are we neighbors and friends with a door that is open and welcoming in both directions?"

The early signs are promising; that rather than pulling a Coolidge President Obama will thread the needle and prepare both countries for a lot more progress in the little time he has left to serve.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Our Recommendations

US - Cuba Relations

President Obama is going to Cuba. Here's why , Ben Rhodes, Medium
The White House announced that President Barack Obama will visit Cuba in March, the first visit by a sitting U.S. president since 1928. The official visit is the latest step in the Obama administration's effort to normalize relations between the United States and Cuba. In this article, Deputy National Security Advisor Ben Rhodes explains the President's decision to travel to Cuba and the administration's goals for the future of U.S. - Cuba relations.

For The First Time, Majority Of Americans See Cuba Favorably In Poll , Bill Chappel, NPR
For the first time since the 1959 revolution, a majority (54%) of Americans now view Cuba in a positive light, according to a recent Gallup poll. The results show a 33 point net favorability gain in the past ten years. The biggest gain was among Democrats, 73% of whom now view Cuba in a positive light. A strong majority of Republicans, however, despite favoring an end to the embargo, still view Cuba negatively, with only 34% having favorable views of the island nation. Favorability among independents stands at 53%. For a comprehensive review of polling data on U.S. - Cuba relations, see our November 2015 News Briefing here .

U.S. missile inadvertently shipped to Cuba has been returned , Elise Labott and Eugene Scott, CNN
A Hellfire missile wrongly sent to Cuba was returned to the U.S. on Saturday. The missile, a so-called "dummy missile" (not fitted with a warhead, fusing system rocket monitor or operational seeker) used in exercises, had been in Cuba since 2014, when it was misrouted en route from Spain to Florida following a military exercise.

Kathy Castor Leads 7-Member Congressional Delegation to Cuba , Florida Politics
Seven members of the U.S. House - led by Representatives Kathy Castor (FL-14) and Tom Emmer (MN-6), and including John Garamendi (CA-3), Paul Gosar (AZ-4) Brendan Boyle (PA-13), Alan Lowenthal (CA-47) and Mike Bishop (MI-8) - traveled to Cuba last weekend with the Center for Democracy in the Americas. Rep. Castor remarked prior to the trip that "We intend to meet with small business owners and entrepreneurs to gain a better understanding of how the changes in the Cuban economy are working," At the trip's conclusion, Mr. Emmer noted that his encounters with government and business leaders in Cuba have further convinced him that change is accelerating in Cuba, and warrants a proportional U.S. change in policy towards the island.

Sponsors Of Bill To Lift Cuba Embargo Say It Could See A Vote This Year , Tim Padgett, WLRN News
Rep. Tom Emmer of Minnesota and Rep. Kathy Castor of Florida expressed "guarded optimism" at a forum in Miami that their legislation to repeal the trade embargo "might generate enough support this year for a vote. "Emmer," Padgett writes, "thinks enough momentum is building outside Washington, especially among agriculture interests in states like his, to give his bill a chance of passing even during this election year."

Fresh from Cuba trip, Castor lauds Obama's plans to travel there , Kate Bradshaw, CL Tampa
Days after returning from leading a congressional delegation to Cuba, Representative Kathy Castor (FL-14) offered her thoughts on President Obama's announced upcoming trip to Cuba next month. In a statement released Thursday Castor said, "I know [the President] will be as inspired as I am by the Cuban people and the cuentapropistas who are building a more hopeful future for themselves and their families." Castor also expressed confidence that the President's trip would have a positive impact on the island and on U.S.-Cuba relations, and encourage greater political openness, economic growth, and respect for human rights.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Feds invite airlines to bid for Cuba flights , Keith Laing, The Hill
The Obama administration has signed an agreement with the Cuban government that would allow up to 110 commercial flights per day between the U.S. and Cuba. A number of U.S.-operated airlines have applauded the administration and are currently bidding to operate these newly approved flights. The announcement came during Transportation Secretary Anthony Foxx's visit to Cuba. American Airlines, one of the airlines bidding for flights to Cuba released a statement "applauding" the Obama Administration for its efforts and expressing great interest in "submitting a Cuba service proposal to the Department of Transportation in the coming weeks."

Pact on U.S.-Cuba Flights Reopens Battle for Seized Property , Frances Robles, New York Times
On Tuesday, U.S. Transportation Secretary Anthony Foxx and other top administration officials met with Cuban officials in Havana to sign an agreement that would allow commercial air travel between the two countries for the first time in over 50 years. As Ms. Robles reports, this move prompted complaints in the U.S. because of the unsettled issue of property claims. José Ramón López, 62, heir to the Havana airport and to Cuba's national airline, maintains his claim over the airport's future and cautions others against investing in Cuba. The State Department maintains that, "[Settling] Claims issues have been one of our highest priorities since we re-established diplomatic relations with Cuba."

U.S. approves its first factory in Cuba - a two-person tractor company from Alabama, Fox News Latino
The Obama administration has approved the first U.S. factory in Cuba in over fifty years. This tractor factory - valued between $5 and $10 million - owned and operated by Alabama natives Horace Clemmons and Saul Berenthal, has been approved by the Cuban government. For at least the next three years, the factory will assemble tractors using parts manufactured and shipped from the United States. Long term, the partners hope to be able to manufacture parts in Cuba and export tractors to other Latin American and Caribbean countries.

Cuban minister in Washington , Sergio Alejandro Gómez, Granma
Rodrigo Malmierca, Cuba's Minister of Foreign Trade and Investment arrived in Washington on February 14, to undertake a four-day working visit. The visit by Cuba's delegation - which included officials from the Ministry, the Central Bank of Cuba, the country's Chamber of Commerce, as well as executives of Cuban state enterprises - continued a regulatory dialogue that started with U.S. Commerce Secretary Penny Pritzker's trip to Cuba late last year. The Cuban minister urged Congress to lift the decades-old economic embargo and promised that U.S. companies seeking to invest in Cuba would be treated equally with competitors from nations without trade restrictions on the island.

John Kerry Receives Cuban Minister Malmierca in Washington , Prensa Latina
On Thursday, U.S. Secretary of State, John Kerry, met with the Cuban Minister of Foreign Trade and Investment, Rodrigo Malmierca in Washington. The meeting came at the end of Malmierca's four-day official visit to the United States which included meetings at the Department of Commerce, the U.S.-Cuba Council of Business, the Chamber of Commerce, and the U.S. Institute of Peace. It also came mere hours after the White House announced that President Obama would visit Cuba in March.

MEDICC Urges Executive Actions to Improve U.S. Health Through Greater Cooperation with Cuba, Medical Education Cooperation with Cuba
MEDICC has released a new white paper titled "A Safer, Healthier Future Through U.S.-Cuba Cooperation" that highlights specific ways in which President Obama can use his executive authority to improve Americans' health through cooperation with Cuba. Proposals include allowing Cuban-developed pharmaceuticals and medicines to be more readily available to American patients, allowing U.S. pharmaceutical and medical companies to test their products in Cuba, expanding Americans' access to healthcare by allowing them to travel to Cuba for treatment, and encouraging greater bilateral cooperation between U.S. and Cuban officials on addressing regional and global health emergencies such as Ebola, Dengue, and Zika.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In Cuba

Patriarch Kirill visits Fidel , Juventud Rebelde, Granma
On February 13, Patriarch Kirill I of the Russian Orthodox Church visited Fidel Castro while on an official visit to Cuba. The two discussed fighting poverty and discrimination, promoting peace and humanitarianism, and applauded positive relations between Russia and Cuba.

Scientific research crucial to development , Orfilio Peláez, Granma
First Vice President Miguel Díaz-Canel has emphasized a need for Cuba to further develop its science and technology programs. Focusing on hard sciences, he believes, is critical to the "construction of a prosperous, sustainable socialist system" and to the preservation of the Cuban revolution's founding principles. Diaz-Canel is believed to be a likely successor to President Raúl Castro when he steps down from power in 2018.

Cuba's Foreign Relations

President of Peru to visit Cuba , Granma
Peru's President Ollanta Humala arrived in Cuba on Thursday for an official state visit to the island. During his visit, he will participate in a wreath-laying memorial service at Cuba's José Martí monument, receive an honorary medal at the Presidential palace, and meet with Cuba's President Raúl Castro to discuss ways in which the two nations can strengthen political, economic, and diplomatic cooperation.

Raúl Castro receives Vice President of Uruguay , Granma
On Tuesday, Cuba's President Raúl Castro met with Raúl Sendic Rodríguez, Vice President of Uruguay, on an official visit to Cuba. The meeting was a productive and "positive" opportunity for the two officials to discuss both bilateral and broader international issues. There was a particular focus on increasing regional integration, strengthening parliamentary ties, and augmenting Cuba's technical and medical assistance to Uruguay.

Until next time,

The Cuba Central Team

Like our work? Consider a monthly donation!

The Cuba Central Newsblast is produced by the Center for Democracy in the Americas (CDA). CDA is devoted to changing U.S. policy toward Cuba and the other countries of the Americas by basing our relations on mutual respect, fostering dialogue with those governments and movements with which U.S. policy is at odds, and recognizing positive trends in democracy and governance. For more information, check out the CDA website . You can also like us on Facebook or follow us on Twitter .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

See what's happening on our social sites

, PO Box 53106, Washington, DC 20009

SafeUnsubscribe™ john.podesta@gmail.com

Forward this email | Update Profile | About our service provider

Sent by sarah@democracyinamericas.org in collaboration with

Try it free today

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Emily Klein" <emily@flextimeglobal.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 4/7/2015 1:59:04 PM
Subject: Re: Met at Kafe Leopold in Georgetown

Thanks John, appreciate your note back. Looking forward to seeing how the next few weeks/months unfold and absolutely will stay in touch.

-Emily

On Mon, Apr 6, 2015 at 10:14 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:

> Thank you for your extremely thoughtful note. You have set a high bar, but I think it is very fair to judge her on whether she answers the questions you have posed. I am confident that she will address those questions and I hope to your satisfaction. As the next few weeks and months roll along, I hope you will stay in touch and let me know whether we have cleared the bar.
> John
>
> JP
> --Sent from my iPad--
> john.podesta@gmail.com
> For scheduling: eryn.sepp@gmail.com
>
> On Apr 6, 2015, at 10:47 AM, Emily Klein <emily@flextimeglobal.com > wrote:
>
> John,
>
> We met the week before last at Kafe Leopold in Georgetown as I was en route back to Boston. I was sitting with two colleagues next to your table when I noticed you were there having lunch with Donna Shalala. Thank you for your willingness to connect and share your email address with me.
>
> I've long held an interest in politics, spent a decade living and working in DC after graduate study at GW, as I had mentioned, in public policy and public administration. I am a registered Independent voter, voted for Obama in the last two elections, and also have voted for Republicans in Gubernatorial races here in Massachusetts.
>
> I am excited about the prospect of Hillary running for the presidency again, yet as a middle-aged (47) professional, I'm not yet convinced she is my candidate. For the first time in my voting history, I know that my vote cast will not be based on gender or social issues alone. Yet at the same time, when my 8 year old daughter turned to me last year to say it would be great to see Hillary the first woman president, I had to agree if for no other reason than seeing in her young eyes the hope and possibility that a statement like that could reveal.
>
> In preparation for a campaign announcement and the months ahead, what I wanted to share with you are a few perspectives on things I believe the Hillary campaign strategy should address:
>
> Congruence:
>
> Hillary is a historical figure, a woman with phenomenal accomplishments, but presents in public with a lot of incongruity. For example, in terms of income inequality, how can Hillary project empathy and humility when the majority of her life, at least the last 25+ years of it, was spent in the 1%? Given campaign finance her relationships with Wall St is understood. Yet what does it mean to have these relationships and campaign for closing the income inequality gap? In what ways will Hillary's goals about addressing income inequality be innovative, realistic and actionable? In what ways can they include Wall St. banks?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

How can Hillary's campaign platform focus on advancing women and children's issues when the Clinton Foundation receives donations from countries with blatant disregard for women's rights? In what ways can she explain this publicly and authentically without political spin?

Purple:

The ability to reach across party lines and strive for bipartisanship is a worthy ideal despite the polarizing environment that occupies Washington. Emphasizing how Hillary will work with the Republican congress going forward is as essential as showcasing ways she has done this in the past. What are her views on defense, immigration and healthcare that are not entirely in lock step with President Obama's, for example? How can that appeal to the Independent voter that does not vote party line?

Foreign Policy

Foreign policy is a top campaign issue for 2016. Many Americans have been disturbed about Obama's foreign policy missteps, and have not felt safer in an increasingly dangerous world rife with radical Islamic extremists. The general sentiment about President Obama's earlier statements on ISIS (J.V team, not having a strategy to combat it, not using the verbiage radical Islamists) left the American voting public uneasy about the ability of the Democratic party to execute a muscular approach to military and diplomatic affairs. While I thought the NYT article yesterday on the Obama Doctrine was excellent, many Americans remain skeptical about a successful Iranian deal that cuts off pathways to nuclear weapons with a country unlikely to loosen its grip on extreme religious ideology, the form that teaches hate and destruction to its youngest citizens and sponsors terrorism.

Hillary's depth of knowledge related to world affairs and foreign policy should include a strategy for communicating a forward thinking geopolitical vision in ways that present her unique strengths. This foreign policy strategy needs to convince the voting public why Hillary, why now, (in part, by compare to Obama) and to her Republican challengers who will do everything to associate her with past missteps and perceived party weaknesses.

Engagement

Thriving companies in the private sector are focused on increasing transparency, flattening hierarchies and encouraging employee engagement.

How can Hillary create a digital campaign to engage US citizens in a large-scale dialogue that's unique: social media, video, crowd-sourcing ideas, online events? Engaging the hearts and minds of the American voters in 2015-2016 should be an exercise in transparency, collaboration and one that goes beyond party platform, beyond label and beyond gender alone.

John, thank you for taking the time to read this (long!) note. If there's a chance for us to meet, either here in the Boston/New England region or in Washington DC, I'd be excited by the opportunity to discuss campaign strategy with you further, especially around ways that will appeal to voters beyond the base.

Sincerely,

Emily

--
Emily Klein

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Flextime Global
emily@flextimeglobal.com
Mobile: 617.599.9550
LinkedIn | @flextimeglobal

Co-Author of Workshift: Future-Proof Your Organization for the 21st Century (Palgrave Macmillan, 2013)
Transforming Organizations From The Inside Out

--

Emily Klein
Flextime Global
emily@flextimeglobal.com
Mobile: 617.599.9550
LinkedIn | @flextimeglobal

Co-Author of Workshift: Future-Proof Your Organization for the 21st Century (Palgrave Macmillan, 2013)
Transforming Organizations From The Inside Out

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <ctrfriendsfamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 8/24/2014 7:43:24 AM
Subject: CTR Sunday August 24, 2014 Roundup

HAPPY, BEAUTIFUL SUNDAY TO ALL... WHEREVER YOU MAY BE...

Correct The Record Sunday August 24, 2014 Roundup:

Headlines:

Associated Press: "Democrats adopt 2016 presidential primary calendar"

"Leaders of the Democratic Party adopted their 2016 presidential nominating calendar on Saturday, setting the stage for a successor to President Barack Obama."

The Daily Beast: "Political Mythbusting: Third Term's The Charm"

[Subtitle:] "Despite assertions otherwise, Americans are probably pretty OK with giving a party a third term in the White House."

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Paul: Clinton too much of a 'war hawk'"

"Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) said in an interview broadcast Sunday that Hillary Clinton is too much of a 'war hawk' to be elected president in 2016."

Politico blog: Politico Live: "Paul: Dems afraid I will run in 2016"

"Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul said Democrats are afraid his stance on war and foreign policy would attract independents and 'even some Democrats' if he were to run against Hillary Clinton in 2016."

Des Moines Register column: Kathie Obradovich: "Importance of Clinton's visit is not baloney"

"This appearance can, however, serve as the strictly unspoken launch of Hillary Clinton's campaign for the Iowa caucuses. By that, I mean Clinton could go a long way toward laying to rest questions about her relationship with Iowa after coming in third in the 2008 caucuses."

Articles:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Associated Press: “Democrats adopt 2016 presidential primary calendar”

By Ken Thomas

August 23, 2014

ATLANTA (AP) - Leaders of the Democratic Party adopted their 2016 presidential nominating calendar on Saturday, setting the stage for a successor to President Barack Obama.

The Democratic National Committee, or DNC, approved rules for its 2016 convention along with a primary schedule that will begin with the Iowa caucuses on Feb. 1, 2016, followed by voting later that month in New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina. The 2016 framework is in line with plans pushed by Republicans and gives states incentives to hold their primary contests between March and June, aiming to avoid a front-loaded calendar that encroaches on the Christmas holidays.

Pointing to the 2016 national meeting, DNC Chairwoman Debbie Wasserman Schultz predicted it will be the convention where "we will nominate the 45th president of the United States of America." The plans were approved unanimously without any discussion.

A year-and-a-half before the start of presidential primary voting, Hillary Rodham Clinton remains the favorite among Democrats if she decides to run for president again while Vice President Joe Biden, Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and others could potentially mount a campaign to succeed Obama.

The Democrats' plan recommends that the New Hampshire primary be held on Feb. 9, followed by the Nevada caucuses on Feb. 20 and the South Carolina primary on Feb. 27. Other states could hold their contests from March 1 through the second Tuesday in June.

The DNC decision does not set in stone the 2016 primary schedule but discourages states from trying to jump ahead in the calendar. In the past two presidential election cycles, Democrats and Republicans have scheduled the early contests for February but then allowed them to take place in January after states such as Florida and Michigan violated the party's rules and moved up their voting.

Among Democrats, there has been little discussion thus far of states trying to move ahead in the calendar. Like the party did in 2012, the plan awards bonus delegates to states that agree to hold their primary contests later in the spring.

It includes a reduction in the number of base delegates who will attend the 2016 convention. The plans for 3,200 delegates, down from 3,700 in 2012, will give the party more flexibility in choosing a convention site.

Party leaders and elected officials also serve as delegates, so with the allotment of bonus delegates to states, the total number of delegates could be about 5,000, down slightly from the more than 5,500 delegates who attended the Charlotte, North Carolina, convention in 2012.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrats are considering five cities for their 2016 convention: Birmingham, Alabama; Columbus, Ohio; New York; Philadelphia and Phoenix. DNC officials will make its final site visit to Phoenix next month and a decision on the winning bid is expected later this year or in early 2015.

Republicans are holding their 2016 convention in Cleveland beginning either June 27 or July 18. The DNC plan calls for states to complete the selection of convention delegates by June 25, 2016, meaning the convention could be staged in July, shortly after the GOP event.

Party officials also approved a resolution on the need to strengthen bonds between the public and police, end racial profiling and demilitarize police in the aftermath of the deadly police shooting subsequent protests in Ferguson, Mo.

The meeting came as Democrats try to break a Republican stronghold in Georgia, where recent population shifts have given the party hopes of winning statewide races and turning Georgia into a competitive state in presidential elections. Democrats are bullish about Senate candidate Michelle Nunn, who faces Republican David Perdue in a race to succeed retiring Republican Sen. Saxby Chambliss.

Jason Carter, the grandson of former President Jimmy Carter, is challenging GOP Gov. Nathan Deal in a closely watched gubernatorial race. Carter met with party leaders during the three-day meeting and addressed the College Democrats of America on Saturday, pointing to young voters as a key factor in his campaign.

"As this electorate gets younger, we will win," said Carter.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: “Paul: Clinton too much of a ‘war hawk’”

By Keith Laing

August 24, 2014, 11:34 a.m. EDT

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) said in an interview broadcast Sunday that Hillary Clinton is too much of a “war hawk” to be elected president in 2016.

“I think that’s what scares the Democrats the most is that in a general election, were I to run, there’s going to be a lot of independents and even some Democrats who say we are tired of war, we’re worried that Hillary Clinton is going to get us into another Middle Eastern war because she’s so gung ho,” Paul said during an interview on NBC’s “Meet The Press.”

“If you want to see a transformational election in our country, let the Democrats put forward a war hawk like Hillary Clinton and you’ll see a transformation like you’ve never see,” Paul continued.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Critics in the Republican and Democratic parties have criticized Paul's previous stances as isolationist and argued that his views would not play well in a potential 2016 election.

However, Paul said Sunday that he was confident he could appeal to voters if he decided to run for president.

"I think the American public is coming closer to where I am," he said.

Paul discussed the 2016 presidential election during a recent trip to Guatemala to perform eye surgery.

He denied the decision to travel overseas was intended to boost his profile for the upcoming campaign.

"I've been doing this kind of stuff for 20 years," Paul said. "Physician is who I am. To represent who I am, that's who I am. I'm a physician. Depicting who I am I think is an important part of presenting a face to the public."

Politico blog: Politico Live: "Paul: Dems afraid I will run in 2016"

By Lucy McCalmont

August 24, 2014, 12:17 p.m. EDT

Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul said Democrats are afraid his stance on war and foreign policy would attract independents and "even some Democrats" if he were to run against Hillary Clinton in 2016.

"I think the American public is coming more and more to where I am and that those people, like Hillary Clinton, who—she fought her own war, 'Hillary's war,' you know?" Paul said in an interview that aired Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press."

He continued, "And I think that's what scares the Democrats the most: is that in a general election, were I to run, there's going to be a lot of independents and even some Democrats who say, 'You know what? We are tired of war. We're worried that Hillary Clinton will get us involved in another Middle Eastern war because she's so gung-ho.'"

The Kentucky Republican, a widely-speculated contender for the GOP ticket in 2016, said the election would be "transformative" if Clinton runs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“If you want to see a transformational election in our country, let the Democrats put forward a war hawk like Hillary Clinton, and you’ll see a transformation like you’ve never seen," Paul said.

Des Moines Register column: Kathie Obradovich: “Importance of Clinton’s visit is not baloney”

By Kathie Obradovich, Des Moines Register political columnist

August 23, 2014, 11:02 CDT

Here’s my first prediction about Hillary Clinton’s eagerly anticipated return to Iowa: Her speech at the Harkin Steak Fry will be shorter than Bill’s.

OK, that’s an easy one. The former president has never been known for brevity. Besides, it probably won’t matter much what Hillary actually says in Iowa. The mere fact of her presence in the state that kicks off the presidential nomination process will whip up a Sharknado of 2016 speculation.

Speculation may be the wrong word for what seems like solidifying certainty. Former Iowa Democratic Chairwoman Sue Dvorsky noted that by coming to Iowa now, Hillary is “laying down a marker.”

“I do think six months ago, there was an actual question about whether or not she was going to run,” Dvorsky said. “And now, what does she say to everybody is, no, there is no question. And I think that has been put on the table.”

Jerry Crawford, a longtime Democratic activist and an organizer of the Ready for Hillary super-PAC, says he does not see the Clintons’ Iowa trip as any sort of declaration of candidacy. “I don’t think there’s any indication the Clintons view this as any kind of a campaign kickoff, but her supporters surely do,” Crawford said. “And there are thousands and thousands that have been generated through the organizing that Ready for Hillary has done.”

Ready for Hillary is a draft movement that is not affiliated with any campaign organization that Clinton may form.

Crawford said Clinton’s supporters will come out to see her and likely be motivated to campaign for Democrats in 2014. “It’s not as if we’ve put any of these races away, so to speak, and every bit of enthusiasm is crucial.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton has been clear she won't announce her plans until 2015. Even if that weren't the case, she would not deliberately steal the thunder, lightning and every raindrop from the tribute to retiring Sen. Tom Harkin. The Sept. 14 event is the final steak-fry fundraiser for Iowa's long-serving senator. Any statements of 2016 will be strictly under the umbrella of coy jokes.

"She served in the Senate with Tom Harkin, the Harkins and Clintons are friends, and I think it's honoring Tom Harkin's legacy more than anything," said Scott Brennan, Iowa Democratic Party chairman.

This appearance can, however, serve as the strictly unspoken launch of Hillary Clinton's campaign for the Iowa caucuses. By that, I mean Clinton could go a long way toward laying to rest questions about her relationship with Iowa after coming in third in the 2008 caucuses.

She and the former president can do that in part by fondly recalling the people and places they encountered in Iowa. "She made a lot of friends during that cycle and if she ultimately decides to run for president, she'll have a lot of friends who have remained in Iowa," Brennan said. That's a point both Clintons can easily drive home at the steak fry.

Some will say that Clinton's nomination is as inevitable as straw bales on stage in Indianola. She doesn't have to worry about Iowa, they say. The Iowa caucuses, however, ensure that anyone who wants to challenge the establishment candidate has a voice. Any candidate who arrives in Iowa with a sense of entitlement will get burned faster than the beef on Harkin's grill.

Luckily for Clinton, the steak fry is a perfect opportunity to show she's willing to put in the effort it takes in Iowa. She can do that by spending plenty of time meeting and talking to Iowans, shaking their hands and signing their T-shirts and posing for photos. One experienced Democrat told me last week the biggest mistake Clinton made in Iowa in 2008 was allowing her natural talent as a grass-roots campaigner to be walled off in consultant-driven bubble.

Stories such as campaign aides planting questions in town hall meetings, as we saw in 2007, are examples of how Clinton was overly scripted and shielded. Yet, when she visited The Des Moines Register for an editorial board meeting, she took the time to shake hands with every person in the newsroom.

That's the Hillary Clinton who needs to show up in Iowa in 2015.

The good news is, Hillary can do that even if Bill never gives up the microphone.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Clinton vs. Warren: Where they disagree"

By Megan R. Wilson

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

August 24, 2014, 9:00 a.m. EDT

There are five major policy areas that shed daylight between Hillary Clinton and Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.).

Clinton is expected to run for president in 2016, but some on the left are pining for Warren to launch a bid. The Massachusetts senator has repeatedly denied she is interested in running for the White House. However, her recent campaign stumping for Democratic candidates — as well as a planned trip to Israel — have stoked the 2016 speculation.

Clinton and Warren do agree on some issues, but on a variety of issues, their policies clash.

Expanding social security

During her 2008 presidential bid, Clinton was relatively non-committal about reforms to the Social Security program while Warren has not minced words.

“Seniors have worked their entire lives and have paid into the system, but right now, more people than ever are on the edge of financial disaster once they retire — and the numbers continue to get worse,” she said last November.

“That is why we should be talking about expanding Social Security benefits — not cutting them. Social Security is incredibly effective, it is incredibly popular, and the calls for strengthening it are growing louder every day.”

Clinton has been more coy on the issue of entitlements. She said in 2007 that certain reforms such as cutting benefits, privatizing the program or raising the retirement age were “off the table.” There were some articles at the time that gave mixed signals on whether she would be willing to increase payroll taxes.

One account from the Associated Press featured a conversation between a campaigning Clinton and an Iowa voter in which the candidate said she might consider committing more of workers' income to Social Security.

“She told him she didn't want to put an additional tax burden on the middle class but would consider a ‘gap,’ with no Social Security taxes on income from $97,500 to around $200,000. Anything above that could be taxed,” according to the article. The idea was similar to then-Democratic presidential candidate John Edwards, who was seen as to the left of Clinton.

Back then, workers paid taxes toward Social Security on their first $97,500 in earnings — any earnings above that remain untaxed. (Now that amount stands at $117,000.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ultimately, Clinton officially shied away from the increase in taxes, and stuck with official comments that revolved around improving the economy overall.

“We need to get back to the fiscal responsibility that we had in the 1990s, when we weren't draining the Social Security fund any more,” she said.

Surveillance programs

During the promotional tour for her book “Hard Choices,” Clinton stood behind the U.S. surveillance programs and criticized former government contractor Edward Snowden for leaking sensitive information.

Most of what Snowden disclosed, she said, “concerned the surveillance that the United States undertakes, totally legally, against other nations.”

While she has backed reforms to “make sure that it doesn’t go too far,” Clinton told NPR that “collecting information about what's going around the world is essential to our security.”

“There were other ways that Mr. Snowden could have expressed his concerns,” such as reaching out to Congress, Clinton continued.

“I think everyone would have applauded that because it would have added to the debate that was already started. Instead, he left the country — first to China, then to Russia — taking with him a huge amount of [sensitive] information,” she said, adding that during her trips to Russia, she would leave all electronics on the State Department plane with the batteries out to prevent hacking.

Warren would like to end the bulk-collection of phone records, which is authorized by Section 215 of the USA Patriot Act and set to expire June 1, 2015.

Even though Warren praised the Obama’s administration’s reforms of its surveillance apparatus earlier this year, she said they might not go far enough.

“Congress must go further to protect the right to privacy, to end the NSA's dragnet surveillance of ordinary Americans, to make the intelligence community more transparent and accountable,” Warren said.

Bankruptcy reform

In the Senate, Clinton voted for an overhaul to the bankruptcy system that would have made debt forgiveness more difficult for borrowers to obtain. She said in 2008 that she regretted the vote, but it still could become a sticking point, as it did when she faced off with then-Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The credit card lobby pushed hard for the legislation, which did not prevail when Clinton voted for it in 2001, but did become law after another attempt by Congress in 2005. (Clinton did not vote in that round, telling reporters she missed the vote to be with Bill Clinton after his heart surgery.)

"The right kind of reform is necessary," Clinton said in a press release about the legislation in 2001. "We're on our way toward that goal, and I hope we can achieve final passage of a good bankruptcy reform bill this year"

During her initial presidential campaign, she said she would have voted against the 2005 bill that eventually passed.

Warren specialized in bankruptcy law and personal-finance issues while teaching at Harvard Law School. She had been published and widely quoted in national media before becoming a big player on the Washington scene in 2008 as chair of the Congressional Oversight Panel, a watchdog panel that oversaw the economic stimulus.

In 2006, Warren blasted the new law as ineffective at curbing fraud, which was the impetus for its passage.

"The new laws will drive up the costs for debtors and shrink the protection available, but that doesn't necessarily mean that fewer people in trouble will turn to bankruptcy," she told the Atlanta-Journal Constitution.

Free-trade agreements

Within the populist Democratic movement, there is a rising tide against once-popular trade deals connecting the U.S. with foreign lands. Clinton has been involved with many of the pacts from her time as first lady, in the Senate and finally, as part of the Obama administration.

Clinton saw herself in the middle of the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) during her husband's presidency. She supported deals with Oman, Chile and Singapore during her tenure in the Senate. As secretary of State, she was a chief advocate as talks commenced surrounding the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP), one of the largest worldwide deals in recent history.

Many proponents of the agreements argue that negotiations need to take place in secret in order to protect the fragile interests of participating countries. This has not sat well with public interest groups and more liberal members of the Democratic Party, including Warren.

Last year, she went to far as to vote against Obama's then-nominee for the head of the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative, Michael Froman, because of that lack of transparency as the 10 countries involved in the TPP discuss terms.

"I have heard the argument that transparency would undermine the Trade Representative's policy to complete the trade agreement because public opposition would be significant," she said in a floor speech. "In other words, if people knew what was going on, they would stop it. This argument is exactly backwards. If transparency would lead to widespread public opposition to a trade agreement, then that trade agreement should not be the policy of the United States."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At the State Department, Clinton didn't address specifics in the negotiating process, but told attendees at an Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) forum conference that she hoped it would "create a new high standard for multilateral free trade."

Critics have said that the agreement would ease regulations protecting both laborers and the environment, despite claims from Clinton to the contrary.

"Our goal for TPP is to create not just more growth, but better growth. We believe the TPP needs to include strong protections for workers, the environment, intellectual property, and innovation," Clinton said at the event in 2011. "It should also promote the free flow of information technology and the spread of green technology, as well as the coherence of our regulatory system and the efficiency of supply chains."

Glass-Steagall

Warren has long positioned herself as an adversary to large financial institutions, questioning why they hadn't brought bankers who had been partially responsible for the financial downturn to trial. Last year, she introduced legislation that would reinstate Glass-Steagall, the Depression-era law that created a firewall between commercial and investment banking and was repealed during the Clinton administration.

"We should not accept a financial system that allows the biggest banks to emerge from a crisis in record-setting shape while working Americans continue to struggle," Warren said at an event in 2013.

The financial services industry fought against Warren's idea of creating the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau (CFPB). It also made clear it would oppose any move to have her run the bureau.

Clinton, meanwhile, has been painted by critics as beholden to Wall Street, giving paid speeches at events sponsored by banking executives and maintaining ties with former officials who had been more laissez-faire with financial regulatory policy. As a senator from New York, bankers had been Clinton's constituents and largest donors.

Politico: "Sarah Palin does ice-bucket challenge"

By Lucy McCalmont

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

August 23, 2014, 6:45 p.m. EDT

Sarah Palin became the latest politician to accept the ALS ice bucket challenge, posting a video to her Facebook page Saturday and challenging both Hillary Clinton and Sen. John McCain.

“Of course I accept. You know what though? I’m too old for this. Really. And don’t you guys think — c’mon — at this stage of my life, in my career, aren’t I a little too prim and proper for all that ice bucket water dump thing?” the former vice presidential candidate said, adding that her daughter Piper participated and “took care” of the cold water part.

Instead Palin said she was going to write a check, doubling the original amount.

“Then I’m going to show you what my ice bucket is tonight,” Palin said before adding ice to a glass and drinking Diet Dr. Pepper.

“Now, I get to challenge someone, right? I challenge Hillary Clinton, and he whom she has recently said is her favorite Republican. He is my friend, I also challenge Sen. John McCain. Cheers,” Palin said, lifting her glass and ultimately getting drenched with a bucket of ice water.

Palin was challenged by the owners of Wasilla Arctic Cat, a snow mobile dealer, to pour a bucket of iced water over her head as part of a charity campaign that has swept social media, raising awareness of Lou Gehrig’s disease.

The Daily Beast: “Political Mythbusting: Third Term's The Charm”

By Jeff Greenfield

August 24, 2014

[Subtitle:] Despite assertions otherwise, Americans are probably pretty OK with giving a party a third term in the White House.

We were reminded once again this week — by The New York Times’ estimable John Harwood — of one of those “rules” that will govern the next Presidential race. In writing of the midterm elections’ impact on the 2016 campaign,—suggesting that a GOP Senate takeover might benefit a Hillary Clinton run — Harwood writes: “American voters have demonstrated their reluctance to award the same political party a third consecutive term in the White House.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Measured by a glance at recent history, that's true. But (as NFL officials put it) on further review, there's a whole lot less than meets the eye. What the record really shows is just how much the fate of the Presidency is governed by the vagaries of chance.

For much of our political history, the "third term" curse was non-existent. During the Republican ascendancy that began with Lincoln's election in 1860, the party won six straight elections (although it did take some highly sketchy maneuvering in 1876). Later, the White House passed from McKinley to Theodore Roosevelt to Taft, and then from Harding to Coolidge to Hoover. FDR and Harry Truman combined to keep the Presidency in Democratic hands for twenty consecutive years. (Coincidentally or not, in all of these streaks, the death of a President brought a new occupant to the White House.)

The "reluctance" Harwood points to didn't really begin until 1960. As he puts it: "The combination of fatigue with the incumbent party and rejuvenation by its opposition helped stymie Richard M. Nixon when he sought to succeed Dwight D. Eisenhower in 1960 and Hubert H. Humphrey when he tried to follow Lyndon B. Johnson eight years later. Al Gore lost in 2000 despite President Clinton's high approval rating and economic record." In this last half-century plus, only George H.W. Bush was able to win a third term for his party. (Note: in every case, the nominee was the sitting vice-president — a stark reminder of how much more important that office has become in recent decades.)

This account looks convincing — until it's subjected to a closer look.

* In 1960, Nixon lost to John Kennedy by less than two-tenths of 1 percent of the popular vote. In fact, given the highly creative vote counting methods in Illinois and (even more so) in Texas, and the fact that some of Alabama's votes went to a slate of un-pledged electors, it's not at all clear that JFK won the popular vote at all. In several states — Illinois, New Jersey, Minnesota, Hawaii, the spread was barely 1 percent or less.

* In 1968, Nixon beat Hubert Humphrey by seven-tenths of 1 percent of the popular vote; some pollsters argued that, had the election happened a day or two later, Humphrey might well have won. Further, history strongly suggests, may well have been shaped by the Nixon campaign's role in sabotaging a Vietnam peace accord. (See, for example, "Chasing Shadows: The Nixon Tapes, the Chennault Affair, and the Origins of Watergate" by Ken Hughes, which argues that Nixon operative Anna Chennault convinced the South Vietnamese government that it would do better to wait for a Nixon Presidency before agreeing to terms.)

* In 2000 — well, perhaps we need not revisit the campaign in which Al Gore won half a million more votes than George W. Bush, and in which a one-vote Supreme Court majority sanctioned a Bush victory in Florida by 537 votes out of some six million cast. (If you look more broadly, the center-left candidates — Gore and Ralph Nader — out-polled the center-right candidates — Bush and Pat Buchanan — by some three million votes.)

Viewed through this prism, the idea of an American electorate "reluctant" to give a third straight White House term to a political party looks far less convincing, and far more the product of highly "contingent" events. Indeed, the only recent example where voters clearly rejected a third term for the incumbent party was 2008—when a collapsing economy and the Iraq misadventure doomed John McCain's hopes of succeeding George W. Bush. And it's certainly possible that a continued fall in Obama's approval ratings will prove a burden to Hillary Clinton or any other Democrat in 2016.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As for the other recent examples: better pre-debate makeup in 1960, a few days more campaigning in 1968, different ballot designs in a few Florida counties in 2000, and we might be pointing to the voters' willingness, even eagerness, to grant a third term to the party in power. As it is, whatever worries will keep the next Democratic nominee up at night, that "third term curse" should not be one of them.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· August 24 – Westhampton, NY: Sec. Clinton signs "Hard Choices" at Books & Books (hillaryclintonmemoir.com)

· August 28 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton keynotes Nexenta's OpenSDx Summit (BusinessWire)

· September 4 – Las Vegas, NV: Sec. Clinton speaks at the National Clean Energy Summit (Solar Novis Today)

· September 9 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton fundraises for the DSCC at her Washington home (DSCC)

· September 14 – Indianola, IA: Sec. Clinton headlines Sen. Harkin's Steak Fry (LA Times)

· October ? – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton fundraises for House Democratic women candidates with Nancy Pelosi (The Hill)

· October 2 – Miami Beach, FL: Sec. Clinton keynotes the CREW Network Convention & Marketplace (CREW Network)

· October 13 – Las Vegas, NV: Sec. Clinton keynotes the UNLV Foundation Annual Dinner (UNLV)

· October 14 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton keynotes salesforce.com Dreamforce conference (salesforce.com)

· December 4 – Boston, MA: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Massachusetts Conference for Women (MCFW)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Jacob Roberts" <jacob@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 7/30/2008 3:08:04 PM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Evening 07/30/08

Main Topics: McCain runs new attack ad, McCain's shifty tax stance, Fancy Pants

Summary of Shift: Top McCain news this evening continued to revolve around his contradictory statements on what tax options are on the table and his new celebrity ad against Obama. Disgraced Alaska senator, Ted Stevens' scandal is still a prominent issue, reaching into a second night of close coverage. Harry Reid offers an opportunity votes on oil drilling, then rescinds offer. Israel's prime minister vows to step down in two months once his party chooses a successor.

Highlights
1) McCain's 'celeb' ad
   a. ABC: Former McCain aide calls new ad 'childish'
   b. NBC: 'Celeb' ad aimed to exploit class divisions
   c. CBS: One journalist predicts the new ad will backfire
   2) MSNBC: Bush pushes for offshore drilling
3) MSNBC: McCain supporter ducks frank question on McCain tax platform
4) CNN: McCain wears unnecessarily fancy shoes

No clips
1) MSNBC – DAVID GREGORY: "There was the claim you remember, in an ad earlier this week by McCain that Obama snubbed wounded soldiers in Germany, because he decided he couldn't bring cameras with him. Well that has been de-bunked by reporters who were traveling with Obama as well as denied by the Obama team itself."

Clips
Highlight #1
ABC's World News Tonight Opens with Candidate Mud-Slinging (ABC 07/30/08 6:30pm)
CHARLES GIBSON: It is a pledge made by every candidate in every campaign, to run on the issues and avoid negative attacks. Just last month, John McCain pledged that, throughout the campaign, he would show his admiration and respect for senator Obama. As for Obama, he pledged to run a different campaign; run a positive campaign. Well, that was then. Today, the fact attacks were flying so fast and furious, it was sometimes hard to keep up. […]

DAVID WRIGHT: […] The mud has, indeed, been flying. With Obama constantly comparing McCain to president Bush and today, McCain comparing Obama to empty celebrities, all sizzle, no substance. John McCain has been trying to raise doubts about his opponent. Today in Colorado, he was at it again.

JOHN MCCAIN: The bottom line is that Senator Obama's words, for all their eloquence and passion, don't mean all that much.

WRIGHT: McCain has recently said Obama would rather lose a war to win an election. He's called him Dr. No on energy reforms and run ads blaming Obama for high gas prices.

MCCAIN COMMERCIAL: He's the biggest celebrity in the world, but is he ready to lead?

WRIGHT: Today, McCain unveiled a new ad in 11 states, flashing images of Britney Spears and Paris Hilton, suggesting Obama is just another vapid celebrity.

MCCAIN COMMERCIAL: Higher taxes, more foreign oil. That's the real Obama.

STUART ROTHENBERG: Nobody's going to confuse Paris Hilton with Senator Barack Obama, but over time, the attempt to raise questions about his substance, that could very well work.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WRIGHT: The Obama campaign dismissed the ad as more of his steady stream of false negative attacks, or some might say, "Oops, he did it again."

BARACK OBAMA: We don't need the same, old, tired answers. What we need is something new.

WRIGHT: Obama told an audience in Missouri, the republicans are just trying to scare voters.

BARACK OBAMA: Their argument is, 'I know you don't like what we're doing, but he's risky.'

WRIGHT: A McCain spokesman shot back, 'This is a typically superfluous response from Barack Obama. Like most celebrities, he reacts to fair criticism with a mix of fussiness and hysteria.' Today, the McCain side released a memo noting, among other things, Obama's fondness for chocolate protein bars, black forest berry Honest Tea, and arugula.

In other words, high-maintenance like any big star, but Obama supporters are having none of it. Today, they called attention to the shoes McCain has worn on stops throughout the rust belt. Italian calfskin loafers that retail for $520 a pair. Late today, the Obama campaign responded to McCain's celebrity ad with a new ad of their own.

OBAMA COMMERCIAL: "False." "Baloney." "Baseless." John McCain, same old politics. Same failed policies.

WRIGHT: It's getting ugly early and some republicans are expressing concern about McCain's tone. In particular, one former McCain aide calling the new celebrity ad childish. The McCain campaign insists that Obama went negative first. Charlie.

GIBSON: […] There are still 97 days to go until election day. I suppose it could get worse. […]

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS: You think it's going to get worst, Charlie?

GIBSON: We're arguing about what teas people thing and shoes candidates wear. First of all, […] John McCain. What's the McCain strategy with these kinds of accusations, I guess, about Obama?

STEPHANOPOULOS: I think the strategy behind it is recognizing one fundamental fact about the campaign. Right now this, campaign is about Barack Obama. He is getting all the attention. He is the candidate voters are focused on and the McCain strategy is to define him before he can define himself and there is a tradition of this, Charlie.

Go back to 1988. Republicans put Michael Dukakis, the democratic candidate, in a tank. In 2004, remember that ad of John Kerry, when he was windsurfing, showing him as a flip-flopper. In each of those cases, the idea was to show that the democratic candidate is not one of us, is not a regular guy. They're trying to do the same thing now to Barack Obama, by comparing him to Britney Spears and Paris Hilton.

GIBSON: And what to the Obama people, and Obama himself, I guess, think of all this? and how do they intend to respond?

STEPHANOPOULOS: They scoff. They say first of all this, is a more serious time, than 1988 or 2004. We're a country at war. The economy's in the doldrums. People don't want to hear this kind of stuff.

They're also going to say that this is just John McCain being negative. He's got nothing positive to say. I think the big question here, is when voters see that ad, do they see it captures something essential about Barack Obama's character? Or do they think it's just a ridiculous caricature?

NBC Nightly News Leads with McCain Celeb Attack Ad (NBC 07/30/08 7:01pm)
BRIAN WILLIAMS: We have 98 days to go until the presidential election in this country. That means 98 days worth of promises from both candidates to keep the debate lofty and civil and, while they may say that, it's just as likely that both campaigns will keep putting TV ads on the air, tearing each other apart.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The latest ad to do that comes from the McCain campaign. It features two, young Hollywood starlets more famous for their public embarrassments than their public policy views. What do they have to do with Barack Obama and what about a counter-attack by the Obama campaign? […]

KELLY O'DONNEL: […] What's known as 'defining the opponent' is a critical phase in any presidential campaign and that was unmistakable today as John McCain tried to define, for voters, Barack Obama by mocking a perceived strength, Obama's popularity. In Aurora, CO today, John McCain first tried to avoid being seen as too angry, as his critics claim. So, before going negative on Obama, McCain tried going nice.

JOHN MCCAIN: I applaud his talent and his success and Americans—all Americans should be proud of his accomplishment.

O'DONNELL: With that said, McCain's campaign rolled out a TV ad about Obama they call, 'celeb.'

MCCAIN COMMERCIAL: He's the biggest celebrity in the world, but is he ready to lead?

O'DONNELL: Yes, you did see pop culture stars, Paris Hilton and Britney Spears alongside the democratic candidate.

COMMERCIAL: Higher taxes, more foreign oil. That's the real Obama.

O'DONNELL: Next, the campaign issued a memo, making this claim: [image of Rick Davis appears in corner of screen] 'Like most worldwide celebrities, this status has fueled a certain arrogance.' Today in Missouri, Barack Obama said he pays little attention to McCain ads.

BARACK OBAMA: He seems to only be talking about me. You need to ask John McCain what he's for, not just what he's against.

O'DONNELL: Arguing McCain has made a series of negative attacks, the Obama campaign could not resist playing off a Britney Spears hit song. As some might say, "Oops! He did it again." Team McCain maintains that Obama was first to run a negative spot, hitting McCain on TV three weeks ago.

OBAMA COMMERCIAL: On gas prices, John McCain's part of the problem.

O'DONNELL: Today McCain also tried to define himself, invoking the label, 'maverick,' and making an appeal to independents, expected to decide this race.

JOHN MCCAIN: I don't work for a party. I don't work for a president. I don't work for a special interest and I don't work for myself. I work for you and the country that we love.

O'DONNELL: And, quick to respond, the Obama campaign fired up the edit room and put together a spot they say will perhaps be on the air as early as tonight. It responds to the ad that you just saw and it will use some clips out of newspaper articles that will say that McCain has been negative and even, at times, false in his attacks on Obama.

WILLIAMS: […] What's at work here?

CHUCK TODD: Pretty simple, Brian. They simply want to paint Barack Obama as an elitist, sort of a bi-coastal elitist. He's got celebrity status. He may be like Bono or Paris Hilton, but he can't connect and he's not going to appeal to folks in Ohio, in Michigan, in Pennsylvania.

I mean, the McCain campaign feels very positive about this ad, that this is the way to sort of peal away the onion of Obama a little bit and get at this, say, 'Okay we'll run against his popularity and that working class voters in those key, industrial rust belt states will end up saying, you know what? I'm not for some international superstar. I'm for John McCain.'

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WILLIAMS: And that figure we used at the top of the broadcast, for all the campaigning we've all lived through, 98 days now seems awfully close and it strikes me sooner or later these candidates are going to need running mates, what are you hearing on that front?

TODD: […] With John McCain it looks like he's going to wait until after the democratic convention and, I'll tell ya, you really only hear two names: Mitt Romney and Tim Pawlenty out of Minnesota.

McCain's Attack is Likely to Backfire (CBS 07/30/08 6:36pm)
KATIE COURIC: Turning now to the presidential campaign, which today seemed to be ripped from the pages of a celebrity magazine with supporting roles played by Britney Spears and Paris Hilton. John McCain sharpened his attack against Barack Obama, trying to turn his popularity against him and late today, Obama fired back. […]

CHIP REID: Just about everywhere Barack Obama goes the adoring crowds follow. 200,000 turned out to hear him speak last week in Germany. Here at home, his town hall meetings are standing-room only. Political commentators compare him to a rock star. Now the McCain campaign has decided to try to use Obama's celebrity status against him.

MCCAIN COMMERCIAL: He's the biggest celebrity in the world, but is he ready to lead?

REID: Today releasing an ad that compares Obama to those symbols of shallowness, Britney Spears and Paris Hilton. In a conference call today, McCain's topped a visor said the ad is intended to pose a stark choice.

STEVE SCHMIDT: Do the American people want to elect the world's biggest celebrity or do they want to elect an American hero?

REID: Political analyst, David Mark says the ad is sure to get a lot of attention, but do you think the Britney Spears/Paris Hilton ad is going to work for John McCain?

DAVID MARK: No, I think it's going to backfire. John McCain's campaign is predicated on the idea of loyalty, somebody of honor. This seems a little juvenile.

REID: Today the Obama campaign responded with an ad of their own.

OBAMA COMMERCIAL: John McCain, his attacks on Barack Obama: "Not true." "False." "Baloney." "The low road."

REID: Campaigning in Missouri, Obama took the high road.

BARACK OBAMA: You know, I don't pay attention to John McCain's ads. Although I do notice that he doesn't seem to have anything very positive to say about himself, does he? He seems to only be talking about me.

REID: Today an Obama campaign spokesman responded to the McCain attack ad by quoting Britney Spears saying, about McCain, "Oops, he did it again."

Highlight #2
George W. Bush Advocates Lift on Congressional Offshore Drilling Ban (MSNBC 07/30/08 10:59am)
THE PRESIDENT: Good morning. I just finished a good Cabinet meeting, and I want to thank the members of my Cabinet for serving our country. We discussed the challenges facing our economy, amongst other things, and we spent time on the high gasoline prices. Every one of our citizens who drives to work or runs a small business is feeling the squeeze of rising prices at the pump, and they expect their elected leaders in Washington to take some common-sense action.

To reduce pressure on prices, we need to increase the supply of oil -- especially here at home. So in June, I called on Congress to lift the legislative ban that prevents offshore exploration on the Outer Continental Shelf. Unfortunately, Democratic leaders in Congress have refused to allow a vote. And now Congress is about to leave for its August recess without taking any action on this vital priority for the American people.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There is now a growing agreement across our country that the government should permit the exploration and development of these offshore oil resources.

Exploration of the OCS would increase our supply of oil here at home. Experts believe that currently restricted areas of the OCS could eventually produce up to about 18 billion barrels of oil. That's almost 10 years' worth of America's current oil production.

Exploration of the OCS would also create jobs for our citizens. Yesterday, I visited the Lincoln Electric Company in Cleveland, Ohio -- it's a business that produces welding products used for offshore exploration. If Congress were to permit exploration of the OCS, it would mean jobs at businesses such as these. American drivers on -- are counting on Congress to lift the ban on offshore exploration -- and so are American workers.

Bringing OCS resources online is going to take time -- and that means that the need for congressional action is urgent. So I've lifted the executive restrictions on offshore exploration. I've done my part. And that means the only thing now standing now between the American people and these vast oil resources is the United States Congress. The sooner Congress lifts the ban, the sooner we can get this oil from the ocean floor to your gas tank.

Some members of Congress say they object to exploration of the OCS, but they are in favor of other actions -- such as taking oil out of the nation's Strategic Petroleum Reserve. Well, if you agree that we need more oil, it makes no sense to say you're for draining our nation's limited Strategic Reserve, but against tapping into the vast resources of the Outer Continental Shelf.

America needs to take every reasonable and responsible step we can do to reduce pressure on gasoline and energy prices. That's precisely what my administration is doing. We're working to expand domestic oil production. And at the same time, we're working to speed the development of new clean and alternative energy resources. We're raising fuel efficiency standards, expanding the use of alternative fuels, and investing in next-generation fuels such as cellulosic ethanol and biodiesel. We're investing in new advanced batteries, and plug-in hybrids, and hydrogen fuel cells. We're working to expand the use of clean, safe nuclear power, solar and wind power, and clean coal technology. With these steps, we're enhancing America's energy security -- and increasing the supply of clean, safe energy made right here in the United States of America.

The time for action is now. This is a difficult period for millions of American families. Every extra dollar they have to spend because of high gas prices is one less dollar they can use to put food on the table, or to pay the rent, or meet their mortgages. The American people are rightly frustrated by the failure of Democratic leaders in Congress to enact common-sense solutions -- like the development of the oil resources on the Outer Continental Shelf.

There are now just a couple of days left before Congress leaves for its August recess. Legislation to open up this offshore exploration is pending in both the House and the Senate -- all Democratic leaders have to do is allow a vote. They should not leave Washington without doing so.

Thank you very much.

Highlight #3
McCain Supporter, Heather Wilson Avoids Shuster's Challenge to Reconcile Candidates' Contradictory Statements on Taxes (MSNBC 07/30/08 4:18pm)
DAVID SHUSTER: Square [McCain's vow that he won't support a tax increase] with the statement on Sunday when he said, 'Everything would be on the table,' including raising the payroll tax to save social security.

HEATHER WILSON: I think he's made a very clear commitment that he doesn't want to raise taxes.

Highlight #4
Fancy Pants (or Shoes) McCain (CNN 07/30/08 6:55pm)
JEANNIE MOOST: We don't expect John McCain to be on a show string budget when it comes to shoes but 520 dollars Ferragamo calf skin leather loafers? That is right up there in John Edwards 400 dollar hair cut territory...

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MOOST: It wasn't pretty when the liberal Huffington Post style section revealed Loafer Gate...

MOOST: We are guessing maybe the Senator has some help in the shoe shopping department from his fashion plate wife. But wasn't Senator Obama the guy being called in elitist? ...

MOOST: Presidential candidate McCain was spotted wearing his 520 dollar Italian shoes when he met with the Dalai Lama. Though it was hard to notice their feet, what with all the hand holding. The Dalai Lama was wearing sandals. So should they meet again perhaps this simple 275 dollar Prada sandal might work for Senator McCain.

--
Jacob Roberts
PAO
208.420.3470 (c)

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To:	CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date:	12/23/2014 3:13:34 AM
Subject:	Correct The Record Tuesday December 23, 2014 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Tuesday December 23, 2014 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

BuzzFeed: Elizabeth Warren Consistently Not Running For President

"She has said it in newspapers and magazines. She has said it on the radio and on national television. She has said it at public events and book signings; in prepared statements to reporters and in quick exchanges with the press. She has said it four times in a single interview — twice. Since last fall, Elizabeth Warren has said it a total of 49 times. 'I am not running for president.'"

MSNBC: "Hillary Clinton's best and worst moments of 2014"

"Here's a look back at Clinton's ups and downs in 2014."

Washington Post: Dan Balz: "Democrats see rising populist sentiment. But can it shake Hillary Clinton?"

"What rankles many progressives is the possible absence of a genuinely contested battle for the Democratic nomination."

New York Times opinion: Jacob Heilbrunn, National Interest editor: "The Real Threat to Hillary Clinton: Jim Webb"

"If Mrs. Clinton runs, she may face a serious and very different threat: her own foreign policy record."

National Journal: "Nine Questions for Hillary Clinton In 2015"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[Subtitle:] “She'll need to formulate her campaign's message, tap a trusted team of advisers, and take sides on polarizing issues.”

BuzzFeed: “Obama’s Anti-Baby Boomer Foreign Policy”

“Indeed, the most surprising thing about the current field of candidates may not be that the country would choose the heir to the Clinton or Bush dynasty, but that voters would hand power back over to the baby boomers whom Obama convinced them to throw out.”

NBC New York: “Former President Clinton and Family Visit Sting’s ‘The Last Ship’”

“The standing ovations at the new Sting musical ‘The Last Ship’ started minutes before the curtain even rose on Saturday night. That’s because walking down the aisle of the Neil Simon Theatre was former President Bill Clinton, who was out for a night at the theater with wife Hillary Rodham Clinton, daughter Chelsea, and son-in-law Marc Mezvinsky.”

Articles:

BuzzFeed: Elizabeth Warren Consistently Not Running For President

By Ruby Cramer

December 22, 2014, 11:51 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] Elizabeth Warren isn’t running for president. But the senator’s electromagnetic pull has produced a sprawling, complicated draft effort that could define the progressive movement — and prove rewarding or risky for Warren.

She has said it in newspapers and magazines. She has said it on the radio and on national television. She has said it at public events and book signings; in prepared statements to reporters and in quick exchanges with the press. She has said it four times in a single interview — twice. Since last fall, Elizabeth Warren has said it a total of 49 times.

“I am not running for president.”

She has also committed, on two occasions now, to complete her first term in the U.S. Senate. The “pledge” would keep her on Capitol Hill until 2019. Still, the question almost always gets asked. And it doesn’t matter how, where, or by whom: Warren sticks to her answer with studied discipline, only sometimes adding a special flourish.

“I am not running for president. Period.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“No means no.”

“No, no, no, no.”

“No, no, no, no, no.”

But three weeks ago, when organizers from MoveOn.org, the largest progressive group in the country, contacted Warren’s office to let her staff know about their plan, the reply they received was neutral and dispassionate, taking some activists by surprise.

“When we gave them a heads up, they said ‘thanks’ and ‘we’ve appreciated the work we’ve done together in the Senate,’” said Ben Wikler, MoveOn’s Washington director.

The organization was about to launch a campaign to convince Warren to run for president. MoveOn officials expected support from the majority of their members — there are 8 million spread across every state, county, and zip code. And they intended to spend at least $1 million on the effort, opening offices and hiring staff in New Hampshire and Iowa, the states that begin the presidential nominating process every four years.

After MoveOn announced the project, Warren reverted to her go-to line. A spokesperson reiterated Warren’s pledge to serve a full Senate term. And her staff circulated audio from an event in Boston, where Warren told reporters again that, no, she isn’t running.

Still, organizers working on the campaign to draft Warren — who has become an avatar of the party’s progressive flank — found it significant that she didn’t go further.

“The response was just ‘OK,’ not a statement up or down,” said one progressive operative involved in the campaign. “If Warren or her team had been dead set against a draft from a big movement player like MoveOn, there was an easy way to make that clear.”

“It would have stopped it dead,” this person said. “MoveOn would not have done it.”

Progressives have spent months parsing these fine distinctions: weighing what Warren has said against what she has stopped just short of saying to close the door on 2016. Many activists see a difference big enough to justify a draft campaign. They believe she hasn’t ruled out a presidential run. They believe she can still be convinced.

It’s a void that, fair or not, Warren has helped create. And now the big players are heading toward it with their own methods, motives, and expectations.

Two other groups, Democracy for America and Ready for Warren, have glommed on to MoveOn’s draft. The campaign, barreling into the New Year with no certain end-date, has become a growing, shifting thing that inspires some progressives but troubles others.

In interviews this month, more than a dozen liberal strategists and activists said the movement will carry consequences good and bad for each party in this dance: Warren, the paragon, and a wider progressive community that, angling to push the party to the left and recoup influence, has consigned its brand and future to a single figure.

Most of the people at RootsCamp, an annual gathering of progressive campaign aides and organizers, had their own theory or hunch about why Warren might run.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For some, it's the fact that Warren won't use the future tense, only the present, when ruling out a 2016 bid. For others, it's the one time she didn't stick to her script, vaguely telling People magazine about the "amazing doors that could open." And for one activist, Sean McKeown, the first volunteer to sign up for the Ready for Warren group, it's page 212, chapter six, of her book, A Fighting Chance — the part where the Harvard professor and bankruptcy expert decides to become a candidate for the U.S. Senate.

The 34-year-old activist manned a table of "Run Liz Run" postcards last weekend at RootsCamp, the so-called "unconference" in D.C.'s immense convention center where MoveOn and the two other pro-Warren groups held their first event together.

McKeown has committed to memory the memoir's key page number and chapter.

"It's like she gave us a manual," he said. "It's how to convince her to run."

But put aside the book and the People magazine interview. Put aside the fact that, for all 49 times she has said she's not running, she hasn't issued a "Shermanesque statement" vowing she won't run in the future… Warren's actions are far less ambiguous.

Democrats close to Warren's operation, including ones familiar with her network of donors, said they see clear signals indicating one thing: It's not happening.

Since the midterm elections, the senator's financial gatekeeper, Paul Egerman, has told inquiring Democrats that she is still not considering a run, according to several people who have spoken with him late this year. (He has also reasoned that the sweeping Republican wins last month made 2016 even less appealing for Warren, one person said.)

Egerman served as Warren's campaign finance chair, helping her raise $42 million. He is a board member of the Democracy Alliance, a network of top liberal funders, and is seen by many of those donors as the go-to contact for matters pertaining to the senator. Late last fall, after a New Republic cover story floated the idea that Warren would challenge Hillary Clinton in a primary, Egerman assured donors that she wasn't running.

Warren's lawyer, Marc Elias, also warned in a letter earlier this summer that any draft efforts should "not confuse donors about a non-existent run for president."

Progressive financiers still aren't picking up a different message. "Nothing has changed that I can see," said Steve Phillips, a California-based donor and member of the Democracy Alliance. "No side meetings, no whispers, no movement."

Warren hasn't made moves on the staff side, either.

Her political operation, for all the interest, remains lean. She has one main strategist, Doug Rubin, based in Boston. There is no communications director in her Senate office, just a press secretary and deputy. And Mandy Grunwald, the ad-maker with decades-long ties to the Clintons, is still her media consultant. (Grunwald worked on Bill Clinton's 1992 race and Hillary Clinton's campaigns in 2000, 2006, and 2008.)

"Warren has not made gestures toward running for president that a seasoned political professional could see and embrace," said one senior Democratic strategist.

"It's become too cute by half."

Warren is building a widening platform in the Senate, instead. One week after the midterms, she secured a minor but custom-made leadership post following a series of private talks with Harry Reid, the top Senate Democrat. Warren's role has been described as unofficial "liaison" with the liberal base of the party.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Few Democrats interpreted the move as a step toward a national campaign.

"Everyone knows she is beloved by the left and has a big voice," said Mike Lux, a veteran liberal strategist who has worked with Warren. "She hasn't changed what she has said about the race one iota. So nothing has changed."

"Elizabeth Warren likes being a senator," said Ari Rabin-Havt, a longtime progressive operative who hosts a show on Sirius XM. "She just joined leadership in the Senate."

"You just don't do that if you're going to run for president."

The draft movement started more than a year ago, on a listserv.

In those early email exchanges, the project was just an ill-defined idea. In turn, that morphed into Ready for Warren, a super PAC some progressives have eyed as ineffective. MoveOn would come later, followed by Democracy for America, forming a three-legged collaboration that still hasn't figured its own mechanics. But even last year, at the beginning, progressives worried about how a draft would work — and the impact of an evolving 2016-focused movement over which Warren would have no control.

At the time, the "Warren for President" talk was shifting into a higher gear. One group, the Progressive Change Campaign Committee, branded the senator their "North Star" and unveiled the slogan, "I'm from the Elizabeth Warren Wing." The appeal was and remains clear, even if Warren still lacks a major legislative victory. No other figure speaks as effectively, or frequently, about the slate of economic causes she has made her signature: easing student loan debt, expanding Social Security, reinstating stricter regulations on banks. Warren assumed the progressive mantle easily and early.

She had been in office just nine months when Billy Wimsatt, a liberal organizer, started a Facebook page called Ready for Warren.

Wimsatt sent the link to "Game Changers Salon," a private mailing list where he moderated messages between the estimated 1,200 progressive subscribers with access: activists, pundits, operatives, fundraisers, donors, and a handful of journalists.

The group was "for fun," Wimsatt wrote. "Holler if you want to play with it."

About two weeks later, Wimsatt sent another email to the thread: A journalist had contacted him about Ready for Warren. Wimsatt hadn't even publicized the Facebook page. (It only had 12 likes.) "I'm debating what to do," Wimsatt wrote. He proposed he promote the group and find a team to helm it. "Unless I hear any majorly compelling objections, I think we're going to go forward with this and give it a try."

Immediately, replies filed in. Some liked the idea. But many worried about the effect on Warren. It might look like she is playing along, even if she isn't, one strategist said. It might politicize her efforts in the Senate, said another. It might be a burden for her staff, might overexpose her national brand, might hurt in some unexpected way.

Wimsett eventually handed the page over to three volunteers. They maintained Ready for Warren's quiet, prenatal internet existence until the summer, when the group went public with a website and campaign manager, Erica Sagrans, a digital strategist who worked on President Obama's reelection.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What launched, several movement progressives said, was a high-visibility, fledgling group that didn't initially loop in Warren's camp or other liberal stakeholders. "It was a surprise to everyone when stories started leaking about this," said one progressive strategist. (In an interview, Sagrans said she hadn't reached out to Warren's office, either.)

The week of the roll-out, Sagrans hadn't registered Ready for Warren with the Federal Election Commission, or decided how to structure the entity. But the group debuted later that week at Netroots Nation, the biggest progressive gathering of the year.

At the conference, volunteers passed out signs and plastic boater hats, each one decorated with an "Elizabeth Warren for President" sticker. (In the months that followed, more than one progressive operative joked with a shrug, "Well, they had hats!")

Ready for Warren has since faded into the mix, letting MoveOn take a central role, along with Democracy for America, which joined the draft movement last week. But at the RootsCamp conference, the trio of groups still appeared disjointed and scattered.

It's not clear how the three will work together.

"Talking to each other all the time is a good first step," said Wikler, the MoveOn official.

Inside the convention hall, MoveOn and Ready for Warren set up separate tables and peddled stickers bearing opposing slogans: "Run Warren Run" vs. "Run Liz Run." At the panel the two groups co-hosted, along with Democracy for America, officials from each organization pitched attendees to visit their own respective websites, where the groups are collecting their own respective lists of donors, volunteers, and email addresses.

There is no central hub online for the larger Warren draft movement.

Instead, organizers have encouraged supporters to start their own projects, create new social media pages, and host events independent of the existing campaign structure.

At the RootsCamp panel, Sagrans described the Warren effort as a "duocracy" made up of many entities. Join Ready for Warren, she said, but also "start your own Facebook page, record a video, do an event, do a meet-up… whatever you want to do."

Wikler chimed in. "We're all the protagonists in these stories," he said. "You're gonna see an explosion of Facebook groups, of different organizations, of endorsement votes, of announcements and press releases, of visibility actions, of photo petitions, of tumblrs."

The political director of Democracy for America, Eden James, said the three organizations should embrace the disorder. "[We're] building a foundation for the grassroots to empower themselves as much as we empower them," James said.

"So as soon as we lose control of this movement, we will have won."

Near the crêpe stand at RootsCamp, a fight broke out.

It didn't get physical — but two operatives exchanged harsh words about a short video, produced by MoveOn, to promote the launch of the draft effort this month.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The film, about four minutes in length, closes with a clip from David Muir's interview with Warren from the spring. When the video reaches its final frames, a title screen asks in all caps, "Are You Ready?" Then a voice-over. "This may be Elizabeth Warren's moment." Then Muir's face. "Are you gonna run for president?" he asks. Then there's Warren, staring blankly, silent, seeming to hesitate. Finally, she blinks. Then a "Run Warren Run" logo flashes across the screen. And that's it — the video is over.

The actual interview went like this —

DAVID MUIR: Are you gonna run for president?

ELIZABETH WARREN: I'm not running for president.

DAVID MUIR: There's nothing that could change your mind?

ELIZABETH WARREN: I'm not running for president.

— and that's why the one activist was so upset. The ad, he argued, his voice loud in the convention hallway, willfully misleads people about Warren's intentions.

There have been other disputes over the methods and messaging driving the movement. Some progressives bristle, for instance, when officials aligned with the campaign make public reference to Warren's verb tense, or talk about her unwillingness to issue a "Shermanesque" denial. "The parsing," said one, "is blurring on offensive."

The arguments evince a wider and deeper rift in the progressive wing about the consequences of a presidential draft movement, particularly for MoveOn.

Now, Warren is seen as an ideal presidential candidate and a potent megaphone in the race. But people inside the progressive community have expressed concern that a movement focused on a figure who is so singularly fixed on one issue — income inequality — could narrow the policy lens of MoveOn and its partners.

"It's surprising how organizations with such a breadth of concerns have focused this campaign so narrowly," said the senior Democratic strategist, citing other significant progressive priorities like abortion rights, immigration, and civil rights.

More than a decade ago, MoveOn's singular, clear, cutting voice made it the most influential liberal outfit in the country. The group, founded in 1998, rode a rising progressive sentiment against President George W. Bush. By the spring of 2003, MoveOn was enough of a force in Democratic circles that the group's officials decided they would hold their own presidential primary, online, and endorse the candidate who cleared 50%. (John Kerry actually purchased ads on Yahoo! urging people to participate.)

Since then, MoveOn's membership has grown by millions, but its power has dwindled.

In 2014, the group has something to gain from Warren's voice and platform. She is a viral commodity. When she confronts a banking executive in a Senate hearing, the YouTube clip of the exchange will draw hundreds of thousands, sometimes millions, of views.

This fall, on Facebook, there were three times as many people talking about Clinton than Warren. But this month, during the three-day period around her heated speech against a provision pushed by Citigroup lobbyists, Warren's total interactions exceeded Clinton's twofold, according to data provided by a Facebook partnership with BuzzFeed News.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Given Warren's following, a movement to draft her into the race, regardless of the outcome, happens to carry obvious advantages: list-building and fundraising.

Wikler, the MoveOn official, dismissed the idea that those realities motivated the campaign. "Ridiculous," he said. Progressives who have worked with MoveOn agreed.

"They're not that cynical," said Rabin-Havt, the longtime progressive operative. "That's a benefit. But there's a legitimate belief on their part that they are doing this because they believe it's a good idea. They can build lists and raise money without this."

Elizabeth Warren knows how to use the media, so long as she can control it.

Even before her run for Senate, when she was still teaching bankruptcy law in Cambridge, Warren made a study of the press — the way a perfectly crafted line or a national television interview could affect lives across the country if executed just right.

She wondered in her memoir whether her 2003 taping on Dr. Phil McGraw's syndicated talk show, viewed by millions, "might have done more good" than an entire year as a professor. "Maybe that was a better way to make a difference," Warren writes.

But as she moved into the political arena, she grew cautious. In 2012, Warren gave an embarrassing interview about the Occupy Wall Street movement, and vowed thereafter to speak to reporters with discipline. "The old way of talking with the press — long conversations and lively discussions — was gone," she writes in her book.

"Now I needed to change: I needed to measure every sentence."

In the Senate, that's what Warren does. She avoids unforced errors, evading reporters in hallways on the Hill. But when it works to her benefit, Warren seizes the spotlight.

Citing Warren's media savvy, several progressives reasoned that she is unlikely to rule out a campaign completely — until it stops helping and starts hurting. (Warren has played along before: During her book tour this spring, inquiries about 2016 were included among pre-screened audience questions at several events.)

But Warren is now dealing with something she can't control: a swirling, swelling coalition of progressives who could either raise her profile and buoy her legislative fights — or co-opt her platform and sidetrack her efforts in Washington.

Wikler, the MoveOn official, said the group would continue to support her Senate work as before. Warren's spokesperson did not return a request for comment about whether the draft campaign would deter the senator from working with MoveOn.

Last weekend, after Warren delivered her Citigroup speech, MoveOn members made "thousands of calls to Congress" ahead of the House vote, according to Wikler.

Meanwhile, that same day in Washington, RootsCamp began, marking the unofficial start of the "Run Warren Run" campaign. It was proof, Wikler said, that a draft movement would only "amplify," not divert from, the main attraction.

"The existence of a draft campaign strengthens her hand. Her candidacy would give her an even stronger hand. The presidency would give her the strongest-possible hand."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But while Warren waged one of her biggest, most public fights in the Senate, headlines kept rolling about the 2016 movement developing downtown — where, inside the convention center, next to a table full of bumper stickers, one MoveOn member turned to another and whispered, "She's acting so presidential this week!"

MSNBC: "Hillary Clinton's best and worst moments of 2014"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

December 23, 2014, 5:33 p.m. EST

When you're Hillary Clinton, even a quiet year is busy. The former secretary of state spent her first full year in decades as a private citizen crisscrossing the country giving speeches, writing a book, helping to grow the charitable foundation started by her husband, campaigning for Democrats, and laying the groundwork for a likely presidential run.

She hardly went more than a few days without some kind of public appearance, and rarely stayed in one city for very long. Even her vacations were interrupted by book promotions or speaking gigs. That's Hillary Clinton's idea of relaxing.

But not all of it was good for her. In fact, some moments were downright bad. Here's a look back at Clinton's ups and downs in 2014:

THE LOW TIMES:

Wealth gaffes

Clinton made a series of comments about her wealth that became quick fodder for Republican critics while promoting her book. First, she told ABC she was "dead broke" when she and her husband, former President Bill Clinton, left the White House in 2001. Then she told The Guardian she was not "truly well off." She later said she regretted the comments, but they've continued to haunt her.

A clumsy break from Obama

In an interview with The Atlantic, Clinton broke the typical party omerta to criticize President Obama's foreign policy. That led to a week of press coverage about tensions between the camps, and snarky counter-shots from Obama allies. Clinton appeared to have gone farther than she intended, and her spokesperson later said she and the president would "hug it out" and smooth things over when they next saw each other.

Book sales

Clinton has a more ambitious job in mind than being an author, but she has to be disappointed by sales of her memoir "Hard Choices," which covered her tenure as secretary of state. The book did well at first, but sales fell off quickly following some negative reviews and recognition that the volume offered few new salacious details. A book attacking Clinton by a conservative author eventually overtook Clinton's book, as did the memoir of likely GOP presidential candidate Ben Carson.

Speaking fees

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton was dogged by her astronomical speaking fees, especially for public universities, throughout the year. For instance, she charged the University of California at Los Angeles $300,000 to appear at the school – and that was a discount, according to The Washington Post. Even though the money went to the Clinton foundation, it still raised question accusations that she was fleecing the schools. Others called her out of touch for thinking $300,000 is as discount.

THE HIGH TIMES:

Charlotte

With little doubt, the highlight of Clinton's 2014 was the birth of her granddaughter, Charlotte, in September. Clinton has been bugging daughter Chelsea to have a kid for years, and raved about the infant and her new "grandmother glow" in numerous public appearances afterwards. Clinton has even worked Charlotte into political messaging, saying every child should have the opportunities to the grandchildren of presidents.

Iowa Steak Fry

Clinton returned to Iowa, the state that derailed her 2008 presidential campaign, for the first time in September. The pro-Clinton super PAC Ready for Hillary worked hard to stock the crowd with Clinton supporters, and plastered the event with their signage, and she was welcomed warmly. But Clinton also gave a strong speech, which coyly hinted at a presidential run. "It's great to be back – let's not let another seven years go by," she said.

An emerging stump speech

Since stepping down as secretary of state, most of Clinton's public speeches had been fairly dry and policy focused. But as she campaigned for Democrats ahead of the midterm elections, she found a loftier message about restoring fairness for working families and making government work for them. The biggest shift came in Philadelphia, when Clinton campaigned for now Gov.-elect Tom Wolf. She weaved together policies that form the "building block of the Democratic Party" into her personal life and those of average Americans, themes she would later repeat.

Criminal justice

Clinton has made a surprising focus of criminal justice reform of late. After Ferguson, she called for removing "weapons of war" from police officers, and for reducing mass incarceration, especially of blacks.

Kennedy embrace

In December, Clinton was embraced by the entire Kennedy clan, another political dynasty which bestowed a human rights award at star-studded dinner named in honor of Robert F. Kennedy. "I go to a lot of events, supporting a lot worthy causes, and there is nothing like this," she said, looking out at the star-studded crowd. While many progressives distrust Clinton, they would find a lot to like in her remarks, which tied together the struggle of African-Americans protesting police brutality – "yes, black lives matter" she said – with her support for a law to ban torture. She added that the family was an "inspiration."

Washington Post: Dan Balz: "Democrats see rising populist sentiment. But can it shake Hillary Clinton?"

By Dan Balz

December 23, 2014, 7:00 a.m. EST

Last Wednesday, in a coffeehouse in downtown Des Moines, a group of progressive activists launched an effort they hope will change the 2016 presidential campaign and in the process upend the Democratic Party.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The gathering in Iowa, organized by MoveOn.org and backed by Democracy for America, was the opening of a grass-roots push to draft Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) to run for president. Its broader effect was to escalate the ongoing debate among Democrats about the party's values, its message, its real constituencies and, most of all, how to win elections in the post-Obama era.

That there is such a debate over the direction of the Democratic Party is without question, and the differences have become louder in the wake of the drubbing the Democrats suffered in the midterm elections.

What is in question is the degree to which the rising populist movement on the left can materially shape the party's future. More specifically, absent some sign from Warren that she is going to run, can these Democrats successfully pressure Hillary Rodham Clinton, the party's dominant, prospective presidential candidate, to adopt much of their agenda?

To those who argue that the ideological splits within the party are overstated or mostly stylistic, the effort to draft Warren is a misguided enterprise. "There really isn't a huge division in the party," said former Pennsylvania governor Ed Rendell (D). "… I don't think it's anything like the tea party and the Republicans."

Rendell, who two years ago criticized President Obama's campaign for attacking Mitt Romney over his business record at Bain Capital, said he believed most Democrats shared Warren's opposition to a provision favorable to Wall Street in the recently passed spending bill that she attacked on the Senate floor.

Those trying to encourage Warren to run in 2016 argue a different case. Anna Galland, executive director of MoveOn.Org Civic Action, said there are important policy differences that need to be aired before Democrats pick their 2016 nominee.

She cited issues such as how the party should address income inequality, who populates positions of power in the executive branch — a cause taken up by Warren when she opposed Obama's nomination of investment banker Antonio Weiss as treasury undersecretary — and whether it is even possible for Democrats to have a discussion about expanding, rather than constraining, Social Security benefits. "We are not debating style here," she said. "We are debating substance."

The power of populism

Populist energy pulsates within the party to the point that Democrats cannot agree on whether it has become its dominant ideological strain. Sen. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio), who has championed a populist message as much as Warren, said: "It's a good strong message, and it's a message that she's carried very well, and it's a message that a number of us have put out there for a number of years, and it's catching on. … I don't think it's there yet."

But Gov. Jack Markell of Delaware, who comes out of the centrist Democratic tradition, said he believes the party has now tipped in favor of Warren's anti-Wall Street populist message. "I don't think there's any question," he said of a shift that he finds worrisome for the party's future hopes of winning over independents and swing voters.

Jim Dean, who heads up Democracy for America, said that until recently, the party had "regressed" on the relationship between business and government. "With the ascendance of Elizabeth Warren and the way she has built power for herself, we are seeing a lot of movement for the party to get back to its core values," he said.

Warren has given no indication that she will become a candidate in 2016. Her advocates on the left take hope from the present-tense language she has used to disavow her interest — "I am not running for president," she repeatedly told NPR's Steve Inskeep last week — as a sign that her posture is not irreversible.

Officials at MoveOn.Org, which counts 8 million members, have said they will commit $1 million to the effort to draft Warren and will set up operations in states with early caucuses or primaries to stoke interest. Democracy for America will chip in $250,000 to the effort. The groups will focus on organizing in other early states and plan a national day of action in early February, one year before the 2016 Iowa caucuses.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The only way it will really happen is if there’s a massive grass-roots campaign that shows tremendous support for Elizabeth Warren across the country,” said Neil Sroka, the spokesman for DFA.

A Democratic leader from a battleground state, speaking on the condition of anonymity in order to offer a candid assessment, said he had strong doubts that the movement can reshape the 2016 campaign message. He sees no one with the political heft or following, short of a Warren candidacy, to pose enough of a threat to Clinton to change what she otherwise would do and say.

Rendell was more dismissive of the movement’s potential strength, largely because of what he sees as the lack of differences within the party. “First of all, there has to be a leader of a movement and there isn’t a good leader,” he said, adding, “If Hillary Clinton ran against Jim Webb or Bernie Sanders or Elizabeth Warren, they’d get 5 to 6 percent of the vote” in Pennsylvania.

However, Tad Devine, a Democratic strategist who played key roles in several past Democratic presidential campaigns, sees far greater potential for a populist uprising to galvanize the political dialogue. Arguing that the sense of economic discontent is widespread and that the hunger for a sharper populist agenda is genuine, he said, “If somebody gets up and delivers it with credibility, it’s going to resonate very powerfully in a way that’s not indicative of the party divisions today.”

Other Democrats agree that both Democratic and Republican candidates will be looking to seize the issue of middle-class economic insecurity and that a presidential nominee dare not lose that debate. “The party that figures out the economic message around making prosperity more inclusive for all Americans is going to win this election,” said Bill Burton, a former Obama White House official and current Democratic strategist. “I really do think Republicans will be as attentive to that as Democrats are.”

Clinton competition?

What rankles many progressives is the possible absence of a genuinely contested battle for the Democratic nomination. If Warren stays out, it is not clear who would have the combination of message and political strength to do that.

At this point, the field is far from fixed. Sanders, the independent senator from Vermont, has a worldview that excites some progressives, and he has visited states with early contests as he deliberates whether to run. Webb, the former senator from Virginia, has formed an exploratory committee and has put economic fairness on the table as an issue, but he acknowledges the long-shot nature of his possible candidacy. Maryland’s outgoing governor, Martin O’Malley, has ties to both the centrist and progressive wings of the party and traveled the country this past year in preparation for a possible campaign.

Devine, who is an adviser to Sanders, said bluntly that anyone hoping to advance the populist agenda in a possible campaign against Clinton has to be prepared to run a serious campaign with all that entails. Half-hearted bus trips through Iowa and New Hampshire are not enough, he said.

“If you want this message to take hold with people, you have to challenge the front-runner in the nominating process in a real way, not a symbolic way, the way Gary Hart did with Walter Mondale” in the 1984 Democratic race, he said.

At this point, no potential candidate appears ready to challenge Clinton in quite that way. Even many of those urging Warren to run tip-toe around sharp criticism of Clinton or what she stands for.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Our members have deep respect for Hillary Clinton," Galland said. "The point here is to elevate the exciting message, the powerful track record, the inspiring vision of Elizabeth Warren. That's our focus, not on anti-Hillary or anti-Bernie."

DFA's Dean said the same thing about his organization's involvement in the draft-Warren movement. Notably, Howard Dean — whose 2004 campaign became the rallying point for the progressive grass roots and lives on today as DFA — recently announced his support for Clinton.

Bill Carrick, a California-based Democratic strategist, explained one of the reasons. Pent-up desire for a populist economic message is strong, he said, but many older progressives are conflicted because of their affections for Clinton and her husband, former president Bill Clinton.

"Generationally there's a bunch of people who are very progressive, who essentially are in the baby-boomer world, who are very, very comfortable with Hillary," he said. "Some of it is they consider the Clinton years successful, politically and economically. Some of it is she's going to make history and be the first woman president."

Asked about concerns among some progressives that Clinton will not have the kind of strong message they want, Ohio's Brown said: "I don't particularly share those concerns. I think Hillary's got a good sensibility for working-class voters." Later in the interview, however, he said of Clinton, "She's going to have to show more independence from Wall Street."

Populist sentiment causes Delaware's Markell to worry that the party will appeal too narrowly in 2016. He argues that what the party needs is a growth-oriented message and policies to go with it. "Economic fairness and inequity are important," he said. "And increasing the minimum wage is important. We've done it in Delaware." But he warned against getting "caught up in the rhetoric of fairness for the sake of fairness."

Colorado Gov. John Hickenlooper survived a serious challenge in his reelection bid last month in a crucial swing state. The business-friendly Democrat sees Warren's populism as "only part of the message" the party needs to adopt. Job creation, curtailing excessive regulation of small business and other strategies need to be part of it as well, he said.

"It's not populist in the sense that we've got a slogan and we go out there and shout it to the beat of a drum," he said. "But I think it's part of the equation of this frustration of working people that the system is skewed against them."

Clinton became a more populist candidate in 2008 after losing a string of contests to Obama and demonstrated her appeal to white, working-class voters. In preparation for a possible 2016 campaign, she has already invoked the problem of income inequality as one that must be addressed. But her rhetoric, except for what she later said was a mangled comment attacking businesses, does not have the edginess of Warren.

How strong that message will be if she faces only limited competition for the nomination is what worries liberal activists — which is why they are hoping to entice Warren to run or help elevate Warren's standing even higher. How much strength there is in the progressive movement, and how Clinton weighs its significance, will not be known until she makes an expected announcement of candidacy.

New York Times opinion: Jacob Heilbrunn, National Interest editor: "The Real Threat to Hillary Clinton: Jim Webb"

By Jacob Heilbrunn

December 22, 2014

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WASHINGTON — THE conventional wisdom is that Hillary Rodham Clinton will be almost impossible to dislodge from the Democratic presidential nomination and that even if she does encounter some hiccups, they will come from her left flank on economic policy. But if Mrs. Clinton runs, she may face a serious and very different threat: her own foreign policy record. While she can pretty much split the difference with any primary opponents on economic policy, the divisions over foreign affairs could be a lot harder to paper over for Mrs. Clinton, who has been tacking to the right on Iran, Syria and Russia in anticipation of Republican assaults during the general election.

This is why it isn't really the Massachusetts senator Elizabeth Warren who should worry the Clinton camp. It's the former Virginia senator Jim Webb, a Vietnam War hero, former secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration, novelist and opponent of endless wars in the Middle East. Late last month, Mr. Webb formed an exploratory committee. "He's a very long shot," Leslie H. Gelb, president emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations, told me. "He has to become a serious candidate. At that point she would find him much more complex than dealing with liberals. He's not a liberal, but a lot of what he says might appeal to liberals. He does not get carried away by humanitarian intervention."

Mr. Webb's attacks on free trade and economic elites, coupled with a call for America to come home again, might well prove a potent combination in the early primaries, attracting antiwar progressives as well as conservative-minded Southern white men whom he believes the party can win back. His credo is as simple as it is persuasive: Rather than squander its power and resources abroad, America should rebuild.

Mr. Webb, whose national poll ratings are negligible, may look like an unlikely candidate, but that is also what most observers thought when he wore his son's Iraq combat boots on the campaign trail and ousted George Allen from his Senate seat in 2006. Today he represents for the Democrats what the Republicans tried to stamp out in their ranks during the midterm elections: a Tea-Party-like insurgency against its establishment candidate.

Mr. Webb, who prides himself on his Scotch-Irish ancestry, has long been something of a renegade, a persona that vividly manifested itself after Sept. 11, 2001, when he began denouncing what he saw as the transformation of the American presidency into a European-style monarchy that could capriciously pursue wars whenever and wherever it chose. Unlike Mrs. Clinton, who continues to struggle to explain her vote for the Iraq war, Mr. Webb publicly attacked the George W. Bush administration in 2002, presciently asking, "Do we really want to occupy Iraq for the next 30 years?" As a member of the Armed Services and Foreign Relations Committees he also castigated the Obama administration for its intervention in Libya in 2011. He was right. It's a move that has boomeranged, creating further instability and emboldening jihadists across the region.

During and after the Libya intervention, Mr. Webb made it clear that he believed American democracy was imperiled by the failure of Congress to question the judgment of military leaders and the president. He has put his finger on a problem that academics like Tufts University's Michael J. Glennon, the author of "National Security and Double Government," see as a product of an entrenched national security bureaucracy that essentially performs an end-run around Congress and even reform-minded presidents.

In contrast to Mrs. Clinton, who has gotten into hot water for trying to retroactively amend her views and record, Mr. Webb did not arrive at these beliefs casually or opportunistically. As his recent memoir, "I Heard My Country Calling," makes clear, his opposition to ventures abroad is as much viscerally emotional as intellectual. Growing up as a self-described military brat, he spent his formative years in Britain, where he saw firsthand the effects of loss of empire and the devastation wrought by World War II. "Britain was bled out and spent out," he writes. "They understood the great price of the recent wars in a much more sobering way than did most Americans."

After he returned from war-torn Beirut just before a truck suicide bomber destroyed the Marine Corps headquarters in October 1983, he felt a nagging irritation as he rode home in a taxi early in the morning along George Washington Memorial Parkway. Then he realized that the calm silence was bothering him; it was both the emblem of America and the "protective vacuum that surrounds our understanding when it comes to the viciousness that war brings to so many innocent noncombatants in other lands." Mr. Webb's exposure to foreign societies gave him the ability, much like President Obama, to view America as both an insider and an outsider.

Whether Mr. Webb will attempt to begin a successful maverick campaign is an open question. But he is an eloquent and forthright speaker whose foreign policy experience would make it difficult for Mrs. Clinton to paint him as an isolationist or a novice who will leave America open to attack, as she attempted to do to Mr. Obama during the 2008 primaries. On the contrary, it's Mrs. Clinton whose interventionist foreign policy record leaves her politically vulnerable.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

National Journal: “Nine Questions for Hillary Clinton In 2015”

By Emily Schultheis

December 23, 2014

[Subtitle:] She'll need to formulate her campaign's message, tap a trusted team of advisers, and take sides on polarizing issues.

There's been buzz for months over Hillary Clinton's expected presidential campaign, but she's not expected to make a formal announcement until the first few months of 2015. That leaves a vacuum for political reporters, opposition researchers, and Clinton-watchers alike to discuss her strategy, message, and timing for announcing.

How and when Clinton launches her campaign—and who's involved when she does—will set the tone for not only the Democratic primary in 2016, but also the general election. Will she run a campaign centered around the historic idea of being the first female president? Will she cater to the party's centrists or the progressive base? Will she bring in longtime loyalists, or tap unfamiliar advisers into her orbit? These are all pivotal questions as we head into 2015.

While it's by no means certain that Clinton will definitely announce she's running for president, most Democrats expect her to launch a campaign within the first few months of the year.

With that in mind, here's National Journal's list of nine top questions for Clinton in 2015.

1. When will she announce?

While several leading Democratic strategists advised that Clinton waste no time before launching her campaign, she's content to take her time to formally announce. Former Obama campaign manager David Plouffe suggested that she announce early to get ahead of her critics on the Republican side, many of whom are already sniping at her. But the holidays have come and gone with no announcement from Clinton, and her speaking schedule—which includes an event as late as March 19—suggests she's looking at a later spring announcement.

That said, speeches can be canceled, and if the timeline for other candidates begins to shift—on the Republican side, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush's December announcement that he's "actively" moving toward a campaign surprised observers, and could affect Clinton's timing as well.

2. Will there be an exploratory committee first, or will Clinton just announce a campaign?

Lately, presidential candidates have preceded their official launch by announcing an exploratory committee—a vehicle that allows candidates to begin raising money ahead of a formal campaign announcement. But will Clinton launch one or just go straight to the official campaign? As one strategist put it to The Washington Post earlier this month, "At this point, what would she be exploring?" Several of her allies told The Post that she might opt to skip the exploratory committee this time around for fear it would look too coy for someone who's run before and clearly has been weighing this decision for a long time.

In 2007, Clinton announced her exploratory committee in January; this time, however, with a later announcement date likely—and the super PAC Ready for Hillary doing early organizing work on her behalf—she could feasibly go straight into full-on campaign mode.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

3. Who will be her campaign manager?

If she runs, deciding on a campaign manager will be one of the first major strategic decisions Clinton will make. That person will set the tone for the campaign, from the overall message and themes to staffing and hiring decisions. One of the leading contenders, former Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee executive director Guy Cecil, announced that he wasn't going to be managing Clinton's campaign in a statement released Sunday.

As of now, the name that comes up most frequently in Democratic circles is Robby Mook, a former Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee staffer who ran Terry McAuliffe's 2013 gubernatorial campaign in Virginia. He has been helping Clinton out with "special projects," according to Bloomberg, and advised her during the midterms. Stephanie Schriock, the president of EMILY's List who managed and won tough campaigns for Democratic Sens. Jon Tester and Al Franken, is also mentioned as a contender for the top position.

4. When does she stop giving paid speeches?

Clinton has filled much of her time since leaving the State Department by giving a steady stream of paid speeches, many of which bring her six-figure speaker's fees. While it's certainly good for the Clintons' bank accounts, her time on the speaking circuit has already become the subject of numerous GOP attacks.

Presumably, Clinton will cease to give paid speeches as soon as she becomes a candidate—but how long will the gap be between her last paid speech and her first speech as a candidate? As of now, Clinton has two speeches scheduled in Canada on Jan. 21, one in the San Francisco Bay Area on Feb. 24, and another in Atlantic City, N.J., on March 19.

5. How is Ready for Hillary integrated into the eventual campaign apparatus?

The super PAC that launched with just a handful of staffers in 2013 has become a formidable organization in its own right; it boasts Obama alums Mitch Stewart and Jeremy Bird as top advisers, and has collected more than 3 million names that will be the linchpin of Clinton's grassroots organization.

The expectation for Ready for Hillary is that it will wind down as soon as Clinton announces her decision, with a Clinton campaign buying, leasing, or doing a data swap with Ready for Hillary for its list of supporters and voters. There's also the possibility that some of the group's advisers will be absorbed into a Clinton campaign. That's sure to be an issue Republicans jump on quickly, with a possible Federal Election Commission complaint whenever the sale or lease goes through.

6. What's the campaign message?

In the wake of Democrats' massive midterm losses in November, there's been much discussion about what the party's overall message should be heading into 2016. Will Clinton focus, as she didn't in 2008, on the historic nature of becoming the first female president? Will she incorporate the progressive focus on income inequality and criticism of Wall Street into her overall message? And what part of her own biography does she focus on—her time at the State Department, her tenure in the Senate, or her experience in her husband's administration during the 1990s? All of these are open questions, and will provide a great deal of insight into the type of campaign Clinton intends to run.

7. Does she do anything to reach out to progressives?

As the past few weeks have shown, progressive activists are pining for Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts to run for president. Warren is able to channel the excitement and issues of the Democratic Left far better than any other political figure—and her focus on economic populism, fighting back against Wall Street, and tackling income equality have resonated strongly with voters. Even if Warren doesn't run, progressive groups expect her to have significant sway over the Democratic Party's message for 2016.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So how does Clinton handle the progressive wing of her party? Whether she does acknowledges the role Warren's policies could play in her overall campaign message, or reaches out to progressive leaders, will say a lot about the overall direction of Clinton's campaign and the kind of coalition she's hoping to build.

8. How will she address politically sensitive policy questions?

Since she left the State Department, Clinton has spoken out on several key issues, most notably her support for same-sex marriage in early 2013 and her backing of normalizing relations with Cuba. But on other politically sensitive subjects, she's been more comfortable hedging. What does Clinton think about the Keystone XL pipeline, for example? Does she support re-implementing tougher sanctions on Iran if a nuclear deal isn't reached? Where does she stand on net neutrality?

As a candidate, Clinton will be relentlessly bombarded for her precise views on a whole host of issues. Whether she ties her fortunes to President Obama, or opts for a more independent path will be a telling sign of her 2016 campaign message.

9. How does she deal with other Democrats in the race?

While it's still unclear who could make up the rest of the Democratic field—former Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia has announced an exploratory committee, while Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont and Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley have expressed serious interest in running—it's pretty likely that Clinton will have at least one primary opponent. How will she relate to them? As the clear front-runner, she could ignore the other candidates in the race, to project power and inevitability.

Because she would start the race in stronger position than in 2008, will she decide to spend significant time campaigning in small-state caucuses, to ensure she's not surprised by one of the long-shot insurgents? Should she be worried (again) about Iowa, a state where she finished a disappointing third in 2008, and one her husband hardly competed for as a presidential candidate?

BuzzFeed: “Obama’s Anti-Baby Boomer Foreign Policy”

By Ben Smith

December 22, 2014, 2:04 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] Love it or hate it, last week’s Cuba opening is the purest expression of his foreign policy yet. What Axelrod got wrong.

On the evening of July 23, 2007, Sen. Barack Obama’s top adviser was doing his best to spin his way out of a way of the thinking that led, last week, to perhaps the purest of President Barack Obama’s foreign policy victories: the opening of Cuba.

Candidate Obama, blindsided during a South Carolina presidential debate by a YouTube question from a bearded California photographer, had rashly said he would meet anti-American leaders including Fidel Castro, Hugo Chavez, and Kim Jong-il. And so David Axelrod made his way into the dank “spin room,” projecting the sort of mellow confidence that good spinners do when they’re really worried. He insisted to the skeptical press pack that we’d missed a really important distinction. Obama hadn’t promised to meet them, Axelrod kept insisting; he simply said he was willing to.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We didn't really buy the spin, and Hillary Clinton's aides were gleeful, and even thought they saw a campaign turning point, clear evidence that Obama was "naive" and unready for the White House.

Seven years later, Axelrod doesn't exactly recall that as his finest moment — but not because the spin was so weak.

"I reacted too conventionally," he recalled in a telephone interview from Chicago a few days ago. "I really wasn't grasping his larger point. I reacted conventionally and he was thinking unconventionally."

Obama, in fact, rather liked his answer, and the campaign's research quickly showed it played well with Democrats. So Axelrod and his colleagues quickly reversed course and Barack Obama's view of the world — previously defined solely by his opposition to the Iraq war — really started to take shape. This was a foreign policy fully in sync with the campaign's deep generational promise: to "turn the page" on baby boomers like the Clintons and what the Obama campaign saw as their inane and toxic politics.

The notion that we really needed to abandon lines drawn around the time of Vietnam was an appealing point. But it was also American domestic politics, a piece of the American conversation. And when it came to actual foreign policy — as opposed to "foreign policy" as an element of American domestic politics — that was sometimes a fatal flaw.

Obama's framework didn't make particular sense to people in other countries, or to their leaders, or to their American friends. This was particularly clear during the rawer, earlier campaign moments. At the 2007 gathering of the pro-Israel group AIPAC, for instance, Obama drew eye rolls by suggesting Israel's enemy was "cynicism" — not just, say, its actual enemies. And by the end of his first year in office, he was admitting to Joe Klein his mistake, fundamentally, of assuming that the American zeitgeist was a global phenomenon.

"The Israelis and the Palestinians — have found that the political environment, the nature of their coalitions or the divisions within their societies, were such that it was very hard for them to start engaging in a meaningful conversation," Obama told Klein. "And I think that we overestimated our ability to persuade them to do so when their politics ran contrary to that."

Obama's approach to Russia, too, imagined that country in American terms — alienated by George W. Bush, ready for a "reset." In fact, Vladimir Putin has his own politics and Russian history has its own arc. Putin's domestic politics required an enemy in Washington. He was intent on turning the page too — only on turning it in the opposite direction, back toward Soviet-era power and confrontation. Obama's most ambitious opening of all, toward Iran, remains unresolved, and will be determined in part by the tension between an improved bilateral relationship and that country's domestic politics.

But in Cuba, Obama has found a pure expression of the vision he promised. This is a relationship frozen in time, governed by a logic imposed when Cuba mattered to American strategy, when the stakes were high, and when the Soviets were trying to turn the island into a nuclear missile base.

The strongest argument against the opening is that it violated the laws of power. The United States gave a lot and got very little:

"Obama says yes, yes to everything: an embassy, an ambassador, diplomatic relations, travel and exchange, status among nations, removal from the list of state sponsors of terror, and a serious opportunity to lessen the embargo that has kept the dictators caged for decades," complained the Free Beacon's Matt Continetti. "In return, the Castro brothers give up … well, what?"

"This isn't giving away the store. This is giving away the shopping mall, town center, enterprise zone. And it is entirely in character with President Obama's foreign policy," he wrote.

But the logic on which Obama was elected is: Who cares? The stakes in a tiny, poor, and autocratic island in a region of dysfunctional states are extremely low for the United States, if high for Cubans and for the people whose property Castro confiscated. The logic of the conflict is rooted entirely in the past. And so Obama didn't play hardball; he simply turned the page, and delivered on the generational promise that got him elected in the first place.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama is “very, very satisfied” with his recent policy moves, Axelrod said, pointing in particular to the regularization of millions of undocumented immigrants, the climate deal with China, and the Cuba opening. Obama, he said, “can sense the clock ticking.”

The president, Axelrod said, is focused on spending his last two years resolving “the big generational issues” that have been, like Cuba and like immigration, simply stuck for decades.

And then Obama will, likely as not, turn power back over to the generation before his. Indeed, the most surprising thing about the current field of candidates may not be that the country would choose the heir to the Clinton or Bush dynasty, but that voters would hand power back over to the baby boomers whom Obama convinced them to throw out.

NBC New York: “Former President Clinton and Family Visit Sting’s ‘The Last Ship’”

By Dave Quinn

December 22, 2014, 2:33 p.m. EST

The standing ovations at the new Sting musical “The Last Ship” started minutes before the curtain even rose on Saturday night.

That’s because walking down the aisle of the Neil Simon Theatre was former President Bill Clinton, who was out for a night at the theater with wife Hillary Rodham Clinton, daughter Chelsea, and son-in-law Marc Mezvinsky.

As the former first family took their seats in the orchestra, they were met with thunderous applause from the rest of the audience — many of whom approached to shake their hands and pose for photos.

“You’re a grandmother now,” one audience member enthusiastically pointed out, before the show began. “I know can you believe it?” Hillary responded, accepting her congratulations.

The Clintons were undoubtedly there to see Sting, who boarded the cast of the musical he wrote on Dec. 9, for a limited run that will remain through Jan. 24.

Sting’s wife of 22 years, Trudie Styler, was also sitting the same row.

So was Australian film director Baz Luhrmann (“The Great Gatsby,” “Moulin Rouge!”), with wife Catherine Martin. The two are in town celebrating the unveiling of the “Baz Dazzled” holiday windows they designed for Barneys.

Also in attendence? “Phantom of the Opera” and “Cats” composer Andrew Lloyd Webber, who was sitting alongside “Downton Abbey” scribe Julian Fellowes. The two are collaborating on “School of Rock — The Musical,” a stage version of the hit 2003 comedy set to hit Broadway next season.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Webber may have also swung by to support actress Rachel Tucker, who plays the lead Meg in “The Last Ship.” Tucker was a contestant on the Webber-judged BBC reality singing competition “I’d Do Anything” back in 2008.

At the extra-long intermission, the Clintons headed backstage to greet Sting and the cast — photos of which can be seen exclusively at Broadway.com.

“Hillary 2016” shouted one audience member when they returned to their sets. The former Secretary of State then turned in her seat and laughed, waving at fans.

Former President Clinton seemed to enjoy himself throughout, clapping along to Sting’s rousing score. He and his family even gave the actors their own standing ovation at the end of the evening.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· January 21 – Saskatchewan, Canada: Sec. Clinton keynotes the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce’s “Global Perspectives” series (MarketWired)

· January 21 – Winnipeg, Canada: Sec. Clinton keynotes the Global Perspectives series (Winnipeg Free Press)

· February 24 – Santa Clara, CA: Sec. Clinton to Keynote Address at Inaugural Watermark Conference for Women (PR Newswire)

· March 19 – Atlantic City, NJ: Sec. Clinton keynotes American Camp Association conference (PR Newswire)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider \(CTRAB\)" <bstrider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <ctrfriendsfamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 8/23/2014 5:45:50 AM
Subject: CTR Saturday August 23, 2014 Roundup

Correct The Record Saturday August 23, 2014 Roundup:

Headlines:

Mother Jones: "Correcting His Record"

"Correct the Record is part of a larger shadow campaign that's gearing up for 2016."

Associated Press: "Clinton Shadow in Iowa No Threat to Some Democrats"

"Democrats with presidential dreams are coming to Iowa with little fanfare, entourage or recognition. They are undeterred by talk of a Hillary Rodham Clinton candidacy in 2016 or her plans to visit the leadoff caucus state next month to honor retiring Sen. Tom Harkin."

Associated Press: "Potential 2016 Candidates Cautious on Ferguson"

"Asked why Democrats like Clinton and Biden haven't discussed it [Ferguson] yet, [Rep. John] Lewis said, 'maybe they felt that the nation should speak with maybe one voice, and that should be the president.'"

CNN: "Warren, through lawyer, disavows Ready for Warren"

"In a letter to the Federal Election Commission Friday, Warren fully disavowed herself of Ready for Warren, a super PAC with the explicit goal of encouraging the liberal Massachusetts senator to run for president in 2016."

CNN: "Democrat Jim Webb: One show not enough to fully criticize Clinton's record"

"Democrat Jim Webb needs more than one show if you want him to critique Hillary Clinton's record as secretary of state."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New York Times: “Legal Woes of Owners Help Put the Plaza Back in Play”

“A prominent fund-raiser for Hillary Rodham Clinton’s presidential run in 2008, Mr. Chatwal pleaded guilty in Federal District Court in Brooklyn in April to witness tampering and funneling more than $180,000 in illegal contributions to three candidates, Ms. Clinton among them, between 2007 and 2011.”

National Memo column: Cynthia Tucker: “Hillary Clinton’s Hawkishness May Be Her Undoing”

“Clinton’s presumed bid for the presidency — a historic run she’s unlikely to turn down — is threatened by the same unfortunate tendency that cost her in 2008: presumption.”

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: “Romney and Ryan talk Hillary Clinton, and 2016: ‘She’s beatable’”

“‘Looking at her [Sec. Clinton’s] record, seeing how ineffective she was in securing more security, is going to be a great handicap for her in the general election,’ said Romney. ‘I don’t think it’ll hurt her in the primary, but it will in the general.”

Articles:

Mother Jones: “Correcting His Record”

By Patrick Caldwell

September/ October 2014

[Subtitle:] Reformed Clinton antagonist David Brock’s team of “nerd virgins” seeks to destroy the anti-Hillary memes he once unleashed

A week after Hillary Clinton released her new memoir, Hard Choices, I met Burns Strider for lunch at the Hotel Monaco in Washington, DC. Just as the book hit the shelves, Strider’s organization, Correct the Record, had released 11 pages of bullet points swatting down anticipated criticisms from Clinton’s detractors (“Hard Choices is just another way for Hillary to make money hand over fist”; “Hard Choices is a glossed-over snooze-fest”). It was the kind of preemptive spin that Correct the Record was created to churn out. As Clinton prepares for a possible presidential run, Correct the Record keeps constant watch for any conceivable attacks against her, and then aggressively beats them back before they take hold.

As he picked at his beet and greens salad, Strider told me how he’d ditched eating animal products in 2010 at the behest of the then-secretary of state. “You’ve got to think about your two boys,” she told Strider, who had worked as her senior adviser on faith outreach during the 2008 campaign. That night he got a call from Bill Clinton, who extolled the virtues of herbivore-themed books and handwritten recipes jotted down by the former president.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The contemplative 48-year-old vegan, who manages Correct the Record's day-to-day operations, says he has no qualms about his new role in the blood sport of presidential politics. Yet his boss is an even more unlikely figure: David Brock, the former Clinton nemesis and ringleader of the "vast right-wing conspiracy" that Hillary Clinton decried in 1998.

In the mid-1990s, as a reporter at the American Spectator, Brock investigated the first couple's involvement in the Whitewater real estate scheme and dove into the allegations that Bill had used Arkansas state troopers to facilitate his liaisons, including one with Paula Jones. (He also infamously described Anita Hill as "a little bit nutty and a little bit slutty.") Brock later underwent a political conversion and founded Media Matters, a research shop dedicated to countering Fox News and right-wing talking points. Now he's come full circle, launching Correct the Record to combat the resurgence of the venal, opportunistic pols who will do anything to attain power-that he once worked so hard to popularize.

Brock's ideological shift came in the late '90s as he penned The Seduction of Hillary Rodham, a book that everyone expected to be a withering takedown – but ended up being a tepid biography. By 1997 Brock began to recant, publishing a me culpa in*Esquire* titled "Confessions of a Right-Wing Hit man." In 2002, he released Blinded by the Right: The Conscience of an Ex-Conservative, a tell-all about the faults of the conservative movement and his disillusionment with it.

Strider recalls picking up a copy in an airport bookstore and devouring it. He passed it along to his then-boss, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and arranged for Brock to address House Democrats. Meanwhile, Bill Clinton had started passing copies along to friends, opening new doors for Brock among liberal insiders. Having turned his back on his old right-wing patrons, Brock proved skilled at convincing rich liberals to open their wallets by revealing inside details of the conservative propaganda machine.

Brock says he first conceived of Correct the Record last summer, "Having left the State Department," Brock told me, "Clinton didn't have the kind of robust operation that one would have if one was holding public office. That's where I saw the need." He wrote the memo predicating "an uptick in political attacks" against Clinton and proposed a rapid-response group to defend her. As it happened, the very next day American Rising, an opposition research outfit founded by former Mitt Romney and Republican National Committee staff, announced a "Stop Hillary 2016" initiative.

Correct the Record's staff (18 and counting) is crammed into a newsroom-style bullpen in the back corner of the offices of American Bridge 21st Century, Brock's Super-PAC. "They're always there; they're always working around the clock," former Clinton White House adviser Paul Begala says of the crew. "I always tease David that he finds all of these nerd virgins and locks them away in a vault where they never see sunlight or have a drink or get laid. But God Bless them!"

The team has been building an exhaustive database of factoids documenting Clinton's career, as well as compiling opposition research on her putative opponents. With Clinton's own press team largely silent, Correct the Record has become the go-to source for reporters seeking pro-Clinton quotes in response to Republican attacks.

Correct the Record is part of a larger shadow campaign that's gearing up for 2016. It includes Ready for Hillary, which is collecting voter data, and Priorities USA, which is raising big money." For the first time in my adult life, the left has their shit together," says Begala, who relies on Correct the Record for talking points when he prepares for cable spots as a Hillary surrogate.

Hillary Clinton has always had a rocky relationship with the press, thanks in part to dealing with conservative smear artists like the young Brock. Correct the Record reflects her prickly approach to media relations. The group spent much of the early summer sending our press releases touting the sales of Clinton's book and tweeting about stories that questioned the numbers. When New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd wrote a column about the lavish speaking fees commanded by Hillary and daughter Chelsea, Correct fired back with a dossier on Dowd, highlighting her own speaking fees.

But this strategy could backfire. Hillary has always struggled with the perception that she is inauthentic and quick to become defensive; being shielded by a group that pounces every slight could reinforce that image.

But Strider isn't too concerned. The Democrats failed in 2004 he explained, by not building a media operation that could respond to the Swift Boating of John Kerry. He doesn't want Clinton to suffer from the same mistake in 2016. "One thing Nancy Pelosi has said to me is, 'Burns, in politics if you take a swing at somebody you can rest assured of one thing: They're going to swing back. So why not prepare in advance? '"

Associated Press: "Clinton Shadow in Iowa No Threat to Some Democrats"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Thomas Beaumont

August 23, 2014, 3:39 a.m. EDT

ALTOONA, Iowa (AP) — Democrats with presidential dreams are coming to Iowa with little fanfare, entourage or recognition.

They are undeterred by talk of a Hillary Rodham Clinton candidacy in 2016 or her plans to visit the leadoff caucus state next month to honor retiring Sen. Tom Harkin.

But former Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia, Sen. Amy Klobuchar of Minnesota and a few other Democrats have nothing to lose if Clinton runs, and lots to gain if she doesn't.

"I'm here to listen to people and think about things," Webb told The Associated Press with a grin.

Webb's answer, matched with his schedule, has the ring of someone on a political fact-finding mission.

The former Navy secretary spoke Thursday to the Iowa Federation of Labor's annual conference, an important gathering of Democratic opinion leaders. He also campaigned for Rep. Dave Loebsack and Senate candidate Bruce Braley and dined in Des Moines with prominent Democrats, all the while guided by Iowa-based political operative Jessica Vandenberg.

It was Webb's first such foray. He used it to set himself apart from President Barack Obama, whose job approval nationally has been below 50 percent since last year.

The president's use of executive authority "has gone way too far away from the legislative branch," Webb told the 100 labor leaders at a conference center outside Des Moines. "It certainly is outside all precedent, and the Congress should have stepped in," he added later in the interview.

But Webb, a decorated former Marine whose serious tone hardly makes the pulse race, mixed in a little humor, a time-honored political icebreaker. "I'm the only person elected to the United States Senate with a union card, two Purple Hearts and three tattoos," he told the labor conference to chuckles and applause.

On the GOP side, some potential candidates are further along in Iowa, with paid staff on the ground.

Klobuchar's scheduled trip to Iowa on Saturday was to be her third since the 2012 election. She says she would support a Clinton candidacy. But if Clinton weren't in the race, Klobuchar would have proximity to Iowa on her side.

"Right now, I'm focused on this job and I think a lot of the work I'm doing in the Senate has national implications," she told The Des Moines Register while in Iowa last year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Other Democrats who have visited Iowa include Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and former Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer. Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, an independent who is supported largely by Democrats, will be in Iowa when Clinton attends Harkin's annual fundraiser.

Making early visits before better-known prospects has its advantage, said former Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh. He spent 2006 cultivating Democratic support in Iowa, as did Mark Warner, then a former Virginia governor and now a U.S. senator. Both abandoned the idea of a presidential bid after seeing Obama emerging as likely the most promising alternative to Clinton in the 2008 race.

"I reached the conclusion that I could run, but I couldn't win," Bayh told the AP.

Others stay in, despite heavyweight rivals, to audition for top administration posts, as Vice President Joe Biden did, while others lay the groundwork for future campaigns, Bayh said.

Biden, the party's biggest potential 2016 contender not named Clinton, has not been to Iowa since headlining Harkin's event last year, but he has stayed in touch with Iowans he's befriended as a two-time candidate for president and groups who have come to Washington.

Some, however, strike it rich.

A little-known governor of Arkansas ahead of the 1992 presidential campaign, Bill Clinton made early inroads in Iowa and New Hampshire even though more prominent Democrats — New York's Mario Cuomo and Missouri's Richard Gephardt — were in the mix. Clinton had nothing to lose staying in the race, then steadily gained as the field narrowed.

"You might get some who run anyway," Bayh said. "They might catch lightning in a bottle."

AP: “Potential 2016 Candidates Cautious on Ferguson”

By Ken Thomas

August 22, 2014, 3:00 p.m. EDT

ATLANTA (AP) — The police shooting and death of Michael Brown has gripped the nation amid clashes between protesters and the police in suburban St. Louis. But for most of those who want to lead the nation, there's little to gain in an election year by taking a stand or proposing new policy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Instead, a group of potential 2016 presidential candidates are preserving their electoral prospects and retreating into safe rhetorical territory by saying very little, if anything at all.

Amid tensions over Brown's the death, Democrats and Republicans alike have been reluctant to take sides, draw any conclusions ahead of an investigation or connect the case to specific policy changes.

"As policymakers, I think we should wait and just be respectful of the community and the family before trying to tack our issue onto this tragedy," said Rep. Paul Ryan, R-Wis., who has been promoting a new book as the protests have unfolded.

For Republicans, who have struggled to win support among black voters for more than a half-century, quickly siding with law enforcement carries risk amid anger over the death of the unarmed, black 18-year-old by the hand of a white police officer.

Democrats, meanwhile, have watched as President Barack Obama, the nation's first black president, has sought to strike an appropriate tone, on one hand urging the public to remain calm in Ferguson and voicing the need for law and order while pointing to the case as another example of injustice felt by many African-Americans.

Hillary Rodham Clinton, who has been vacationing in New York's Hamptons, hasn't publicly addressed the Ferguson case, nor has Vice President Joe Biden, who was vacationing when the shooting occurred.

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie was asked about the Ferguson case during a recent town hall meeting and cautioned against politicizing it. "None of us quite know yet exactly what happened in Ferguson," said Christie, a former federal prosecutor, on Tuesday. "I've been urging people not to prejudge anything here."

Charlton McIlwain, a New York University professor who has studied race in U.S. politics, said many political leaders see little upside to discussing the racially charged incident at length. He said the portrayal of Brown and the police officer as either a hero or villain — at this stage — makes it difficult to take sides.

Clinton "like Christie and some of the others, simply don't see anything to gain from it," he said.

Civil rights leaders have urged future presidential candidates to address the unrest — most notably the Rev. Al Sharpton, who told participants at a rally last weekend that potential candidates like Clinton and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush shouldn't "get laryngitis on this issue."

"Nobody can go to the White House unless they stop by our house and talk about policing," Sharpton said.

The exception has been Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, who has urged fellow Republicans to actively seek out African-American support. He wrote in Time that the incident resembled a war and showed the need to demilitarize police departments. He wrote the combination of a military mode with the erosion of civil liberties has led many black Americans to feel that they are being unfairly targeted.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Anyone who thinks that race does not still, even if inadvertently, skew the application of criminal justice in this country is just not paying close enough attention," Paul wrote.

Massachusetts Gov. Deval Patrick, considered by some Democrats as a future presidential candidate, also offered candor, telling reporters in Boston on Wednesday that he was "sick of unarmed black men being shot by police. I'm sick of the lawlessness on the streets. I think everybody's tired of it."

In Atlanta, the Democratic National Committee plans to consider a resolution promoting community policing following the Ferguson case in its summer meeting this weekend. Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., a civil rights leader, said in an interview that "people have been almost shocked over what happened. A lot of people don't know how to respond."

Asked why Democrats like Clinton and Biden haven't discussed it yet, Lewis said, "maybe they felt that the nation should speak with maybe one voice, and that should be the president."

CNN: “Warren, through lawyer, disavows Ready for Warren”

By Dan Merica

August 22, 2014, 5:18 p.m. EDT

Elizabeth Warren is not Ready for Warren.

In a letter to the Federal Election Commission Friday, Warren fully disavowed herself of Ready for Warren, a super PAC with the explicit goal of encouraging the liberal Massachusetts senator to run for president in 2016.

"The senator has not, and does not, explicitly or implicitly, authorize, endorse, or otherwise approve of the organization's formation or activities," attorney Marc Elias said in the letter.

"To the contrary, Senator Warren has publicly announced that she is not running for president in 2016," he said.

The letter also states that Warren hopes "this organization will focus its attention and energy on maintaining Democratic control of the U.S. Senate and not confuse donors about a non-existent run for President."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Erica Sagrans, the Ready for Warren's campaign manger, told CNN the group of devotees was undeterred.

"I don't think there's anything new in this letter, and we're continuing with our campaign to draft Elizabeth Warren to run for president in 2016 because we believe she's the best person for the job," Sagrans wrote in a statement.

She continued: "We've all been clear since we launched our campaign that Senator Warren isn't associated with our group, and we aren't associated with the senator."

Responding to the Warren letter's call for focus on the midterms, Sagrans said the group will be focused on that effort and "completely agree with Senator Warren that maintaining Democratic control of the Senate in 2014 is what we need to focus on this fall."

Ready for Warren was started earlier this year in response to liberal excitement around the senator's possible candidacy in 2016 and he registered as a super PAC earlier this month.

The group is a direct response to what many liberal organizers say is an assumption of inevitability among the cadre of groups and political operatives organizing for a possible Hillary Clinton campaign.

The name itself is a play on Ready for Hillary, a group organizing for Clinton.

Warren has repeatedly said she is not running for president, telling multiple outlets the same present tense phrase: "I am not running for president."

Her disavowal of the super PAC urging her to run sets her apart from Clinton. Ready for Hillary has received tacit support from people close to Clinton and the former secretary of state has not told the group to stop.

CNN: “Democrat Jim Webb: One show not enough to fully criticize Clinton's record”

By Dan Merica

August 22, 2014, 4:35 p.m. EDT

Democrat Jim Webb needs more than one show if you want him to critique Hillary Clinton's record as secretary of state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

During an appearance on Iowa Public Television's "Iowa Press" show, Webb – a former senator from Virginia who is considered a dark horse to run for president in 2016 – was asked to critique Clinton's record at the State Department.

Webb said, "I think there's time to have that discussion later."

"Why not now?" a reporter asked.

"It would probably take up the whole show," Webb retorted. "I think there were good points when Secretary Clinton was secretary of state, particularly what they call the pivot to Asia."

But, he added, "I think the actions in the Arab Spring were probably detrimental." Webb expressed concerned about the "unilateral decision of (the Obama) administration to use force in Libya."

Webb, who said he hoped to be back in Iowa again soon, was interviewed on Iowa Press for a total of 25 minutes.

"I think we ought to have more Democrats coming out here," Webb said, seemingly encouraging more Democrats to run for president. "We need to stimulate the debate about where the country is."

Clinton, who spent four years as President Barack Obama's top diplomat, is widely considered the front runner for the Democratic nomination and is admittedly thinking about running for president.

Webb is on a two-day trip through Iowa, where he is campaigning for Bruce Braley, the Democrats' U.S. Senate candidate.

The former secretary of the Navy under President Ronald Reagan has not ruled out running for president. Webb told Diane Rehm on her nationally syndicated NPR show that he and his wife are "just thinking about what to do next."

"I care a lot about where the country is and we'll be sorting that out," Webb said. "It takes me a while to decide things, and I'm not going to say one way or the other, really."

On Thursday, WHO TV in Iowa asked Webb whether he could beat Clinton if they both decide to run in 2016.

His response: "No comment."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New York Times: “Legal Woes of Owners Help Put the Plaza Back in Play”

By Charles V. Bagli

Aug. 22, 2014

The rumor sent a shudder through the bell captain on Monday as he hustled across the lobby of the Plaza Hotel, the Manhattan landmark at Fifth Avenue and Central Park South.

A couple photographing their young children mimicking a scene from “Home Alone 2” in a marble hallway nearby said they, too, had heard the reports: Sultan Hassanal Bolkiah of Brunei had put down $2 billion for the Plaza, an elegant fixture in the city’s cultural and commercial life for more than a century, and two other high-end hotels.

After four days of reports about the sale ricocheting from London to New York to Hollywood to Mumbai to the Middle East, a spokesman for the sultan issued a statement vehemently denying that he was “involved in any way with the purchase” of the hotels.

The denial notwithstanding, this much is clear: The Plaza is in play, again, as part of a drama with an international cast of characters, two of whom are facing significant legal problems.

From his prison cell in India, one of the two, Subrata Roy, a flamboyant Asian billionaire, is trying to sell his company’s majority stakes in the Plaza, the Grosvenor House in London and the Dream New York hotel in Lower Manhattan.

The price tag: $2 billion.

“It’d be a shame for anything to happen to the Plaza,” said Sumner A. Baye, a veteran hotel consultant who happened to be sitting at a table in the hotel’s mahogany-paneled Rose Room overlooking the lobby on Monday. “It’s one of the great five-star hotels. It’s New York all the way.”

The sultan had indeed expressed interest in the hotel package, analysts said, but was dealing with other issues: His Beverly Hills and Bel-Air hotels in Los Angeles had become the subject of boycotts after he instituted laws in Brunei that permitted the stoning of gay people and adulterers. This week, the Human Rights Campaign threatened to extend the boycotts to the Plaza if the sultan were to acquire the property.

There had been whispers of other potential international buyers taking a look at the Plaza and the other hotels in Mr. Roy's portfolio. Prince Al-Waleed bin Talal of Saudi Arabia — a billionaire investor who already owns a slice of the Plaza as well as stakes in the Ritz Carlton and Fairmont chains — was supposedly among those who were interested.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But, Mr. Baye said, "He told me a month ago, 'There's no way I would pay the money they're looking for.' "

While they inhabit a rarefied world, five-star hotels are as popular among the superwealthy today as an 8,000-square-foot, $95 million apartment in one of the slim skyscrapers rising on West 57th Street along what has come to be known as Billionaire's Row.

And the Plaza is one of the best-known five-star hotels in the world.

It opened in 1907 as the city's most luxurious hotel, with the neo-Classical Palm Court for tea and the dark-paneled Oak Room bar for drinks. Today, the rooms feature Beaux-Arts décor, 24-karat gold-plated fixtures, solid white-marble vanities and, the hotel's website says, the "finest Italian bath towels and linens."

The guests who have swirled below the hotel's hundreds of chandeliers include Alfred and Gwynne Vanderbilt, F. Scott and Zelda Fitzgerald, Marilyn Monroe and the Beatles. (And, of course, there was Eloise.)

Despite — or, perhaps, because of — its lofty rates, the Plaza has been further embedded in the popular culture through its appearances in a string of films, from "The Great Gatsby" and "The Way We Were" to "Barefoot in the Park" and "Home Alone 2."

"It's one of a handful of five-star hotels in New York, in terms of amenities, location and room rates," said Thomas P. McConnell, who heads the global hotel group at Cushman & Wakefield, a real estate broker. "It's competitive with the Pierre, the St. Regis, Four Seasons, Ritz Carlton, the Mandarin Oriental and two new entrants, the Park Hyatt and the Baccarat."

Now the Plaza is on the market again. But ownership of the 19-story, chateaulike building is complicated in ways that require a scorecard to decipher. Anyone buying Mr. Roy's stake would be getting only a fraction of the landmark.

First, a bit of the property's more recent history. Donald J. Trump, who fell in love with the Plaza in the 1980s, bought it for $390 million in 1988. Under pressure from his lenders, Mr. Trump sold the hotel in 1995 for $325 million to Prince Al-Waleed, who brought in Fairmont to manage the property.

Nine years later, in 2004, the prince sold the hotel for $675 million to an Israeli company, the Elad Group, which planned dramatic changes and a three-year, $450 million renovation for the 805-room hotel.

Miki Naftali, who oversaw the project but no longer works for Elad, carved the Plaza into four pieces. Half of the building was converted to 181 apartments, which eventually sold for a combined $1.4 billion. The

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Oak Room bar, some shops and a basement food court were turned into a retail portion. A 131-room hotel for overnight guests was the third piece. The fourth comprised 150 condominium-hotel units, which were managed through the hotel. Eventually, 50 of those units were sold to private owners, essentially as time-share units.

Elad sold a 50 percent interest in the 131-room hotel and a 25 percent interest in the condominium-hotel units to Prince Al-Waleed, while keeping the retail block.

In 2012, Mr. Roy, the chairman of the Sahara Group, paid Elad $570 million for 50 percent of the hotel, 100 of the hotel-condominium units and the retail portion. That is what he is now trying to sell. (Prince Al-Waleed retains his piece of the property.)

After taking over the Plaza, Mr. Roy brought in Sant Singh Chatwal, an Indian-American hotelier, giving him what analysts said was a 5 percent stake and putting him in charge of the Oak Room, which has been closed since 2011, and the Palm Court, which is being renovated and scheduled to reopen in September.

But Mr. Roy was charged with contempt earlier this year by the Indian Supreme Court, which accused Sahara of making illegal investments. He was jailed in New Delhi, with bail set at $3 billion. He has reportedly been trying to sell assets, including the Plaza and his other hotels, to raise that sum.

Mr. Roy's partner, Mr. Chatwal, has his own legal troubles. A prominent fund-raiser for Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential run in 2008, Mr. Chatwal pleaded guilty in Federal District Court in Brooklyn in April to witness tampering and funneling more than $180,000 in illegal contributions to three candidates, Ms. Clinton among them, between 2007 and 2011.

Mr. Chatwal, whose office declined to comment, is set to be sentenced in October.

Interested observers hope that, for the Plaza, the end result will be positive.

"I think it's time to see some stability at the Plaza," Mr. Naftali said. "Hopefully, the new buyers will have it for a long time."

National Memo column: Cynthia Tucker: "Hillary Clinton's Hawkishness May Be Her Undoing"

By Cynthia Tucker

August 23, 2014, 12:00 a.m. EDT

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Even without a formal declaration of her intent to run, Hillary Clinton is the presumed Democratic nominee for president in 2016. She has earned that status through two decades of hard work on the national stage — as First Lady, as a senator from New York, and, especially, as a loyal and energetic secretary of state in the administration of her former rival, Barack Obama.

But Clinton's presumed bid for the presidency — a historic run she's unlikely to turn down — is threatened by the same unfortunate tendency that cost her in 2008: presumption. She seems oblivious to national trends that make some of her stances unpopular.

Nothing better illustrates that presumption than her continued hawkishness, a trait on full display in her interview earlier this month with Jeffrey Goldberg of The Atlantic Monthly. While Washington pundits focused on her curt dismissal of a few words the president allegedly spoke to reporters — "Great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle," she said — the substance of her argument is much more troubling than that.

She insisted that if Obama had intervened in Syria, if he had just agreed to arm Syrian moderates, jihadists such as the bloodthirsty cohort of the Islamic State might have been halted in their tracks.

"The failure to help build up a credible fighting force of the people who were the originators of the protests against Assad — there were Islamists, there were secularists, there was everything in the middle — the failure to do that left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled," Clinton said.

That sentiment drew huge cheers from the left-of-center interventionists, as well as the neo-cons, who still occupy positions of influence on the national stage. But it contrasts sharply with average voters, the regular Joes who recognize the limits of American power. Polls show that they want nothing to do with more foreign entanglements that don't directly reflect U.S. interests.

They remember that even deploying military advisors often leads to more boots on the ground, more American dead. And those dead are unlikely to come from the ranks of powerful politicians or diplomats or journalists, but rather from the working classes. More to the point, mainstream voters want their politicians to concentrate on fixing a broken economy here at home, not on fixing broken nations halfway around the world.

Last fall, 52 percent of the public said the U.S. should "mind its own business internationally and let other countries get along the best they can on their own," according to the Pew Research Center. It was the first time since 1964 that more than half the country held that view, Pew said.

Given the half-hearted economic recovery, it's no wonder that voters want their politicians to focus on rebuilding the broad American middle class. While Washington politicians and the scribes who cover them are doing just fine, much of the country has yet to mount a full comeback from the Great Recession.

Moreover, it turns out that voters' skepticism toward foreign interventions is supported by research, which shows that arming "moderates" was likely to backfire.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Recently, political scientist Marc Lynch, writing in The Washington Post, summarized the data this way:

"In general, external support for rebels almost always makes wars longer, bloodier and harder to resolve. … Worse … Syria had most of the characteristics of the type of civil war in which external support for rebels is least effective."

To be fair, Clinton didn't suggest sending U.S. troops into Syria. Still, her criticism of Obama's approach shows a tone-deafness, a calculated disregard for the attitude most Americans now hold toward foreign interventions. Sometimes, that sort of brush-off of popular sentiment is a hallmark of genuine leadership. In this case, it's just arrogance.

Clinton should know better. She was defeated for the Democratic nomination by a lesser-known senator largely because his opposition to the war in Iraq, by then a clear disaster, contrasted with her support for it. While she won't face Obama in 2016, she might find herself up against Republican Sen. Rand Paul in the general election. And his skepticism toward military interventions could prove more popular than her stubborn, ill-advised hawkishness.

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "Romney and Ryan talk Hillary Clinton, and 2016: 'She's beatable'"

By Robert Costa

August 22, 2014, 1:31 p.m. EDT

A little after 9 p.m. Thursday night, in a small room at the Union League Club of Chicago, Mitt Romney and Paul Ryan were trying to find towels. Romney's shoulders were soaking, his normally well-brushed hair matted and wet. A few minutes earlier, the GOP's 2012 vice presidential nominee had doused his ticket-mate with a heaping pail of ice water to raise awareness for Lou Gehrig's Disease.

"What's going through my head? A bucket of cold water," Romney said to Ryan as they sat down for their first joint print interview since their defeat in the 2012 presidential election.

"It was pretty good — and it'll be on YouTube," Ryan laughed.

Relaxing with Ryan before they both headed off to different cities, the second-place finisher in the last presidential race railed against the frontrunner in the next, mocking Hillary Clinton's attempt to "reset" relations with Russia during President Obama's first term.

"Looking at her record, seeing how ineffective she was in securing more security, is going to be a great handicap for her in the general election," said Romney. "I don't think it'll hurt her in the primary, but it will in the general.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"That picture of her with the foreign minister of Russia, smiling ear to ear with that red reset button, I presume that's going to be an ad. Of all the miscalculations in foreign-policy history, that stands out as an unfortunate one."

His former running mate also downplayed Clinton's fall odds. "She's beatable," said Ryan. "Her assets are her name identification, her ability to fundraise, and her campaign experience. Her liabilities are policies and track record. She was one of the architects of the Obama foreign policy.

"I also think there may be a little fatigue," he added. "People will be looking for someone new. She may be riding high now, but people may decide against having another four years of this kind of governing."

Alluding to some of the unrest in the GOP over foreign policy – the friction between the camp of Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) and those who seek a more muscular foreign policy -- Romney said now is "not the time for academic debates."

"Our party has to come together, or we will continue with a third term of Barack Obama, with an agenda led by President Obama and Harry Reid," said the former Massachusetts governor. "That agenda has led us to a foreign policy vacuum that is threatening the things we hold dear, including our own safety."

Trail-ready language like that – along with a string of state-level appearances and robust candidate support -- has stoked GOP chatter about a possible third Romney run for the Oval Office.

It's a revival few expected. But Romney has seen his political capital ascend in Republican circles over the past year, with the well-reviewed Netflix documentary "MITT" and his many appearances for GOP candidates reviving his reputation in a party that never fully embraced him as its standard-bearer. Carefully picking where he campaigns, he's been able to play elder statesman in financial rainmaker in several Senate and gubernatorial races.

This month alone, Romney has campaigned in Arkansas, West Virginia, and North Carolina. In September, he's planning visits to the presidential swing states of Colorado and Virginia.

Ryan has stoked 2016 chatter at times himself, such as when he visited Iowa in April to speak to state Republicans. But his pitch there seemed to be more about seeking to soothe the roiling divisions in the GOP than positioning himself for a presidential bid. He has not been to New Hampshire since January 2013. And his colleagues in the House GOP said his excitement about taking over the powerful House Ways and Means Committee next year is the clearest sign yet that his attention for the short term is on Capitol Hill, rather than on making till-the-soil trips to early primary states.

Still, for a party that has no frontrunner for the 2016 presidential nomination, Romney and Ryan represent two potential candidates who many see as natural possibilities, given their experience -- and their lack of legal headaches, which have plagued other White house contenders like Gov. Chris Christie (R-N.J.) as he has dealt with a bridge-closing scandal, and Gov. Rick Perry (R-Tex.), who was recently indicted for alleged abuse of power.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Speaking Thursday in Chicago, Romney and Ryan teased the audience by encouraging each other to seek the White House.

“Third time’s the charm,” Ryan said of Romney. Romney’s reply: Ryan “wouldn’t be a bad president” himself. The conservative business crowd there ate it up, laughing and applauding.

“As you see how things have gone, I think we’re at an ‘I told you so’ moment,” Ryan said later. “Mitt is being vindicated on foreign policy and on domestic policy. I think people are seeing that his projections were correct and the kind person he is.”

He turned to Romney. “You know, I haven’t even told you this, but that documentary on Netflix gives people the view of the person we know,” he said. “It shows that we missed an opportunity to elect someone who would’ve been a great president. People seem to be reassessing.”

Still, Romney himself continues to dismiss the odds of a hat trick campaign.

“My posture, and I’ve explained this many times, is that I’m not running, but I hope Paul will give it thought and there are other good people in the party giving thought, getting things organized,” he said. “I think you’ll see a very crowded debate in the first debate or two, and then hopefully narrow it down to someone who can express our vision to help the middle class in America and win in the general election.”

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· August 24 – Westhampton, NY: Sec. Clinton signs “Hard Choices” at Books & Books (hillaryclintonmemoir.com)

· August 28 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton keynotes Nexenta’s OpenSDx Summit (BusinessWire)

· September 4 – Las Vegas, NV: Sec. Clinton speaks at the National Clean Energy Summit (Solar Novis Today)

· September 9 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton fundraises for the DSCC at her Washington home (DSCC)

· September 14 – Indianola, IA: Sec. Clinton headlines Sen. Harkin’s Steak Fry (LA Times)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

· October ? – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton fundraises for House Democratic women candidates with Nancy Pelosi (The Hill)

· October 2 – Miami Beach, FL: Sec. Clinton keynotes the CREW Network Convention & Marketplace (CREW Network)

· October 13 – Las Vegas, NV: Sec. Clinton keynotes the UNLV Foundation Annual Dinner (UNLV)

· October 14 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton keynotes salesforce.com Dreamforce conference (salesforce.com)

· December 4 – Boston, MA: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Massachusetts Conference for Women (MCFW)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Rudy deLeon" <rdeleon@americanprogress.org>
To: "Rudy deLeon" <rdeleon@americanprogress.org>
Date: 4/7/2015 11:05:34 AM
Subject: New Yorker Article on President Xi Jinping

This is from the current issue of the New Yorker. If you read our private trip report from 2013, you would find that we previewed many of these issues.

Profiles April 6, 2015 Issue

Born Red

How Xi Jinping, an unremarkable provincial administrator, became China's most authoritarian leader since Mao.

BY EVAN OSNOS

When Xi was fourteen, Red Guards warned, "We can execute you a hundred times." He joined the Communist Party at twenty. CREDIT ILLUSTRATION BY TAVIS COBURN

In anticipation of New Year's Eve, 2014, Xi Jinping, the President of China and the General Secretary of the Chinese Communist Party, permitted a camera crew to come into his office and record a message to the people. As a teen-ager, Xi had been sent to work on a farm; he was so delicate that other laborers rated him a six on a ten-point scale, "not even as high as the women," he said later, with some embarrassment. Now, at sixty-one, Xi was five feet eleven, taller than any Chinese leader in nearly four decades, with a rich baritone and a confident heft. When he received a guest, he stood still, long arms slack, hair pomaded, a portrait of take-it-or-leave-it composure that induced his visitor to cross the room in pursuit of a handshake.

Xi's predecessor, Hu Jintao, read his annual New Year's greeting from a lectern in an antiseptic reception hall. Xi, who took office in November, 2012, has associated himself with an earthier generation of Communists, a military caste that emphasized "hard work and plain living." He delivered his New Year's message at his desk. Behind him, bookshelves held photographs that depicted him as Commander-in-Chief and family man. In one picture, he was wearing Army fatigues and a fur hat, visiting soldiers in a snowfield; in another, he was strolling with his wife and daughter, and escorting his father, Xi Zhongxun, a hallowed revolutionary, in a wheelchair. The shelves also held matching sets of books. Xi's classroom education was interrupted for nearly a decade by the Cultural Revolution, and he has the autodidact's habit of announcing his literary credentials. He often quotes from Chinese classics, and in an interview with the Russian press last year he volunteered that he had read Krylov, Pushkin, Gogol, Lermontov, Turgenev, Dostoyevsky, Nekrasov, Chernyshevsky, Tolstoy, Chekhov, and Sholokhov. When he visited France, he mentioned that he had read Montesquieu, Voltaire, Rousseau, Diderot, Saint-Simon, Fourier, Sartre, and twelve others. In his New Year's remarks, Xi oscillated between socialist slogans ("Wave high the sword against corruption") and catchphrases from Chinese social media ("I would like to click the thumbs-up button for our great people"). He vowed to fight poverty, improve the rule of law, and hold fast to history. When he listed the achievements of the past year, he praised the creation of a holiday dedicated to the Second World War: "Victory Day of the Chinese People's War of Resistance Against Japanese Aggression."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Xi is the sixth man to rule the People's Republic of China, and the first who was born after the revolution, in 1949. He sits atop a pyramid of eighty-seven million members of the Communist Party, an organization larger than the population of Germany. The Party no longer reaches into every corner of Chinese life, as it did in the nineteen-seventies, but Xi nevertheless presides over an economy that, by one measure, recently surpassed the American economy in size; he holds ultimate authority over every general, judge, editor, and state-company C.E.O. As Lenin ordained, in 1902, "For the center . . . to actually direct the orchestra, it needs to know who plays violin and where, who plays a false note and why."

Xi's New Year's message was broadcast on state television and radio channels at 6:30 P.M., just before the evening news. A few hours later, the news veered sharply out of his control. In Shanghai, a large holiday crowd had gathered to celebrate on the Bund, the promenade beside the Huangpu River, with splendid views of the skyline. The crowd was growing faster than the space could handle. Around 11:30 P.M., the police sent hundreds of extra officers to keep order, but it was too late; a stairway was jammed, and people shouted and pushed. A stampede ensued. In all, thirty-six people suffocated or were trampled to death.

The disaster occurred in one of China's most modern and prosperous places, and the public was appalled. In the days that followed, the Shanghai government held a memorial for the victims, and encouraged people to move on; Internet censors struck down discussion of who was responsible; police interrogated Web users who posted criticisms of the state. When relatives of the victims visited the site of the stampede, police watched them closely, and then erected metal barriers to render it unreachable. Caixin, an investigative media organization, revealed that, during the stampede, local officials in charge of the neighborhood were enjoying a banquet of sushi and sake, at the government's expense, in a private room at the Empty Cicada, a luxury restaurant nearby. This was awkward news, because one of the President's first diktats had been "Eight Rules" for public servants, to eliminate extravagance and corruption. Among other things, the campaign called on officials to confine themselves to "four dishes and one soup." (Eventually, eleven officials were punished for misusing funds and for failing to prevent a risk to the public.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A few weeks after the incident in Shanghai, I paid a call on a longtime editor in Beijing, whose job gives him a view into the workings of the Party. When I arrived at his apartment, his kids were in raucous control of the living room, so we retreated to his bedroom to talk. When I asked him how President Xi was doing, he mentioned the banquet at the Empty Cicada. He thought it pointed to a problem that is much deeper than a few high-living bureaucrats. "The central government issued an order absolutely forbidding them to dine out on public funds. And they did it anyway!" he said. "What this tells you is that local officials are finding their ways of responding to change. There is a saying: 'When a rule is imposed up high, there is a way to get around it below.' " The struggle between an emperor and his bureaucracy follows a classic pattern in Chinese politics, and it rarely ends well for the emperor. But the editor was betting on Xi. "He's not afraid of Heaven or Earth. And he is, as we say, round on the outside and square on the inside; he looks flexible, but inside he is very hard."

Before Xi took power, he was described, in China and abroad, as an unremarkable provincial administrator, a fan of American pop culture ("The Godfather," "Saving Private Ryan") who cared more about business than about politics, and was selected mainly because he had alienated fewer peers than his competitors. It was an incomplete portrait. He had spent more than three decades in public life, but Chinese politics had exposed him to limited scrutiny. At a press conference, a local reporter once asked Xi to rate his performance: "Would you give yourself a score of a hundred—or a score of ninety?" (Neither, Xi said; a high number would look "boastful," and a low number would reflect "low self-esteem.")

But, a quarter of the way through his ten-year term, he has emerged as the most authoritarian leader since Chairman Mao. In the name of protection and purity, he has investigated tens of thousands of his countrymen, on charges ranging from corruption to leaking state secrets and inciting the overthrow of the state. He has acquired or created ten titles for himself, including not only head of state and head of the military but also leader of the Party's most powerful committees—on foreign policy, Taiwan, and the economy. He has installed himself as the head of new bodies overseeing the Internet, government restructuring, national security, and military reform, and he has effectively taken over the courts, the police, and the secret police. "He's at the center of everything," Gary Locke, the former American Ambassador to Beijing, told me.

In the Chinese Communist Party, you campaign after you get the job, not before, and in building public support and honing a message Xi has revealed a powerful desire for transformation. He calls on China to pursue the Chinese Dream: the "great rejuvenation of the nation," a mixture of prosperity, unity, and strength. He has proposed at least sixty social and economic changes, ranging from relaxing the one-child policy to eliminating camps for "reëducation through labor" and curtailing state monopolies. He has sought prestige abroad; on his first foreign trip (to Moscow), he was accompanied by his wife, a celebrity soprano named Peng Liyuan, who inspired lavish coverage of China's first modern Presidential couple. Peng soon appeared on Vanity Fair's Best-Dressed List.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After Mao, China encouraged the image of a "collective Presidency" over the importance of individual leaders. Xi has revised that approach, and his government, using old and new tools, has enlarged his image. In the spirit of Mao's Little Red Book, publishers have produced eight volumes of Xi's speeches and writings; the most recent, titled "The Remarks of Xi Jinping," dissects his utterances, ranks his favorite phrases, and explains his cultural references. A study of the People's Daily found that, by his second anniversary in office, Xi was appearing in the paper more than twice as often as his predecessor at the same point. He stars in a series of cartoons aimed at young people, beginning with "How to Make a Leader," which describes him, despite his family pedigree, as a symbol of meritocracy—"one of the secrets of the China miracle." The state news agency has taken the unprecedented step of adopting a nickname for the General Secretary: Xi Dada—roughly, Big Uncle Xi. In January, the Ministry of Defense released oil paintings depicting him in heroic poses; thousands of art students applying to the Beijing University of Technology had been judged on their ability to sketch his likeness. The Beijing Evening News reported that one applicant admired the President so much that "she had to work hard to stop her hands from trembling."

To outsiders, Xi has been a fitful subject. Bookstores in Hong Kong, which are insulated from mainland control, offer portraits of varying quality—the most reliable include "The New Biography of Xi Jinping," by Liang Jian, and "China's Future," by Wu Ming—but most are written at a remove, under pseudonyms. The clearest account of Xi's life and influences comes from his own words and decisions, scattered throughout a long climb to power.

Kevin Rudd, the former Prime Minister of Australia, a Mandarin speaker who has talked with Xi at length over the years, told me, "What he says is what he thinks. My experience of him is that there's not a lot of artifice."

In a leadership known for grooming colorless apparatchiks, Xi projects an image of manly vigor. He mocks "eggheads" and praises the "team spirit of a group of dogs eating a lion." In a meeting in March, 2013, he told the Russian President, Vladimir Putin, "We are similar in character," though Xi is less inclined toward bare-chested machismo. Xi admires Song Jiang, a fictional outlaw from "Water Margin," a fourteenth-century Chinese classic, for his ability to "unite capable people." Neither brilliant nor handsome, Song Jiang led a band of heroic rebels. In a famous passage, he speaks of the Xunyang River: "I shall have my revenge some day / And dye red with blood the Xunyang's flow."

Xi describes his essential project as a rescue: he must save the People's Republic and the Communist Party before they are swamped by corruption; environmental pollution; unrest in Hong Kong, Xinjiang, and other regions; and the pressures imposed by an economy that is growing more slowly than at any time since 1990 (though still at about seven per cent, the fastest pace of any major country). "The tasks our Party faces in reform, development, and stability are more onerous than ever, and the conflicts, dangers, and challenges are more numerous than ever," Xi told the Politburo, in October. In 2014, the government arrested nearly a thousand members of civil society, more than in any year since the mid-nineteen-nineties, following the Tiananmen Square massacre, according to Chinese Human Rights Defenders, a Hong Kong-based advocacy group.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Xi unambiguously opposes American democratic notions. In 2011 and 2012, he spent several days with Vice-President Joe Biden, his official counterpart at the time, in China and the United States. Biden told me that Xi asked him why the U.S. put "so much emphasis on human rights." Biden replied to Xi, "No President of the United States could represent the United States were he not committed to human rights," and went on, "If you don't understand this, you can't deal with us. President Barack Obama would not be able to stay in power if he did not speak of it. So look at it as a political imperative. It doesn't make us better or worse. It's who we are. You make your decisions. We'll make ours."

In Xi's early months, supporters in the West speculated that he wanted to silence hard-line critics, and would open up later, perhaps in his second term, which begins in 2017. That view has largely disappeared. Henry Paulson, the former Treasury Secretary, whose upcoming book, "Dealing with China," describes a decade of contact with Xi, told me, "He has been very forthright and candid—privately and publicly—about the fact that the Chinese are rejecting Western values and multiparty democracy." He added, "To Westerners, it seems very incongruous to be, on the one hand, so committed to fostering more competition and market-driven flexibility in the economy and, on the other hand, to be seeking more control in the political sphere, the media, and the Internet. But that's the key: he sees a strong Party as essential to stability, and the only institution that's strong enough to help him accomplish his other goals."

In his determination to gain control and protect the Party, Xi may have generated a different kind of threat: he has pried apart internal fault lines and shaken the equilibrium that for a generation marked the nation's rise. Before Xi took power, top officials presumed that they were protected. Yu Hua, the novelist, told me, "As China grew, what really came to matter were the 'unwritten rules.' When the real rules weren't specific enough or clear enough, when policies and laws lagged behind reality, you always relied on the unwritten rules." They dictated everything from how much to tip a surgeon to how far an N.G.O. could go before it was suppressed. "The unwritten rules have been broken," Yu said. "This is how it should be, of course, but laws haven't arrived yet."

The Communist Party dedicated itself to a classless society but organized itself in a rigid hierarchy, and Xi started life near the top. He was born in Beijing in 1953, the third of four children. His father, Xi Zhongxun, China's propaganda minister at the time, had been fomenting revolution since the age of fourteen, when he and his classmates tried to poison a teacher whom they considered a counterrevolutionary. He was sent to jail, where he joined the Communist Party, and eventually he became a high-ranking commander, which plunged him into the Party's internal feuds. In 1935, a rival faction accused Xi of disloyalty and ordered him to be buried alive, but Mao defused the crisis. At a Party meeting in February, 1952, Mao stated that the "suppression of counterrevolutionaries" required, on average, the execution of one person for every one thousand to two thousand citizens. Xi Zhongxun endorsed "severe suppression and punishment," but in his area "killing was relatively lower," according to his official biography.

Xi Jinping grew up with his father's stories. "He talked about how he joined the revolution, and he'd say, 'You will certainly make revolution in the future,' " Xi recalled in a 2004 interview with the Xi'an Evening News, a state-run paper. "He'd explain what revolution is. We heard so much of this that our ears got calluses." In six decades of politics, his father had seen or deployed every tactic. At dinner with the elder Xi in 1980, David Lampton, a China specialist at the School of Advanced International Studies at Johns Hopkins, marvelled that he could toast dozens of guests, over glasses of Maotai, with no visible effects. "It became apparent that he was drinking water," Lampton said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When Xi Jinping was five, his father was promoted to Vice-Premier, and the son often visited him at Zhongnanhai, the secluded compound for top leaders. Xi was admitted to the exclusive August 1st School, named for the date of a famous Communist victory. The school, which occupied the former palace of a Qing Dynasty prince, was nicknamed the lingxiu yaolan—the "cradle of leaders." The students formed a small, close-knit élite; they lived in the same compounds, summered at the same retreats, and shared a sense of noblesse oblige. For centuries before the People's Republic, an evolving list of élite clans combined wealth and politics. Some sons handled business; others pursued high office. Winners changed over time, and, when Communist leaders prevailed, in 1949, they acquired the mantle. "The common language used to describe this was that they had 'won over tianxia'—'all under Heaven,' " Yang Guobin, a sociologist at the University of Pennsylvania, told me. "They believed they had a natural claim to leadership. They owned it. And their children thought, naturally, they themselves would be, and should be, the future owners." As the historian Mi Hedu observes in his 1993 book, "The Red Guard Generation," students at the August 1st School "compared one another on the basis of whose father had a higher rank, whose father rode in a better car. Some would say, 'Obey whoever's father has the highest position.' " When the Cultural Revolution began, in 1966, Beijing students who were zilaihong ("born red") promoted a slogan: "If the father is a hero, the son is also a hero; if the father is a reactionary, the son is a bastard." Red Guards sought to cleanse the capital of opposition, to make it "as pure and clean as crystal," they said. From late August to late September, 1966, nearly two thousand people were killed in Beijing, and at least forty-nine hundred historical sites were damaged or destroyed, according to Yiching Wu, the author of "The Cultural Revolution at the Margins."

But Xi Jinping did not fit cleanly into the role of either aggressor or victim. In 1962, his father was accused of supporting a novel that Mao opposed, and was sent to work in a factory; his mother, Qi Xin, was assigned to hard labor on a farm. In January, 1967, after Mao encouraged students to target "class enemies," a group of young people dragged Xi Zhongxun before a crowd. Among other charges, he was accused of having gazed at West Berlin through binoculars during a visit to East Germany years earlier. He was detained in a military garrison, where he passed the years by walking in circles, he said later—ten thousand laps, and then ten thousand walking backward. The son was too young to be an official Red Guard, and his father's status made him undesirable. Moreover, being born red was becoming a liability. Élite academies were accused of being xiao baota—"little treasure pagodas"—and shut down. Xi and the sons of other targeted officials stayed together, getting into street fights and swiping books from shuttered libraries. Later, Xi described that period as a dystopian collapse of control. He was detained "three or four times" by groups of Red Guards, and forced to denounce his father. In 2000, he told the journalist Yang Xiaohuai about being captured by a group loyal to the wife of the head of China's secret police:

> I was only fourteen. The Red Guards asked, "How serious do you yourself think your crimes are?"
> "You can estimate it yourselves. Is it enough to execute me?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We can execute you a hundred times."

To my mind there was no difference between being executed a hundred times or once, so why be afraid of a hundred times? The Red Guards wanted to scare me, saying that now I was to feel the democratic dictatorship of the people, and that I only had five minutes left. But in the end, they told me, instead, to read quotations from Chairman Mao every day until late at night.

In December, 1968, in a bid to regain control, Mao ordered the Red Guards and other students to the countryside, to be "reëducated by the poor and lower-middle-class peasants." Élite families sent their children to regions that had allies or family, and Xi went to his father's old stronghold in Shaanxi. He was assigned to Liangjiahe, a village flanked by yellow cliffs. "The intensity of the labor shocked me," Xi recalled in a 2004 television interview. To avoid work, he took up smoking—nobody bothered a man smoking—and lingered in the bathroom. After three months, he fled to Beijing, but he was arrested and returned to the village. In what later became the centerpiece of his official narrative, Xi was reborn. A recent state-news-service article offers the mythology: "Xi lived in a cave dwelling with villagers, slept on a kang, a traditional Chinese bed made of bricks and clay, endured flea bites, carried manure, built dams and repaired roads." It leaves out some brutal details. At one point, he received a letter informing him that his older half-sister Xi Heping had died. The Australian journalist John Garnaut, the author of an upcoming book on the rise of Xi and his cohort, said, "It was suicide. Close associates have said to me, on the record, that after a decade of persecution she hanged herself from a shower rail."

Xi chose to join the Communist Party's Youth League. Because of his father's status, his application was rejected seven times, by his count. After Xi befriended a local official, he was accepted. In January, 1974, he gained full Party membership and became secretary of the village. His drive to join the Party baffled some of his peers. A longtime friend who became a professor later told an American diplomat that he felt "betrayed" by Xi's ambition to "join the system." According to a U.S. diplomatic cable recounting his views, many in Xi's élite cohort were desperate to escape politics; they dated, drank, and read Western literature. They were "trying to catch up for lost years by having fun," the professor said. He eventually concluded that Xi was "exceptionally ambitious," and knew that he would "not be special" outside China, so he "chose to survive by becoming redder than the red." After all, Yang Guobin told me, referring to the sons of the former leaders, "the sense of ownership did not die. A sense of pride and superiority persisted, and there was some confidence that their fathers' adversity would be temporary and sooner or later they would make a comeback. That's exactly what happened."

The following year, Xi enrolled at Tsinghua University as a "worker-peasant-soldier" student (applicants who were admitted on the basis of political merit rather than test scores). That spring, Xi Zhongxun was rehabilitated, after sixteen years of persecution. When the family reunited, he could not recognize his grown sons. His faith never wavered. In November, 1976, he wrote to Hua Guofeng, the head of the Party, asking for reassignment, in order to "devote the rest of my life to the Party and strive to do more for the people." He signed it, "Xi Zhongxun, a Follower of Chairman Mao and a Party Member Who Has Not Regained Admission to Regular Party Activities."

Xi Jinping's pedigree had exposed him to a brutal politics—purges, retribution, rehabilitation—and he drew blunt lessons from it. In a 2000 interview with the journalist Chen Peng, of the Beijing-based Chinese Times, Xi said, "People who have little experience with power, those who have been far away from it, tend to regard these things as mysterious and novel. But I look past the superficial things: the power and the flowers and the glory and the applause. I see the detention houses, the fickleness of human relationships. I understand politics on a deeper level." The Cultural Revolution and his years in Yan'an, the region where he was sent as a teen-ager, had created him. "Yan'an is the starting point of my life," he said in 2007. "Many of the fundamental ideas and qualities I have today were formed in Yan'an." Rudd, the former Australian Prime Minister, told me, "The bottom line in any understanding of who Xi Jinping is must begin with his dedication to the Party as an institution—despite the fact that through his personal life, and his political life, he has experienced the best of the Party and the worst of the Party."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Xi's siblings scattered: his brother and a sister went into business in Hong Kong, the other sister reportedly settled in Canada. But Xi stayed and, year by year, invested more deeply in the Party. After graduating, in 1979, he took a coveted job as an aide to Geng Biao, a senior defense official whom Xi's father called "my closest comrade-in-arms" from the revolution. Xi wore a military uniform and made valuable connections at Party headquarters. Not long after college, he married Ke Xiaoming, the cosmopolitan daughter of China's Ambassador to Britain. But they fought "almost every day," according to the professor, who lived across the hall. He told the diplomat that the couple divorced when Ke decided to move to England and Xi stayed behind.

China's revolutionaries were aging, and the Party needed to groom new leaders. Xi told the professor that going to the provinces was the "only path to central power." Staying at Party headquarters in Beijing would narrow his network and invite resentment from lesser-born peers. In 1982, shortly before Xi turned thirty, he asked to be sent back to the countryside, and was assigned to a horse-cart county in Hebei Province. He wanted to be the county secretary—the boss—but the provincial chief resented privileged offspring from Party headquarters and made Xi the No. 2. It was the Chinese equivalent of trading an executive suite at the Pentagon for a mid-level post in rural Virginia.

Within a year, though, Xi was promoted, and he honed his political skills. He gave perks to retired cadres who could shape his reputation; he arranged for them to receive priority at doctors' offices; when he bought the county's first imported car, he donated it to the "veteran-cadre office," and used an old jeep for himself. He retained his green Army-issue trousers to convey humility, and he learned the value of political theatrics: at times, "if you don't bang on the table, it's not frightening enough, and people won't take it seriously," he told a Chinese interviewer in 2003. He experimented with market economics, by allowing farmers to use more land for raising animals instead of growing grain for the state, and he pushed splashy local projects, including the construction of a television studio based on the classic novel "A Dream of Red Mansions."

In 1985, he spent two weeks in Iowa as part of an agricultural delegation. In the town of Muscatine, he stayed with Eleanor and Thomas Dvorchak. "The boys had gone off to college, so there were some spare bedrooms," Eleanor told me. Xi slept in a room with football-themed wallpaper and "Star Trek" action figures. "He was looking out the window, and it seemed like he was saying, 'Oh, my God,' and I thought, What's so unusual? It's just a split-level," she said. Xi did not introduce himself as a Communist Party secretary; his business card identified him as the head of the Shijiazhuang Feed Association. In 2012, on a trip to the U.S. before becoming top leader, he returned to Muscatine, to see Dvorchak and others, trailed by the world press. She said, “No one in their right mind would ever think that that guy who stayed in my house would become the President. I don’t care what country you’re talking about.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By 1985, Xi was ready for another promotion, but the provincial Party head blocked him again, so he moved to the southern province of Fujian, where one of his father’s friends was the Party secretary, and could help him. Not long after he arrived, he met Liao Wanlong, a Taiwanese businessman, who recalled, “He was tall and stocky, and he looked a little dopey.” Liao, who has visited Xi repeatedly in the decades since, told me, “He appeared to be guileless, honest. He came from the north and he didn’t understand the south well.” Liao went on, “He would speak only if he really had something to say, and he didn’t make casual promises. He would think everything through before opening his mouth. He rarely talked about his family, because he had a difficult past and a disappointing marriage.” Xi didn’t have a questing mind, but he excelled at managing his image and his relationships; he was now meeting foreign investors, so he stopped wearing Army fatigues and adopted a wardrobe of Western suits. Liao said, “Not everyone could get an audience with him; he would screen those who wanted to meet him. He was a good judge of people.”

The following year, when Xi was thirty-three, a friend introduced him to Peng Liyuan, who, at twenty-four, was already one of China’s most famous opera and folk singers. Xi told her that he didn’t watch television, she recalled in a 2007 interview. “What kind of songs do you sing?” he asked. Peng thought that he looked “uncultured and much older than his age,” but he asked her questions about singing technique, which she took as a sign of intelligence. Xi later said that he decided within forty minutes to ask her to marry him. They married the following year, and in 1989, after the crackdown on student demonstrators, Peng was among the military singers who were sent to Tiananmen Square to serenade the troops. (Images of that scene, along with information about Peng’s private life and her commercial dealings, have been largely expunged from the Web.) In 1992, they had a daughter. As it became clear that Xi would be a top leader, Peng gave up the diva gowns and elaborate hairdos in favor of pants suits and the occasional military uniform. Fans still mobbed her, while he stood patiently to the side, but for the most part she stopped performing and turned her attention to activism around H.I.V., tobacco control, and women’s education. For years, Xi and Peng spent most of their time apart. But, in the flurry of attention around Big Uncle Xi, the state-run media has promoted a pop song entitled “Xi Dada Loves Peng Mama,” which includes the line “Men should learn from Xi and women should learn from Peng.”

The posting to the south put Xi closer to his father. Since 1978, his father had served in neighboring Guangdong, home to China’s experiments with the free market, and the elder Xi had become a zealous believer in economic reform as the answer to poverty. It was a risky position: at a Politburo meeting in 1987, the Old Guard attacked the liberal standard-bearer, Hu Yaobang. Xi’s father was the only senior official who spoke in his defense. “What are you guys doing here? Don’t repeat what Mao did to us,” he said, according to Richard Baum’s 1994 chronicle of élite politics, “Burying Mao.” But Xi lost and was stripped of power for the last time. He was allowed to live in comfortable obscurity until his death, in 2002, and is remembered fondly as “a man of principle, not of strategy,” as the editor in Beijing put it to me.

His son avoided overly controversial reforms as he rose through the ranks. “My approach is to heat a pot with a small, continuous fire, pouring in cold water to keep it from boiling over," he said. In 1989, a local propaganda official, Kang Yanping, submitted a proposal for a TV miniseries promoting political reform, but Xi replied with skepticism. According to "China's Future," he asked, "Is there a source for the opinion? Is it a reasonable point?" The show, which Xi predicted would leave people "discouraged," was not produced. He also paid special attention to cultivating local military units; he upgraded equipment, raised subsidies for soldiers' living expenses, and found jobs for retiring officers. He liked to say, "To meet the Army's needs, nothing is excessive."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Xi prosecuted corruption at some moments and ignored it at others. A Chinese executive told the U.S. Embassy in Beijing that Xi was considered "Mr. Clean" for turning down a bribe, and yet, for the many years that Xi worked in Fujian, the Yuanhua Group, one of China's largest corrupt enterprises, continued smuggling billions of dollars' worth of oil, cars, cigarettes, and appliances into China, with the help of the Fujian military and police. Xi also found a way to live with Chen Kai, a local tycoon who ran casinos and brothels in the center of town, protected by the police chief. Later, Chen was arrested, tried, and sentenced to death, and fifty government officials were prosecuted for accepting bribes from him. Xi was never linked to the cases, but they left a stain on his tenure. "Sometimes I have posted colleagues wrongly," he said in 2000. "Some were posted wrongly because I thought they were better than they actually were, others because I thought they were worse than they actually were."

Xi proved adept at navigating internal feuds and alliances. After he took over the economically vibrant province of Zhejiang, in 2002, he created policies intended to promote private businesses. He encouraged taxi services to buy from Geely, the car company that later bought Volvo. He soothed conservatives, in part by reciting socialist incantations. "The private economy has become an exotic flower in the garden of socialism with Chinese characteristics," he declared. In 2007, he encountered a prime opportunity to show his political skills: a corruption scandal in Shanghai was implicating associates of Jiang Zemin, the powerful former President, who served from 1989 to 2002. Xi was sent to Shanghai to take over. He projected toughness to the public without alienating Jiang. He rejected the villa that had been arranged for him, announcing that it would be better used as a retirement home for veteran comrades.

His timing was fortunate: a few months later, senior Party officials were choosing the next generation of top leaders. Xi was expected to lose to Li Keqiang, a comrade who had no revolutionary family pedigree, and had postgraduate degrees in law and economics from Peking University. Since 2002, the highest ranks of Chinese politics had been dominated by men who elbowed their way in on the basis of academic or technocratic merit. President Hu's father ran a tea shop, and the Premier, Wen Jiabao, was the son of a teacher, but Chen Yun, the late economic czar, had advised his peers that born reds, now known as "second-generation reds," or princelings, would make more reliable stewards of the Party's future. One princeling told a Western diplomat, "The feeling among us is: 'Hu Jintao, Wen Jiabao, your fathers were selling shoelaces while our fathers were dying for this revolution.' " In private, some princelings referred to the President and the Premier as huoji—"hired hands." In October, 2007, Xi was unveiled as the likely heir apparent. It was not entirely a compliment. "Party leaders prefer weak successors, so they can rule behind the scenes," Ho Pin, the founder of Mingjing News, an overseas Chinese site, said. Xi's rise had been so abrupt, in the eyes of the general public, that people joked,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Who is Xi Jinping? He’s Peng Liyuan’s husband.”

Xi was tested by a pageant of dysfunction that erupted in the run-up to his début as General Secretary, in 2012. In February, Wang Lijun, a former police chief, tried to defect to the U.S. and accused the family of his former patron, Bo Xilai, the Party secretary of Chongqing, of murder and embezzlement. Party leaders feared that Bo might protect himself with the security services at his command, disrupt the transition of power, and tear the Party apart. In September, Ling Jihua, the chief of staff of the outgoing President, was abruptly demoted, and he was later accused of trying to cover up the death of his son, who had crashed a black Ferrari while accompanied by two women.

Beset by crises, Xi suddenly disappeared. On September 4, 2012, he cancelled a meeting with Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and visits with other dignitaries. As the days passed, lurid rumors emerged, ranging from a grave illness to an assassination attempt. When he reappeared, on September 19th, he told American officials that he had injured his back. Analysts of Chinese politics still raise the subject of Xi’s disappearance in the belief that a fuller explanation of why he vanished might illuminate the depth, or fragility, of his support. In dozens of conversations this winter, scholars, officials, journalists, and executives told me that they suspect he did have a health problem, and also reasons to exploit it. They speculate that Xi, in effect, went on strike; he wanted to install key allies, and remove opponents, before taking power, but Party elders ordered him to wait. A former intelligence official told me, “Xi basically says, ‘O.K., fuck you, let’s see you find someone else for this job. I’m going to disappear for two weeks and miss the Secretary of State.’ And that’s what he did. It caused a stir, and they went running and said, ‘Whoa, whoa, whoa.’ ” The handoff went ahead as planned. On November 15, 2012, Xi became General Secretary.

Xi headed a Politburo Standing Committee of seven men: four were considered princelings by birth or marriage, a larger ratio than in any Politburo in the history of the People’s Republic. Western politicians often note that Xi has the habits of a retail pol: comfort on the rope line, gentle questions for every visitor, homey anecdotes. On a trip to Los Angeles, he told students that he likes to swim, read, and watch sports on television, but rarely has time. “To borrow a title from an American film, it’s like ‘Mission: Impossible,’ ” he said. But Chinese observers tend to mention something else: his guizuqi, or “air of nobility.” It can come off as a reassuring link to the past or, at times, as a distance from his peers. In a meeting at the Great Hall of the People last year, Party officials were chatting and glad-handing during a lengthy break, but Xi never budged. “It went on for hours, and he sat there, staring straight ahead,” a foreign attendee told me. “He never wandered down from the podium to say, ‘How’s it going in Ningxia?’ ”

Xi believed that there was a grave threat to China from within. According to U.S. diplomats, Xi’s friend the professor described Xi as “repulsed by the all-encompassing commercialization of Chinese society, with its attendant nouveaux riches, official corruption, loss of values, dignity, and self-respect, and such ‘moral evils’ as drugs and prostitution.” If he ever became China’s top leader, the professor had predicted, “he would likely aggressively attempt to address these evils, perhaps at the expense of the new moneyed class.” Though princelings and their siblings had profited comfortably from China’s rise (Xi’s sister Qi Qiaoqiao is reported to have large corporate and real-estate assets), the revolutionary families considered their gains appropriate, and they blamed the hired hands for allowing corruption and extravagance, which stirred up public rage and threatened the Party's future.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The first step to a solution was to reëstablish control. The "collective Presidency," which spread power across the Standing Committee, had constrained Hu Jintao so thoroughly that he was nicknamed the Woman with Bound Feet. Xi surrounded himself with a shadow cabinet that was defined less by a single ideology than by school ties and political reliability. Members included Liu He, a childhood playmate who had become a reform-minded economist, and Liu Yuan, a hawkish general and the son of former President Liu Shaoqi. The most important was Wang Qishan, a friend for decades, who was placed in charge of the Central Commission on Discipline and Inspection, the agency that launched the vast anticorruption campaign.

The Party had long cultivated an image of virtuous unanimity. But, during the next two years, Wang's investigators, who were granted broad powers to detain and interrogate, attacked agencies that might counter Xi's authority, accusing them of conspiracies and abuses. They brought corruption charges against officials at the state-planning and state-assets commissions, which protect the privileges of large government-run monopolies. They arrested China's security chief, Zhou Yongkang, a former oil baron with the jowls of an Easter Island statue, who had built the police and military into a personal kingdom that received more funding each year for domestic spying and policing than it did for foreign defense. They reached into the ranks of the military, where flamboyant corruption was not only upsetting the public—pedestrians had learned to watch out for luxury sedans with military license plates, which careered around Beijing with impunity—but also undermining China's national defense. When police searched homes belonging to the family of Lieutenant General Gu Junshan, a senior logistics chief, they removed four truckloads of wine, art, cash, and other luxuries. According to a diplomat in Beijing, Gu's furnishings included a gold replica of China's first aircraft carrier. "When questioned about it, he said it was a sign of patriotism," the diplomat said.

By the end of 2014, the Party had announced the punishment of more than a hundred thousand officials on corruption charges. Many foreign observers asked if Xi's crusade was truly intended to stamp out corruption or if it was a tool to attack his enemies. It was not simply one or the other: corruption had become so threatening to the Party's legitimacy that only the most isolated leader could have avoided forcing it back to a more manageable level, but railing against corruption was also a proven instrument for political consolidation, and at the highest levels Xi has deployed it largely against his opponents. Geremie Barme, the historian who heads the Australian Centre on China in the World, analyzed the forty-eight most high-profile arrests, and discovered that none of them were second-generation reds. "I don't call it an anticorruption campaign," a Western diplomat told me. "This is grinding trench warfare."

Shortly after taking over, Xi asked, "Why did the Soviet Communist Party collapse?" and declared, "It's a profound lesson for us." Chinese scholars had studied that puzzle from dozens of angles, but Xi wanted more. "In 2009, he commissioned a long study of the Soviet Union from somebody who works in the policy-research office," the diplomat in Beijing told me. "It concluded that the rot started under Brezhnev. In the paper, the guy cited a joke: Brezhnev brings his mother to Moscow. He proudly shows her the state apartments at the Kremlin, his Zil limousine, and the life of luxury he now lives. 'Well, what do you think, Mama,' says Brezhnev. 'You'll never have to worry about a thing, ever again.' 'I'm so proud of you, Leonid Ilyich,' says Mama, 'but what happens if the Communists find out?' Xi loved the story." Xi reserved special scorn for Gorbachev, for failing to defend the Party against its opponents, and told his colleagues, "Nobody was man enough to stand up and resist."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The year after Xi took office, cadres were required to watch a six-part documentary on the Soviet Union's collapse, which showed violent scenes of unrest and described an American conspiracy to topple Communism through "peaceful evolution": the steady infiltration of subversive Western political ideas. Ever since the early aughts, when "color revolutions" erupted in the former Soviet bloc, Chinese Communists have cited the risk of contagion as a reason to constrict political life. That fear was heightened by a surge of unrest in Tibet in 2008, in Xinjiang in 2009, and across the Arab world in 2011. Last September, when pro-democracy protests erupted in Hong Kong, an opinion piece in the Global Times, a state-run daily, accused the National Endowment for Democracy and the C.I.A. of being "black hands" behind the unrest, intent on "stimulating Taiwanese independence, Xinjiang independence, and Tibetan independence." (The U.S. denied involvement.)

Xi's government has no place for loyal opposition. When he launched the anticorruption campaign, activists—such as the lawyer Xu Zhiyong, who had served as a local legislator in Beijing—joined in, calling on officials to disclose their incomes. But Xu and many others were arrested. (He was later sentenced to four years in prison for "gathering crowds to disrupt public order.") One of Xu's former colleagues, Teng Biao, told me, "For the government, 'peaceful evolution' was not just a slogan. It was real. The influence of Western states was becoming more obvious and more powerful." Teng was at a conference in Germany soon after Xu and another colleague were arrested. "People advised me not to return to China, or I'd be arrested, too," Teng said. He is now a visiting scholar at Harvard Law School.

A prominent editor in Beijing told me that Chinese philanthropists have been warned, "You can't give money to this N.G.O. or that N.G.O.—basically all N.G.O.s." In December, the Committee to Protect Journalists counted forty-four reporters in Chinese jails, more than in any other country. Well-known human-rights lawyers—Pu Zhiqiang, Ding Jiaxi, Xia Lin—have been jailed. Earlier this month, Human Rights Watch called this the harshest suppression of dissent in a decade.

Although Vladimir Putin has suffocated Russian civil society and neutered the press, Moscow stores still carry books that are critical of him, and a few long-suffering blogs still find ways to attack him. Xi is less tolerant. In February, 2014, Yiu Mantin, a seventy-nine-year-old editor at Hong Kong's Morning Bell Press, who had planned to release a biography critical of Xi, by the exiled writer Yu Jie, was arrested during a visit to the mainland. He had received a phone call warning him not to proceed with publication. He was sentenced to ten years in prison, on charges of smuggling seven cans of paint.

For years, Chinese intellectuals distinguished between words and actions: Western political ideas could be discussed in China as long as nobody tried to enact them. In 2011, China's education minister, Yuan Guiren, extolled the benefits of exchanges with foreign countries. "Whether they're rich or poor, socialist or capitalist, as long as they're beneficial to our development we can learn from all of them," he told the Jinghua Times, a state newspaper. But in January Yuan told a conference, "Young teachers and students are key targets of infiltration by enemy forces." He said, "We must, by no means, allow into our classrooms material that propagates Western values." An article on the Web site of Seeking Truth, an official Party journal, warned against professors who "blacken China's name," and it singled out the law professor He Weifang by name. When I spoke to He, a few days later, he said, "I've always been unpopular with conservatives, but recently the situation has become more serious. The political standpoint of this new slate of leaders isn't like that of the Hu or Jiang era. They're more restraining. They're not as willing to permit an active discussion."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sealing China off from Western ideas poses some practical problems. The Party has announced "rule of law" reforms intended to strengthen top-down control over the legal system and shield courts from local interference. The professor said, "Many colleagues working on civil law and that sort of thing have a large portion of their lectures about German law or French law. So, if you want to stop Western values from spreading in Chinese universities, one thing you'd have to do is close down the law schools and make sure they never exist again." Xi, for his part, sees no contradiction, because preservation of the Party comes before preservation of the law. In January, he said that China must "nurture a legal corps loyal to the Party, loyal to the country, loyal to the people, and loyal to the law." Echoing Mao, he added, "Insure that the handle of the knife is firmly in the hand of the Party and the people."

Xi's wariness of Western influence is reflected in his foreign policy. On a personal level, he expresses warm memories of Iowa, and he sent his daughter, Xi Mingze, to Harvard. (She graduated last year, under a pseudonym, and has returned to China.) But Xi has also expressed an essentialist view of national characteristics such that, in his telling, China's history and social makeup render it unfit for multiparty democracy or a monarchy or any other non-Communist system. "We considered them, tried them, but none worked," he told an audience at the College of Europe, in Bruges, last spring. Adopting an alternative, he said, "might even lead to catastrophic consequences." On his watch, state-run media have accentuated the threat of "peaceful evolution," and have accused American companies, including Microsoft, Cisco, and Intel, of being "warriors" for the U.S. government.

As for a broad diplomatic vision, Chinese leaders since Deng Xiaoping have adhered to a principle known as "Hide your strength, bide your time." Xi has effectively replaced that concept with declarations of China's arrival. In Paris last year, he invoked Napoleon's remark that China was "a sleeping lion," and said that the lion "has already awakened, but this is a peaceful, pleasant, and civilized lion." He told the Politburo in December that he intends to "make China's voice heard, and inject more Chinese elements into international rules." As alternatives to the Washington-based World Bank and International Monetary Fund, Xi's government has established the New Development Bank, the Silk Road infrastructure fund, and the Asia Infrastructure Investment Bank, which, together, intend to amass two hundred and forty billion dollars in capital. Xi has been far bolder than his predecessors in asserting Chinese control over airspace and land, sending an oil rig into contested waters, and erecting buildings, helipads, and other facilities on reefs that are claimed by multiple nations. He has also taken advantage of Putin's growing economic isolation; Xi has met with Putin more than with any other foreign leader, and, last May, as Russia faced new sanctions over the annexation of Crimea, Xi and Putin agreed on a four-hundred-billion-dollar deal to supply gas to China at rates that favor Beijing. According to the prominent editor, Xi has told people that he was impressed by Putin's seizure of Crimea—"He got a large piece of land and resources" and boosted his poll numbers at home. But, as war in Ukraine has dragged on, Xi has become less complimentary of Putin.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

No diplomatic relationship matters more to China's future than its dealings with the United States, and Xi has urged the U.S. to adopt a "new type of great-power relationship"—to regard China as an equal and to acknowledge its claims to contested islands and other interests. (The Obama Administration has declined to adopt the phrase.) Xi and Obama have met, at length, five times. American officials describe the relationship as occasionally candid but not close. They have "brutally frank exchanges on difficult issues, and it doesn't upset the apple cart," a senior Administration official told me. "So it's different from the era of Hu Jintao, where there was very little exchange." Hu almost never departed from his notes, and American counterparts wondered how much he believed his talking points. "Xi is reading what I'm confident Xi believes," the official said, though their engagements remain stilted: "There's still a cadence that is very difficult to extract yourself from in these exchanges. . . . We want to have a conversation."

For years, American military leaders worried that there was a growing risk of an accidental clash between China and the U.S., in part because Beijing protested U.S. policies by declining meetings between senior commanders. In 2011, Mike Mullen, then the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, visited Xi in Beijing, and appealed to his military experience, telling him, as he recalled to me, "I just need you to stop cutting off military relationships as step one, every time you get ticked off." That has improved. In Beijing last November, Xi and Obama spent five hours at dinner and meetings and announced coöperation on climate change, a high-tech free-trade deal that China had previously resisted, and two military agreements to encourage communication between forces operating near each other in the South China and East China Seas. Mullen, who has met Xi again since their initial encounter, is encouraged: "They still get ticked off, they take steps, but they don't cut it off."

As China ejects Western ideas, Xi is trying to fill that void with an affirmative set of ideas to offer at home and abroad. Recently, I rode the No. 1 subway line eastbound, beneath the Avenue of Eternal Peace—under Party headquarters, the Central Propaganda Department, and the Ministries of Commerce and Public Security—and got off the train at the Second Ring Road, where the old City Wall once stood. Near the station, at a Starbucks, I met Zhang Lifan, a well-known historian. At sixty-four, he defies the usual rumpled stereotype of the liberal intelligentsia; he is tall, with elegant hints of gray hair, and he wore a black mandarin-collar jacket and a winter cap covered in smooth black fur. Zhang grew up around politics; his father, a banker before the revolution, served as a minister in the early years of Mao's government. I asked him what message Xi hoped to promote from China around the world. He said, "Ever since Mao's day, and the beginning of reform and opening up, we all talk about a 'crisis of faith,' " the sense that rapid growth and political turmoil have cut China off from its moral history. "He is trying to solve that problem, so that there can be another new ideology."

Zhang writes about politics, and he is occasionally visited by police who remind him to avoid sensitive subjects. "Sometimes, they will pass by and say it through the closed front door," Zhang said. He commented, "They tried to stop me from coming today. They followed me here." He indicated a slim young man in a windbreaker, watching us from a nearby table. In remote areas, where police are unaccustomed to the presence of foreigners, authorities often try to prevent people from meeting reporters. But, in a decade of writing about China, this was the first time I'd encountered that situation in the capital. I suggested we postpone our discussion. He shook his head. In a stage whisper, he said, "What I say and what I write are the same. There's no difference."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The most surprising thing about the era of Xi Jinping is the decision to close off the margins—those minor mutinies and indulgences that used to be tolerated as a way to avoid driving China's most prosperous and well-educated citizens abroad. For years, the government tacitly allowed people to gain access to virtual private networks, or V.P.N.s, which allow users to reach Web sites that are blocked in China. The risks seemed manageable; most Chinese users had less interest in politics than in reaching a celebrity's Instagram feed (Instagram, like Facebook, Twitter, Bloomberg, Reuters, and the Times, is blocked). Keeping them open, the theory went, allowed sophisticated users to get what they wanted or needed—for instance, researchers accessing Google Scholar, or businesses doing transactions—while preventing the masses from employing technology that worries the Party. But on January 23rd, while I was in Beijing, the government abruptly blocked the V.P.N.s, and state media reiterated that they were illegal. Overnight, it became radically more difficult to reach anything on the Internet outside China. Before the comments were shut down on the Web site Computer News, twelve thousand people left their views. "What are you afraid of?" one asked. "Big step toward becoming a new North Korea," another wrote. Another wrote: "One more advertisement for emigration."

A decade ago, the Chinese Internet was alive with debate, confession, humor, and discovery. Month by month, it is becoming more sterilized and self-contained. To the degree that China's connection to the outside world matters, the digital links are deteriorating. Voice-over-Internet calls, viral videos, podcasts—the minor accessories of contemporary digital life—are less reachable abroad than they were a year ago. It's an astonishing thing to observe in a rising superpower. How many countries in 2015 have an Internet connection to the world that is worse than it was a year ago?

The General Secretary, in his capacity as Big Uncle Xi, has taken to offering advice on nonpolitical matters: last fall, he lamented an overly "sensual" trend in society. (In response, Chinese auto executives stopped having lightly clad models lounge around vehicles at car shows.) In January, he urged people to get more sleep, "however enthusiastic you may be about the job," saying that he goes to bed before midnight. Online, people joked that it seemed implausible: since taking office, Xi has acquired heavy bags under his eyes and a look of near-constant irritation.

For a generation, the Communist Party forged a political consensus built on economic growth and legal ambiguity. Liberal activists and corrupt bureaucrats learned to skirt (or flout) legal boundaries, because the Party objected only intermittently. Today, Xi has indicated that consensus, beyond the Party élite, is superfluous—or, at least, less reliable than a hard boundary between enemies and friends.

It is difficult to know precisely how much support Xi enjoys. Private pollsters are not allowed to explicitly measure his public support, but Victor Yuan, the president of Horizon Research Consultancy Group, a Beijing polling firm, told me, "We've done some indirect research, and his support seems to be around eighty per cent. It comes from two areas: one is the anticorruption policy and the other is foreign policy. The area where it's unclear is the economy. People say they'll have to wait and see."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

China's economy is likely to be Xi's greatest obstacle. After economic growth of, on average, nearly ten per cent a year, for more than three decades, the Party expected growth to slow to a sustainable pace of around seven per cent, but it could fall more sharply. China remains the world's largest manufacturer, with four trillion dollars in foreign-exchange reserves (a sum equivalent to the world's fourth-largest economy). In November, 2013, the Party announced plans to reinvigorate competition by expanding the role of private banks, allowing the market (instead of bureaucrats) to decide where water, oil, and other precious resources are directed, and forcing state firms to give up larger dividends and compete with private businesses. Last spring, China abolished registered-capital and other requirements for new companies, and in November it allowed foreign investors to trade shares directly on the Shanghai stock market for the first time. "A fair judgment is that Xi's government has achieved more progress, in more areas, in the past eighteen months than the Hu government did in its entire second term," Arthur Kroeber, a longtime Beijing-based economist at Gavekal Dragonomics, a research firm, told me. And yet, Kroeber added, "my confidence level is only slightly above fifty per cent" that the reforms will be enough to head off a recession.

The risks to China's economy have rarely been more visible. The workforce is aging more quickly than in other countries (because of the one-child policy), and businesses are borrowing money more rapidly than they are earning it. David Kelly, a co-founder of China Policy, a Beijing-based research and advisory firm, said, "The turning point in the economy really was about four, five years ago, and now you see the classical problem of the declining productivity of capital. For every dollar you invest, you're getting far less bang for your buck." The growth of demand for energy and raw materials has slowed, more houses and malls are empty, and nervous Chinese savers are sending money overseas, to protect it in the event of a crisis. Some factories have not paid wages, and in the last quarter of 2014 workers held strikes, or other forms of protest, at three times the rate of the same period a year earlier.

Xi's ability to avoid an economic crisis depends partly on whether he has the political strength to prevail over state firms, local governments, and other powerful interests. In his meetings with Rudd, the former Australian Prime Minister, Xi mentioned his father's frustrated attempts to achieve market-oriented reforms. "Xi Jinping is legitimately proud of his father," Rudd said, adding, "His father had a record of real achievement and was, frankly, a person who paid a huge political and personal price for being a dedicated Party man and a dedicated economic reformer."

Historically, the Party has never perceived a contradiction between political crackdown and economic reform. In 2005, Premier Wen Jiabao met with a delegation from the U.S. Congress, and one member, citing a professor who had recently been fired for political reasons, asked the Premier why. Wen was baffled by the inquiry; the professor was a "small problem," he said. "I don't know the person you spoke of, but as Premier I have 1.3 billion people on my mind."

To maintain economic growth, China is straining to promote innovation, but by enforcing a political chill on Chinese campuses Xi risks suppressing precisely the disruptive thinking that the country needs for the future. At times, politics prevails over rational calculations. In 2014, after China had spent years investing in science and technology, the share of its economy devoted to research and development surpassed Europe's. But, when the government announced the recipients of grants for social-science research, seven of the top ten projects were dedicated to analyzing Xi's speeches (officially known as "General Secretary Xi's Series of Important Speeches") or his signature slogan: the Chinese Dream.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The era of Xi Jinping has defied the assumption that China's fitful opening to the world is too critical and productive to stall. The Party today perceives an array of threats that, in the view of He Weifang, the law professor, will only increase in the years ahead. Before the Web, the professor said, "there really weren't very many people who were able to access information from outside, so in Deng Xiaoping's era the Party could afford to be a lot more open." But now, if the Internet were unrestricted, "I believe it would bring in things that the leaders would consider very dangerous."

Like many others I met this winter, He Weifang worries that the Party is narrowing the range of acceptable adaptation to the point that it risks uncontrollable change. I asked him what he thinks the Party will be like in ten or fifteen years. "I think, as intellectuals, we must do everything we can to promote a peaceful transformation of the Party—to encourage it to become a 'leftist party' in the European sense, a kind of social-democratic party." That, he said, would help its members better respect a true system of law and political competition, including freedom of the press and freedom of thought. "If they refuse even these basic changes, then I believe China will undergo another revolution."

It is a dramatic prediction—and an oddly commonplace one these days. Zhang Lifan, the historian I saw at Starbucks, said, in full view of his minder, "In front of a lot of princeling friends, I've said that, if the Communist Party can't take sufficient political reform in five or ten years, it could miss the chance entirely. As scholars, we always say it's better to have reform than revolution, but in Chinese history this cycle repeats itself. Mao said we have to get rid of the cycle, but right now we're still in it. This is very worrying."

Two months after the events of New Year's Eve, the Party again confronted a collision between its instinct for control and the complexity of Chinese society. For years, the government had downplayed the severity of environmental pollution, describing it as an unavoidable cost of growth. But, year by year, the middle class was becoming less accommodating; in polls, urban citizens described pollution as their leading concern, and, using smartphones, they compared daily pollution levels to the standards set by the World Health Organization. After a surge of smog in 2013, the government intensified efforts to consolidate power plants, close small polluters, and tighten state control. Last year, it declared a "war against pollution," but conceded that Beijing will not likely achieve healthy air before 2030. In a moment of candor, the mayor pronounced the city "unlivable."

In February, Chinese video sites posted a privately funded documentary, titled "Under the Dome," in which Chai Jing, a former state-television reporter, described her growing alarm at the risks that air pollution poses to her infant daughter. It was a sophisticated production: Chai, in fashionable faded jeans and a white blouse, delivered a fast-paced, TED-style talk to a rapt studio audience, unspooling grim statistics and scenes in which bureaucrats admitted that powerful companies and agencies had rendered them incapable of protecting public health. In spirit, the film was consistent with the official "war on corruption," and state-run media responded with a coördinated array of flattering coverage.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The film raced across social media, and by the end of the first week it had been viewed two hundred million times—a level usually reserved for pop-music videos rather than dense, two-hour documentaries. The following weekend, the authorities ordered video sites to withdraw the film, and news organizations took down their coverage. As quickly as it had appeared, the film vanished from the Chinese Web—a phenomenon undone.

*"Well, that's the only song we know, so we can play it another two or three times, or we can cut our losses. Waddya say, Cleveland?"*December 24, 2012BUY THE PRINT »

In the era of Xi Jinping, the public had proved, again, to be an unpredictable partner. It was a lesson that Xi absorbed long ago. "The people elevated me to this position so that I'd listen to them and benefit them," he said in 2000. "But, in the face of all these opinions and comments, I had to learn to enjoy having my errors pointed out to me, but not to be swayed too much by that. Just because so-and-so says something, I'm not going to start weighing every cost and benefit. I'm not going to lose my appetite over it." ♦

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Leslie Garvey, Project On Government Oversight" <leslie@pogo.org>
To: "John Podesta" <podesta@law.georgetown.edu>
Date: 8/29/2015 1:00:06 AM
Subject: Weekly Reader: Nuclear lab fires, F-35 testing, and a wrist-slap for Lockheed

POGO
PROJECT ON GOVERNMENT OVERSIGHT

Military Reform Begins With Personnel Reform

Many of the military's best leaders are leaving for a host of reasons: frustrations with assignments that don't match their talents, dealing with toxic leaders more concerned with their own careers than mission accomplishment, and a promotion system based more on checking blocks on a checklist rather than merit. Read more

POGO Supports "Fair Pay and Safe Workplaces" Rule

POGO submitted a public comment supporting a proposed rule implementing an Executive Order for expanded contractor disclosure. We also suggested ways to make the final rule more effective.

Read more

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To Safeguard the Military, Congress Must Protect Whistleblowers

Far too often, whistleblowers are unfairly punished for their efforts to bring accountability to the armed services, and the systems in place to protect them are completely inadequate.

Read more

Lockheed Gets Off Far Too Easy for Illegal Lobbying

Lockheed Martin has been fined over $750 million for contract mismanagement in the last decade, but continues to show little regard for the rules.

Read more

NNSA: Not Our Fault if Nuclear Weapons Labs Catch Fire

A new report from the Department of Energy says old fire suppressions systems could be putting nuclear weapons facilities at risk of fire or explosion.

Read more

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

U.S. Spending in Afghanistan: A Credit to Oversight

With billions in U.S. tax dollars still left to be spent on reconstruction in Afghanistan, it's critical that the Special Inspector General for Afghanistan Reconstruction continue his oversight role.

Read more

Pentagon Will Test F-35 Against A-10

The Department of Defense, heeding the advice of POGO's Center for Defense Information and others, plans to test the F-35 against the A-10 for close air support missions. Read more

See also:

-F-35 vs A-10 Test: POGO Cautiously Optimistic

-Air Force Chief of Staff's Conflicting Statements on the F-35

From the World of POGO

POGO Supports Government Access to Contractor Labor Violations to Improve Compliance, Avoid Bad Actors, and Level the Playing Field

It's well-known that companies that contract with the federal government routinely violate laws covering workplace safety and workers' rights to fair compensation and equal treatment.

Read more

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

POGO :: 1100 G Street, NW, Suite 500 :: Washington, DC 20005 :: (202) 347-1122

View this email online | Unsubscribe

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Zayneb Shaikley" <zshaikley@clintonfoundation.org>
To: "Hannah Richert - PC" <hannah@presidentclinton.com>
"Bruce Lindsey" <blindsey@clintonfoundation.org>
"Laura Graham" <lgraham@clintonfoundation.org>
"Stephanie Streett" <sstreett@clintonfoundation.org>
Date: 10/12/2012 11:32:49 AM
Subject: Biweekly Report

Hannah,
I have attached the latest Biweekly Report for President Clinton. Please let me know if there are any questions or comments.
Thanks,
Zayneb

Biweekly Report
William J. Clinton Foundation
October 12, 2012

MAJOR INTERNATIONAL INITIATIVES

Clinton Development Initiative

Malawi

CDI has arranged short-term leases on three additional commercial farms for this season, and is finalizing growing contracts for the season and securing inputs and equipment.

With regards to the Trees of Hope project, CDI has finalized an agreement with COTAP, a not-for-profit that markets carbon credits from several developing world tree planting projects to individuals in the US, to offer credits from Tree of Hope.

Rwanda (CHDI)

For the AGRA project. CHDI has begun seed distribution among the districts for the upcoming season. Presentation materials for the workshop on integrated soil fertility management, to be held in Nairobi from October 22 to October 26, have been completed.

Construction of the coffee roasting factory is moving along well. A board meeting took place Tuesday, October 9. The board reviewed the progress achieved as well as the contractor's work, and concluded that the project is on track.

Clinton Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative

CGSGI is advancing in discussions to form a joint venture with ECOM, a 160 year old, $5 B, privately held global commodity trading and processing company focusing on coffee, cotton, and cocoa in major producing and consuming countries. ECOM is one of the top three merchants in coffee, one of the largest coffee millers in the world, and amongst the top five merchants in both cocoa and cotton. ECOM considers itself an "origin-integrated company," meaning it is focused on buying from producers at origin, providing primary processing, logistics and risk management services and selling to the branded product manufacturers.

To improve farmer productivity, ECOM has established a Sustainable Management Services business (SMS). SMS has been set up as a profit making division whereby inputs (seeds, fertilizer, etc.), technical assistance, finance, and certification services are provided to farmers at reasonable prices taking advantage of ECOM's economies of scale and mass volume procurements. The SMS program has resulted in farmer productivity increases greater than 200% and currently serves a network of 1 million farmers. CGSGI has been discussing with ECOM management the possibility of combining our agro value chain optimization strategy and their SMS strategy. This joint effort would likely be compelling to large private sector buyers and would provide an operational platform to significantly scale farmer income and jobs in sustainable agricultural value chains.

ECOM's coffee and cocoa operations include presence in Mexico, Peru, Colombia and West Africa. Their multinational customers include Starbucks, Nestle, Kraft, Ferrero, Mars and Hershey's. CGSGI's discussions are focused on a joint venture where both they and we would invest in the SMS operation as a stand-alone entity and use this business model to develop agro business opportunities that would significantly impact farmer income and jobs related to ECOM's current commodities as well as other agricultural products.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "The Common Good" <patriciaduff@thecommongood.net>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 11/13/2015 4:36:19 PM
Subject: New News! (11/13/2015)

de·moc·ra·cy di-ˈmä-krə-sē

noun - a system of government by the whole population or all the eligible members of a state, typically through elected representatives.

Week ending November 13, 2015

Weekly roundup about our democracy and The Common Good community

- Multiple terrorist attacks in Paris tonight. At least 60 reported dead.
- Republican debate was substantive; Immigration a flashpoint for candidate sparring
- Oil prices could set new low
- Terrorist attacks in Paris leave at least 60 dead, 100 hostages
- Netanyahu and Obama try for cooperation in White House meeting
- Myanmar holds first free elections in 25 years, Aung San Suu Kyi's National League for Democracy party wins
- CHECK OUT OUR UPCOMING EVENTS AT THE END OF THIS EMAIL

Polls

National poll results: Domestic issues should be the' priority for the 2016 presidential campaign, including the economy, health care, and roads and bridges: 69% favor domestic issues as the focus of the election vs 21% want focus on foreign policy issues such as ISIS and terrorism.

Gun Safety: 63% are more worried they will be a victim of gun violence than a victim of a terror attack.

On the economy: the top three issues of importance to voters:

27% - Economic growth; 22% - Jobs; 21% - Income inequality

Immigration: 48% immigration policy should be an immediate priority; 36% say it should be a priority over the next couple of years. An additional 16% do not think the issue should be a priority at all.

"Crazy" election: 40%. say the one word to best describe the 2016 presidential campaign, so far? "Crazy" tops the list.

"Polarization rules": "If you're searching for common ground between Democrats and Republicans on the issues for 2016, you will need to look far and wide," says Dr. Lee M. Miringoff, Director of The Marist College Institute for Public Opinion. "Polarization rules, and there is little consensus except when it comes to characterizing the campaign as 'crazy.'"" Marist [Poll]

Hillary lead is strong in new national poll: Hillary Clinton's lead is strong, with 52% support over Bernie Sanders, who has 33%. Martin O'Malley trails with 5%. New York Times/CBS News [More]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2016 Campaign

GOP Debate: Substantive this time, but the exchange did not thin the field: "For now, the choices remain numerous, although hardly similar in what the candidates offer. The campaign has moved beyond the period of introduction. The next phase will bring more heated engagement and with it, perhaps, greater clarity. To date, the campaign has produced anything but." Dan Balz (TCG Speaker), Op-Ed, The Washington Post [More]

Republican presidential candidates spar over economic issues - from the challenge from China to the Fed's low interest rate policy: The plans vary, but each of the Republicans on stage said they want to streamline the tax code and lower rates..Sens. Cruz and Rand Paul of Kentucky both highlighted their plans to scrap the current tax code and replace it with a uniform tax on consumption. Mr. Cruz also wants to abolish the Internal Revenue Service. Mr. Carson, asked if God would endorse his flat-tax plan over the Trump policy—in which wealthy Americans would pay a larger share—defended his platform and called for eliminating deductions and loopholes." Patrick O'Connor, Beth Reinhard, Rebecca Ballhaus, Wall Street Journal [More]

GOP hopefuls oppose wage increase: "Drawing a sharp contrast with Democrats, republican presidential candidates voiced opposition to raising the federal minimum wage in Tuesday's primary debate, casting it as an impediment to national job growth." Julie Pace and Julie Bykowicz, Chicago Tribune [More]

Immigration and military intervention major sparring point: "The two-hour debate spotlighted the rift between the outsider candidates and establishment governors over how strictly to enforce immigration laws and whether to provide a pathway to legal status for the country's more than 11 million undocumented immigrants or deport them. It also revived a long-simmering dispute over the size and role of the U.S. military, with Sen. Rand Paul (Ky.) warning of the potential adverse fiscal effects of increased defense spending and Sens. Marco Rubio (Fla.) and Ted Cruz (Tex.) advocating a more muscular American military presence in the world." Philip Rucker and Ed O'Keefe, The Washington Post [More]

Getting voter enthusiasm: Hillary Clinton's challenge: "The new poll shows that members of the Rising American Electorate — minorities, millennials, and single women — are significantly less tuned in to next year's election than GOP-aligned voter groups are….It isn't enough to simply outline bold economic policies... What's also required to engage these groups is a reform agenda geared to reducing the influence of the wealthy, the lobbyists, and the special interests over our politics." Greg Sargent, Op-Ed, The Washington Post [More]

The Economy

Oil price collapsing, could set new low: "The realization of a mega-glut is finally registering within the market," said John Kilduff, analyst and partner with Again Capital. "I think we're probably in the midst of another leg lower here. It might not go straight down but we're on target to make new lows for the year." Oil futures are down more than 10 percent in the past month... The U.S. government reported Thursday that oil stockpiles rose by 4.2 million barrels last week due to higher imports. That was about four times what analysts had expected." Patti Domm, CNBC [More]

Is traditional banking unbreakable?: "Banking and financial-services companies are not safe from the immense transformations wrought by technological innovation. For the last decade, digital startups have been penetrating areas traditionally dominated by the financial industry…[and] much of the financial terrain in which technology companies are making the deepest inroads will come into much sharper regulatory focus...In finance, at least, technology firms should not be viewed simply as a threat, but as a source of productivity-boosting innovation." Dambisa Moyo (TCG Speaker), Op-Ed, Project Syndicate [More]

The Tax Code can never be three pages long, but it could be simpler: "…[Carly] Fiorina and most of her opponents have identified a source of both length and complexity: so-called tax preferences... The candidates' plans would simplify the taxable income calculation, but... That would require taking away tax deductions, and people tend to like the deductions they take." Raymond Biesinger, New York Times [More]

Possible explanation of the deterioration of the working class: "Beginning in the 1980s, the U.S. economy started trending toward greater inequality...A couple of decades later, the lack of family support started to take a big bite out of the emotional health of working-class whites, causing them to turn to alcohol, drugs and suicide once they reached middle age. I don't know if this explanation is true. But if so, it means that our laissez-faire, neoliberal economic policy,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

combined with the pressure of competition from China and other low-wage countries, has had steeper social costs than we anticipated." Noah Smith, Op-Ed, Bloomberg [More]

Foreign Affairs/National Security

Multiple terrorist attacks in Paris leave at least 60 dead, 100 hostages: "At least six shootings took place in Paris and three explosions took place at the Stade de France in Saint-Denis late Friday... Two or three gunmen entered the Bataclan concert hall while opening fire on law enforcement... A source earlier told CNN there were six to eight hostage takers, citing a person they were talking to inside the venue." Ralph Ellis and Steve Almasy, CNN [More]

Combined diplomatic and military approach to Syria brings doubts: "As 50 Special Operations troops arrive in Syria to bolster the most effective opposition groups, the administration is gambling that Secretary of State John Kerry will have more leverage to push Russia, Iran and other players toward two objectives: a cease-fire to limit the cycle of killing and the establishment of a timeline for a transition of power. While Mr. Kerry has been optimistic that diplomacy can end the carnage, he has conceded doubts to aides that his strategy of fast-paced diplomacy can harness so many fiercely opposed forces toward a political solution." David E. Sanger and Helene Cooper, New York Times [More]

Will Putin get tougher in face of confirmation of terrorism as responsible for Sinai plane crash?: "Mr. Putin has repeated the theme that it is better to attack terrorists on their home territory. His response in the face of any terrorist attack will probably be to double down, analysts said... Soon... he will need to explain the catastrophe at home — especially given the Kremlin's initial insistence on dismissing the idea that the plane's downing could be linked to Syria." Neil MacFarquhar, New York Times [More]

Obama and Netanyahu try to move past their differences: "The tortured relationship between Barack and Bibi, as they call each other, has been a story of crossed signals, misunderstandings, slights perceived and real. Burdened by mistrust, divided by ideology, the leaders of the United States and Israel talked past each other for years until the rupture over Mr. Obama 's push for a nuclear agreement with Iran led to the spectacle of Mr. Netanyahu denouncing the president's efforts before a joint meeting of Congress." Peter Baker and Jodi Rudoren, New York Times [More]

In Myanmar's first free elections in 25 years, Aung San Suu Kyi's National League for Democracy party captures a majority: "The landmark election is seen as a test of the powerful military's willingness to let the country continue along a path toward full democracy, after decades of military-dominated rule in Myanmar, also known as Burma...After the outcome of the parliamentary vote is decided, lawmakers will begin the complex process of choosing a President." Faith Karimi, CNN [More]

Victory in Iraq as Sinjar retaken from ISIS by Kurdish forces: The takeover "revers[es] the terror group's takeover of a community where thousands were massacred and tens of thousands were forced to flee 15 months ago…The capture of Sinjar -- which is on a highway connecting ISIS' territory in Syria to its largest conquered city, Mosul in Iraq -- is a step toward dividing the 'caliphate'" Jason Hanna and Ed Payne, CNN [More]

Is TPP too flawed for a simple up and down vote?: "The partners could also agree to a more measured, step-by-step approach, since that would be in the common interest, though not necessarily to the benefit of certain powerful interest groups." Jeffrey Sachs (TCG Speaker), Op-Ed, Boston Globe [More]

Middle East allies not helping in strikes against ISIS in Syria: "The US prepares to intensify airstrikes against the Islamic State in Syria, the Arab allies who with great fanfare sent warplanes on the initial missions there a year ago have largely vanished from the campaign… They are primarily engaged in Yemen." Eric Schmitt and Michael R. Gordon, New York Times [More]

Recurring violence in northern Burundi and Rwanda: "The violence in northern Burundi comes as UN human rights chief Zeid Raad al-Hussein warned that security was deteriorating rapidly in the country and that an explosion of violence is close at hand. He told the UN Security Council that 'the risk to human life, and to regional stability and development, is high.'" Catherine Soi, Al Jazeera [More]

European Commission mandates guidelines for labeling products made in Israeli settlements: "The EU says settlements constitute an obstacle to peace and threaten to make a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict impossible. Mr. Netanyahu, who was in Washington on an official visit, called the decision 'hypocritical and a double standard'" BBC [More]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

37 killed and 181 wounded in Beirut: "The bombers blew themselves up in a busy street in the southern suburb of Burj al-Barajneh, a stronghold of the Shia Islamist Hezbollah movement. The Sunni jihadist group Islamic State (IS) claimed responsibility, but there has been no independent confirmation. It is the deadliest bombing in Beirut since the civil war ended 25 years ago." Lina Sinjab, BBC [More]

Domestic Affairs

Jonathan Chait on the University of Missouri protests after the Chancellor and President step down: "It's not just a bunch of weird, unfortunate events that somehow keep happening over and over. It's the expression of a political culture with consistent norms, and philosophical premises that happen to be incompatible with liberalism. ...It's that the ideology itself prioritizes class justice over individual rights and makes no allowance for legitimate disagreement. " Jonathan Chait, Op-Ed, New York Magazine [More]

Senate prevents the relocation of Guantanamo Bay prisoners: the Republican-controlled Congress reacted by rushing through the bill in response to persistent Washington chatter that a new Obama closure plan was set to be announced." Dan Roberts, The Guardian [More]

Federal court rejects Obama executive action on immigration giving quasi-legal status and work permits to illegal immigrants: "The 2-1 ruling Monday from the New Orleans-based 5th Circuit is a defeat for the Obama administration." However, it could be well-timed to let the Supreme Court rule on the issue before Obama leaves office. Josh Gerstein and Seung Min Kim, Politico [More]

Greenhouse gas levels reached a record high in 2014: "The relentless fueling of climate change is endangering the planet for future generations, the World Meteorological Organization said on Monday. 'Every year we say that time is running out. We have to act now to slash greenhouse gas emissions if we are to have a chance to keep the increase in temperatures to manageable levels,' WMO Secretary-General Michel Jarraud said in a statement. Tom Miles, Scientific American [More]

Books & Film

Norton Garfinkle and Harold Holzer: A Just and Generous Nation: Abraham Lincoln and the Fight for American Opportunity: The authors write how Lincoln's aim was to create "economic opportunity for the widest possible circle of hardworking Americans." Publisher's Weekly [More]

UPCOMING EVENTS:

Ambassador Melanne Verveer
Empowering Half the World
Wednesday, December 9, 2015
Reception & remarks: 6:15-7:45pm; Dinner & conversation: 8:00-9:30pm
RSVP

The Rt. Honorable David Miliband
Fallout: Ramifications of the Great Refugee Crisis
Wednesday, January 27, 2016
Reception & remarks: 6:15-7:45pm; Dinner & conversation: 8:00-9:30pm
RSVP

Thank you TCG Digest contributors: TCG Staff: Isabelle Lehner and Isaac Getlan, and our interns and volunteers: Samar Nadi, Tracey Pennito, and Lawrence Robinson.

Visit our website www.thecommongoodusa.org, Facebook, and our Twitter @TheCommonGood. JOIN IN by sending us your ideas, news, and reactions to admin@thecommongood.net.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This email was sent to podesta@law.georgetown.edu
why did I get this? unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences
The Common Good · 115 East 57th St · Suite 1010 · New York, NY 10022 · USA

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Christina Reynolds" <creynolds@gpg.com>
To:	hrcrapid@googlegroups.com
Date:	4/13/2015 3:21:45 PM
Subject:	Rubio notes

A few notes from the Rubio announcement. He gives a good speech, and sounded much more reasonable, populist and accessible than much of the rest of the GOP field. Felt more like an inspiring Democratic speech than a GOP candidate, outside of foreign policy, repealing Obamacare and choice. Lots of references to “our generation” (I.e. Him and younger voters) vs. “their generation” (them being us, Jeb, his opponents, Washington).

I assume we’re sticking to leaving Rubio response to the DNC, but wanted to flag for anyone who didn’t get the watch.

A few soundbites/notes:
We believe in the American Dream: They look for solutions in yesterday—
Have forgotten that when America fails to lead, global chaos follows—they appease our enemies

Our generation, they look to the past, they’re still stuck in the 20th century.

Repeal and replace Obamacare
Better paying modern jobs

Family, not the government, is the most important institution in our society.
All human life deserves protection of our laws
All parents deserve to choose the education that’s right for their children—strong people and strong nation.

If America once again accepts the mantle of global leadership—by abandoning concessions to Iran and hostilities to Israel
Hollowing out of the military, Vets
No longer being passive in the face of Russia and China

Generational choice about what kind of choice families will have.
Just yesterday, a leader from yesterday began a campaign for president by promising to take us back to yesterday.
Yesterday is over. We’re never going back. Proud of our history, but our country has always been about the future.
Can’t go back to the leaders and ideas of the past.

--
You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
To view this discussion on the web visit https://groups.google.com/d/msgid/hrcrapid/D151B6B1.52700%25creynolds%40gpg.com.
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara DuBois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: "Sara Du Bois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
Date: 7/22/2008 1:28:29 AM
Subject: [big campaign] '08 Daily News Clips - 7/22

08 Election Daily News Clips
July 22nd, 2008

Candidate Tracking:

All times in Eastern Standard Time
10am McCain: Attends a meeting with Union Leader publisher Joe McQuaid

12pm McCain: Town Hall in Rochester, NH - 31 Wakefield St, Rochester, NH
- Tracking scheduled for this event
1:30pm BUSH : Remarks in honor of Colombian Independence Day from the White House

5:05pm BUSH: Attends Goddard-Georgia Victory Committee Reception at a private residence in Atlanta, Georgia

5:30pm McCain: Fund raiser in Baltimore, MD

6:30pm Brownback: Reception in Washington DC [McCain surrogate event]

News Clips:

MCCAIN NEWS
McCain's Maverick Side: Grandpa Would Be Proud (Washington Post 7/22/08)
By Jonathan Weisman; A04
...While much has been made of McCain's paternal lineage -- the upstanding admirals of the Navy -- less appears to be known about Arch Wright, who made a fortune on liquor, gambling and oil in Indian territory before relocating to Los Angeles with a sprawling clan in tow, including McCain's mother, Roberta Wright McCain. He died there in 1971, when McCain was being held as a prisoner of war in North Vietnam.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/21/AR2008072102653.html

Iraqi schedule for withdrawal close to Obama's (LA Times 7/22/08)
By Alexandra Zavis and Doug Smith
The announcement bolsters the Democratic candidate in the early days of his Middle East trip. Meanwhile, John McCain visits with President George H.W. Bush in Maine.
http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-fg-obamairaq22-2008jul22,0,3471222.story

Bush a Double-Edged Sword for McCain (ABC News 7/22/08)
By JENNIFER PARKER
Once Political Enemies, McCain Negotiates Political Alliance With President
http://abcnews.go.com/Politics/Vote2008/story?id=5420632&page=1

McCain indicates US troops could withdraw in 2 years (Reuters 7/21/08)
By Jeff Mason
Republican presidential candidate John McCain appeared to leave a door open on Monday to a large-scale drawdown of U.S. troops from Iraq in the next two years.
http://www.reuters.com/article/latestCrisis/idUSN21464471

NYT REJECTS MCCAIN'S EDITORIAL; SHOULD 'MIRROR' OBAMA (Drudge Report 7/21/08)
An editorial written by Republican presidential hopeful McCain has been rejected by the NEW YORK TIMES --

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

less than a week after the paper published an essay written by Obama, the DRUDGE REPORT has learned.
http://drudgereport.com/flashnym.htm
Link to NYT Statement on McCain Op-Ed: http://thepage.time.com/ny-times-statement-on-mccain-op-ed/

McCain gaffes pile up; critics pile on (Politico 7/22/08)
By: Mike Allen and Jim VandeHei
Senator John McCain (R-Ariz.) said "Iraq" when he apparently meant "Afghanistan" on Monday, adding to a string of mixed-up word choices that is giving ammunition to the opposition.
http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0708/11939.html

John McCain cites nonexistent border (Chicago Tribune blog 7/21/08)
by Katie Fretland
Can you name the country directly northwest of Pakistan? Got it? The correct answer is Afghanistan. Not Iraq. But in an interview on ABC's Good Morning America, Sen. John McCain referred to the nonexistent border of Iraq and Pakistan. It was the first publicized foreign policy mistake by a presidential candidate during the time Sen. Barack Obama has been in the Middle East.
http://www.swamppolitics.com/news/politics/blog/2008/07/john_mccain_geography.html
See Yglesias's "The Iraq-Pakistan Border": http://matthewyglesias.theatlantic.com/archives/2008/07/the_iraqpakistan_border.php

Never Underestimate McCain, But... (TIME 7/22/08)
By Michael Grunwald
John McCain might seem like a long shot. He's the Republican nominee at a time when the two-term Republican President is wildly unpopular and Republicans are losing elections in perennially Republican districts and the party base isn't exactly drooling over him. He supported the president's unpopular efforts to transform Iraq and revamp Social Security; he was against the Bush tax cuts before he was for them. He's a 71-year-old Washington hand in a change election. And his 46-year-old opponent is a lot better at raising money, delivering speeches, drawing crowds and registering new voters.
http://www.time.com/time/printout/0,8816,1825337,00.html

McCain, at Bush Home, Faults Obama on War Plan (NYT 7/22/08)
By ELISABETH BUMILLER
KENNEBUNKPORT, Me. — Senator John McCain was like the wallflower at an international political dance on Monday as he campaigned at the quiet summer home of a popular President Bush, George H. W., while the worldwide news media spotlight beamed down on Senator Barack Obama in Baghdad.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/07/22/us/politics/22mccain.html?ref=politics
See Reuters blog's "Bush Sr. praises McCain, muses about history and his son" http://blogs.reuters.com/trail08/2008/07/22/bush-sr-praises-mccain-muses-about-history-and-his-son/

McCain Says Obama Still Wrong on Iraq, Afghanistan (AP 7/21/08)
By TOM RAUM
(KENNEBUNKPORT, Maine) — Republican Sen. John McCain insisted on Monday that he has been consistently right on both Iraq and Afghanistan while Democratic rival Sen. Barack Obama "has been completely wrong."
http://www.time.com/time/politics/article/0,8599,1825075,00.html

McCain returns to NH with visit to Rochester (NH Union Leader 7/22/08)
By SCOTT BROOKS
"Mac" is back. Sen. John McCain returned to New Hampshire last night, flashing an "OK" sign at an aide as he stepped out onto an airport tarmac in Manchester. ...The senator's low-key arrival in Manchester stood in stark contrast to his Democratic rival's ongoing visit to the Middle East. Sen. Barack Obama, of Illinois, was swarmed by media as he arrived in Baghdad yesterday for a meeting with Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki and other Iraqi leaders.
http://www.unionleader.com/article.aspx?headline=McCain+returns+to+NH+with+visit+to+Rochester&articleId=248d6f19-aaa4-40a4-b95b-b365fcaff562

McCain Coming To Maryland -- For Cash (Washington Post blog 7/22/08)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

John Wagne
Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) is scheduled to make a fundraising stop in Maryland tomorrow night. The presumptive Republican presidential nominee is booked at the Centre Club in downtown Baltimore. Tickets start at $1,000 a person. Entrance to a VIP reception, which includes a photo with the senator, is $2,300.
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/annapolis/2008/07/mccain_coming_to_maryland_for.html?sid=ST2008072200054&pos=list

McCain courts Mainers (Portland Press Herald 7/22/08)
By DIETER BRADBURY
U.S. Sen. John McCain declared the troop surge in Iraq a success during campaign and fundraising stops in Maine on Monday, and also chided Illinois Democratic Sen. Barack Obama for a lack of experience in national security and foreign policy.
http://pressherald.mainetoday.com/story.php?id=200715&ac=PHnws
See WGME's "McCain in Maine": http://www.wgme.com/News/story_detail/story_detail_1.shtml

McCain adviser lobbied for Stephen Payne (AP 7/21/08)
By PETE YOST
A top foreign policy adviser to John McCain has lobbied the National Security Council, Congress and the State Department on behalf of Stephen Payne, the Texas businessman and longtime Republican fundraiser caught up in a controversy over whether he sought to sell access to the Bush White House. According to records on file with Congress, McCain foreign policy adviser Randy Scheunemann lobbied the Senate and House on behalf of Payne's firm, Worldwide Strategic Partners Inc., in 2002.
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5gapzbJD6CsnU1TsZ3KuBV2sZSjRwD922GM3O0
See TPM's "Homeland Security Adviser Offering Cash-For-Access Deal Worked With McCain's Foreign Policy Adviser": http://tpmmuckraker.talkingpointsmemo.com/2008/07/homeland_security_advisor_who.php

McCain Knows Best: Rejects Maliki's Timetable But Says 'I Know What Iraqis Want' (ThinkProgress 7/21/08)
This weekend, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said he wanted U.S. troops out of Iraq as soon as possible, supporting the plan set forth by Sen. Barack Obama (D-IL). "Obama talks about 16 months. That, we think, would be the right timeframe for a withdrawal, with the possibility of slight changes," he said.
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/07/21/mccain-maliki-withdrawal/

Pastor Hagee returns (Washington Times blog 7/21/08)
BY Stephen Dinan
Joe Lieberman speaks at a banquet dinner tomorrow with pastor John Hagee — yes, that Hagee, the man who caused John McCain such a headache earlier this year and forced McCain to reject his endorsement.
http://www.washingtontimes.com/weblogs/dinan/2008/Jul/21/pastor-hagee-returns/
See WaPo's "Irreverent Reverends": http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/21/AR2008072102736.html?sid=ST2008072200054&pos=list

McCain Urges More Drilling, Blames Obama for Gas Prices (Washington Post 7/22/08)
By Howard Kurtz; A04
...Analysis: John McCain may try in this ad to blame rising gas prices on Barack Obama, but after 7 1/2 years of the Bush administration, that's a stretch. McCain himself said last week that America's "dangerous dependence on foreign oil has been 30 years in the making"; Obama has been in Washington for less than four.
Link to video of ad: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=EiTpS4MK3D8
Link to script: http://thepage.time.com/script-for-mccain-ad-pump/
Link to Obama Response to McCain "Pump" Ad: http://thepage.time.com/obama-response-to-mccain-pump-ad/

Obama, Maliki, and McCain (National Review Online 7/21/08)
By Byron York
With Obama visiting, the Iraqi PM delivers a body-blow to the GOP candidate.
http://article.nationalreview.com/?q=OWMxNTQ5ZGIyOTEzMzFmNDVlNmJiYmFlY2Y0NDRjYzg=

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama and McCain diverge on Israeli-Palestinian conflict (Christian Science Monitor 7/21/08)
By Howard LaFranchi
Obama likely to return US to role of 'honest broker.' McCain sees fighting Islamic extremists as paramount.
http://www.csmonitor.com/2008/0722/p01s01-uspo.html

John McCain -- Pious Pilate (Huffington Post 7/21/08)
By Thomas B. Edsall
...The adversarial relationship between McCain and the religious wing of the GOP raises doubts as to how effective Monday's decision by Focus on the Family honcho James Dobson will be to abandon his opposition to McCain. At the same time, such hard-right religious leaders as Dobson, 72, and televangelist Pat Robertson, 78, (Moral Majority leader Jerry Falwell died in 2007) are being supplanted by younger and more tolerant Christian leaders who are less likely to become adamant opponents of Democratic candidates.
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/07/21/john-mccain----pious-pila_n_114177.html

McCain Ally Counsels Alarmist Attack On Health Care (Huffington Post 7/21/08)
Lester Feder
Political consultant Dick Morris today recommended John McCain use alarmist distortions to get off the defensive on health care. Morris offered this counsel days after Al Hubbard, architect of President Bush's health care plan now touted by McCain, compared Americans' use of the health care system to shoppers who indiscriminately buy caviar while someone else foots the bill.
http://www.huffingtonpost.com/lester-feder/mccain-ally-counsels-alar_b_114131.html

Column Sends Rumors Flying on McCain VP Choice (WSJ blog 7/21/08)
By Elizabeth Holmes
Rumors that John McCain will announce his running mate sometime this week flew fast and furiously Monday evening, with the campaign's coy response fueling the speculation.
http://blogs.wsj.com/washwire/2008/07/21/column-sends-rumors-flying-on-mccain-vp-choice/

Fineman: Bush is pushing for a McCain administration to 'cover over' the misdeeds of his presidency (ThinkProgress 7/21/08)
Yesterday on The Chris Matthews Show on NBC, Newsweek columnist Howard Fineman revealed one of the reasons President Bush is pushing so hard for Sen. John McCain (R-AZ) to win the election in November:
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/07/21/fineman-bush-is-pushing-for-a-mccain-administration-to-cover-over-the-misdeeds-of-his-presidency/

Does Kemp scramble his 'dear friend' McCain's nerves? (LA Times blog 7/22/08)
By Stuart Silverstein
While campaigning in Buffalo, N.Y., John McCain made a puzzling comment about a local hero, Jack Kemp. First he called Kemp -- a onetime Buffalo Bills quarterback who later represented western New York for nine terms as a Republican congressman -- a "dear friend." But McCain, speaking at an art museum Monday, went on to say that "I haven't met anybody who isn't afraid of Jack Kemp."
http://latimesblogs.latimes.com/washington/2008/07/does-kemp-scram.html

Cindy McCain touring Rwanda (USA TODAY 7/22/08)
By Rick Hampson
Her trip may not be as high-profile as another world tour underway right now, but Cindy McCain insists she's not in Africa for publicity.
http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/election2008/2008-07-21-cindy-mccain_N.htm

The Perfect Part (Washington Post 7/22/08)
By Libby Copeland; C01
Cindy McCain might yearn to be invisible sometimes, or at the very least, not surrounded by the Secret Service and photographers and gawking people. The scrutiny seems too much to bear. Something about that half-apologetic manner.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/21/AR2008072102905.html

OPINIONS AND EDITORIALS

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For McCain, the surge is a losing strategy (LA Times 7/22/08)
By Jonah Goldberg
Its success in quieting Iraq may make it easier for voters to choose Obama.
http://www.latimes.com/news/opinion/la-oe-goldberg22-2008jul22,0,6582409.column

Candidates' positions on Iraq differ less than you'd think (USA Today 7/22/08)
...Obama and Republican John McCain are maximizing their differences when they talk to voters, but in practical terms there's less and less daylight between them. Rhetorically, Obama backs a fixed timetable for withdrawing American troops while McCain wants to stay as long as "victory" takes and beyond. But if the Iraqis want the U.S. out and they prove capable of taking over, both ideas lead to the same end on about the same schedule.
http://blogs.usatoday.com/oped/2008/07/candidates-posi.html#more

Timelines in the Sand (Washington Post 7/22/08)
By Eugene Robinson; A21
It's not a "timetable" for extricating U.S troops from Iraq that George W. Bush is suddenly talking about, and heaven help anyone who accuses him of proposing a "timeline." No, the Decider says he is now amenable to a "time horizon," which apparently is a whole different kind of time thing -- not at all like the sensible course of action that Democrats and other critics of the Iraq occupation have been demanding.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/21/AR2008072102361.html

McCain flops on emissions standards (Detroit News 7/21/08)
By Daniel Howes
Would someone please tell Sen. John McCain, the GOP's presidential wannabe, that straight talk and flip-flopping don't mix. Not in the space of a month. Not when the issue -- whether the next president supports allowing individual states to set emissions rules for new cars and trucks -- means Detroit's automakers could face billions more in R&D spending should the so-called EPA waiver sought by California and a dozen or so other states become law.
http://detnews.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20080721/OPINION03/807210326

BUSH NEWS

In key Gitmo case, Mukasey stays on White House path (LA Times blog 7/21/08)
Can caretaker Atty. Gen. Michael B. Mukasey set the Justice Department straight? That is the question that hangs over the short-termer, who inherited a department set back on its heels by complaints of political interference and a readiness to overlook legal standards in the fight against terrorism.
http://latimesblogs.latimes.com/presidentbush/2008/07/guantanamo-muka.html

Bush law chief seeks conflict declaration on Qaeda (Reuters 7/21/08)
By Randall Mikkelsen
Congress should explicitly declare a state of armed conflict with al Qaeda to make clear the United States can detain suspected members as long as the war on terrorism lasts, U.S. Attorney General Michael Mukasey said on Monday.
http://www.reuters.com/article/topNews/idUSN2140857120080721

Bush: 'I do know about YouTube.' (ThinkProgress 7/21/08)
On Saturday, the Arizona Star reported that President Bush asked the audience to turn off recording devices at a Friday fundraiser, afraid that his remarks could be posted to YouTube:
http://thinkprogress.org/2008/07/21/bush-i-do-know-about-youtube/

Maliki's Iraq pullout line keeps White House scrambling (LA Times blog 7/21/08)
A clever White House press secretary can pretty much tell what questions are going to be welling up from the seats in the press briefing room and comes out prepared. So it was no surprise today that Dana Perino wrote a statement—"all on my own," she said self-deprecatingly—to tackle the controversy du jour: Whether U.S. officials had put the muscle on Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to back off his seeming endorsement of Barack Obama's 16-month timetable for pulling U.S. troops out of Iraq.
http://latimesblogs.latimes.com/presidentbush/2008/07/maliki-obama-tr.html

Editorial: Library donors need to be named (Dallas Morning News 7/22/08)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Stephen Payne was operating as a free agent. Let's be clear about that. But the Houston lobbyist's actions should get President Bush's attention. Mr. Bush needs to be sure no one will undercut his presidential library, which will open at Southern Methodist University after he leaves office.
http://www.dallasnews.com/sharedcontent/dws/dn/opinion/editorials/stories/DN-bushlibrary_21edi.ART.State.Edition1.4d5f58e.html

T. Boone Pickens Rides the Wind (NYT 7/22/08)
T. Boone Pickens, the legendary wildcatter and corporate raider, has decided that drilling for more oil is not the answer to the nation's energy problems. President Bush should listen to his fellow Texan and longtime political ally.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/07/22/opinion/22tue3.html?_r=1&ref=opinion&oref=slogin

OTHER TOP NEWS

Serbia captures fugitive wartime leader Karadzic (AFP 7/22/08)
Indicted war crimes suspect Radovan Karadzic, one of the world's most wanted men, was practising medicine and living in Belgrade when he was arrested on genocide charges, officials said Tuesday.
http://afp.google.com/article/ALeqM5juCwZRe6uB-Due2DoO7trgsV_xfg
Link to McCain's statement: http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5hDN-CfGY3szC6ylS1zL87_tRXoSwD922HLQ00

Russia increases weapon sales to Chavez (Washington Times 7/22/08)
Russia is showing its irritation with U.S. intervention in its back yard by selling more weapons to Venezuela's Hugo Chavez. ...Move seen as slap at Bush over missile defense http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2008/jul/22/russia-increases-weapon-sales-to-chavez/

For Obama, a First Step Is Not a Misstep (NYT 7/22/08)
By RICHARD A. OPPEL Jr. and JEFF ZELENY
The Iraqi government on Monday left little doubt that it favors a withdrawal plan for American combat troops similar to what Senator Barack Obama has proposed, providing Mr. Obama with a potentially powerful political boost on a day he spent in Iraq working to fortify his credibility as a wartime leader.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/07/22/us/politics/22assess.html?_r=1&hp&oref=slogin

Citizens United to Release Anti-Obama Documentary (NYT blog 7/21/08)
By Michael Falcone
An independent conservative group went on the air with a new ad on Monday to be followed by a full-length documentary film that attempts to portray Senator Barack Obama, the presumptive Democratic nominee, as an over-hyped media darling.
http://thecaucus.blogs.nytimes.com/2008/07/21/citizens-united-to-release-anti-obama-documentary/

House Democratic Campaign Arm Broadens TV Buy (Washington Post blog 7/21/08)
By Chris Cillizza
Moving quickly to capitalize on their massive financial advantage, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has reserved television time in nearly two dozen more House districts, bringing their total investment in competitive contests to $53 million.
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/thefix/2008/07/house_democratic_campaign_arms.html

POLLS

Poll: Half of U.S. says press pro-Obama (Politico 7/21/08)
By: Alexander Burns
Half of Americans think the press is trying to help Sen. Barack Obama win the presidential election, according to a new poll by Rasmussen Reports.
http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0708/11912.html

--
Sara DuBois
Deputy Director of Tracking & Media Monitoring
Progressive Accountability Office

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

sara@progressiveaccountability.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Moira Whelan" <mwhelan@nsnetwork.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 7/23/2008 3:29:55 AM
Subject: [big campaign] McCain gets Iraq timeline wrong

http://www.nsnetwork.org/node/909

NSN Daily Update:
McCain Gets History of Surge Wrong
7/23/08

Yesterday in an interview with CBS News, McCain attacked Obama for not understanding the history of the surge. Yet McCain's own explanation of the surge's history was completely wrong – suggesting that he misunderstands or is indifferent to the fundamental dynamics driving events in Iraq and shaping our policy there. McCain believes that the "Anbar Awakening" that led Sunnis to abandon insurgency against the US – so critical to the reduction in violence – occurred as a result of the surge in spring 2007. In fact, the Anbar Awakening began in the summer of 2006 as a result of the Sunnis' own calculations and the leadership of General Casey. In January 2007, McCain himself acknowledged the Awakening and called it a reason to support the surge.

For five years, US policy toward Iraq has been shaped by events we misinterpreted or disregarded. McCain's lack of understanding matters.

Events in Anbar Province, 2006-2008

- June 2006: Ready First Combat Team (1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division) led by Colonel Sean MacFarland arrives in Anbar's capital Ramadi. [Military Review, 3-4/2008]

- September 9, 2006: In cooperation with MacFarland's team, Sheikh Abu Risha organizes the first meeting of what became the Anbar Awakening. [Military Review, 3-4/2008]

- January 5, 2007: McCain discusses the importance of the Anbar Awakening at AEI. [CSPAN, 1/5/07]

- January 10, 2007: President announces the surge in a speech to the nation. [White House, 1/10/07]

- Late January / Early February 2007: First surge brigades begin arriving. Only 2,700 new troops have arrived by end of February. [Brookings Iraq Index, 3/29/07]

- February 2007: Ready First Combat Team begins leaving Anbar. Hostile contacts with insurgents had dropped 70% from June 2006 to February 2007. [Military Review, 3-4/2008]

John McCain attacks Sen. Obama on the surge's history. Katie Couric asked McCain, "Sen. Obama says, while the increased number of U.S. troops contributed to increased security in Iraq, he also credits the Sunni awakening and the Shiite government going after militias. And says that there might have been improved security even without the surge. What's your response to that?" McCain responded, " I don't know how you respond to something that is such a false depiction of what actually happened. Colonel McFarland was contacted by one of the major Sunni sheiks. Because of the surge we were able to go out and protect that sheik and others. And it began the Anbar awakening. I mean, that's just a matter of history." [CBS News, 7/22/08]

McCain's history is wrong, according to Colonel McFarland. The Commanding Officer in the Anbar province at the time, wrote an article detailing his first-hand experiences there in starting the Awakening. The timeframe he discusses is June 2006-February 2007. McFarland notes that the first surge troops were just arriving as his men were leaving Anbar. McFarland was therefore not even in Iraq when McCain places him there. [Military Review, March/April 2008]

The Anbar Awakening came before the surge. As Colin Kahl noted in Foreign Affairs, "The Awakening began in Anbar Province more than a year before the surge and took off in the summer and fall of 2006 in Ramadi and elsewhere, long before extra U.S. forces started flowing into Iraq in February and March of 2007." [Foreign Affairs, July/August 2008]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In January 2007, McCain was aware of the start of the Awakening and used it as a justification for the surge. In a speech before the American Enterprise Institute on January 5, 2007, McCain said, "Too often the light at the tunnel has turned out to be a train, but I really believe -- I really believe that there's a strong possibility that you may see a very substantial change in Anbar province due to this new changes in our relationships with the sheiks in the region. ... But it's important, as I said in my opening remarks, that this troop surge be significant and sustained. Otherwise, don't do it." [Washington Post, 7/23/08]

Quick Hits

The Wall Street Journal reports that "the outlines of a possible consensus" on a 2010 withdrawal date are developing for an Iraq pullout between the Bush administration, the U.S. military, the Maliki government, Senator Obama, and possibly Senator McCain.

Salon buzzes about a possible investigation of the Bush administration's surveillance regime with new documents revealing interest in a possible inquiry modeled on the Watergate-era Church Committee.

Iranian President Ahmadinejad called the recent round of talks over Iran's nuclear program "good," also stating that US Envoy William Burns, who was at the meeting merely to "observe," "spoke politely and in a dignified way."

Senator Barack Obama continues his overseas trip with, today travelling to Israel and the West Bank. Meeting with Israeli and Palestinian leaders, Obama reaffirmed his "abiding commitment to Israel's security."

The U.S. military has significantly refined its tactical approach to air strikes in Afghanistan, trying to lessen the amount of collateral damage and civilian casualties.

A boycott by Kurdish lawmakers has scuttled the provincial election legislation passed by the Iraqi Parliament.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met with her North Korean counterpart today, the first such high-level nuclear talks in four years.

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace" <info@centerpeace.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 3/18/2016 6:55:58 AM
Subject: News Update - March 18

S. DANIEL ABRAHAM
CENTER FOR MIDDLE EAST PEACE

Israel and the Middle East News Update

Friday, March 18

Click here for a printer-friendly version.

Headlines:

- Former Israeli Spy Chief Meir Dagan Passes Away
- Year After Election, 46% of Israelis See Alternative to Netanyahu
- EU Denounces Israel's West Bank Land Appropriation
- Shin Bet: Personal Issues Motivated Recent Lone-Wolf Attacks
- Netanyahu: Breaking the Silence Crossed Another Red Line
- US Rejects Kurds' Self-Governed Autonomous Zones in Syria
- Putin: Russia Can Ramp Up Syria Presence Within 'Hours'
- Top General: As Long As Erdogan Is In Power, Israel Will Face Problems

Commentary:

- Ma'ariv: "The Last Campaign"
  - By Ben Caspit, Senior Columnist, Ma'ariv
- WINEP: "How Would Palestinians React to a UNSC Resolution?"
  - By Ghaith al-Omari, Senior Fellow, Washington Institute for Near East Policy

---

Wall Street Journal

Former Israeli Spy Chief Meir Dagan Passes Away

Meir Dagan, who as chief of Israel's intelligence agency was widely credited with disrupting Iran's nuclear program, died Thursday. He was 71. Mr. Dagan served as director of the agency, the Mossad, from 2002 until his retirement in 2011. During that time, Israel is believed to have carried out deadly assaults on Iran's nuclear scientists and cyberattacks against its nuclear enrichment facilities. As a matter of policy, Israel neither confirms nor denies such operations.
See also, "Meir Dagan, Israeli Spy Chief Who Took Aim at Iran, Dies at 71" (The New York Times)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jerusalem Post

Year After Election, 46% of Israelis See Alternative to Netanyahu

Forty-six percent of Israelis believe there will be a replacement for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in the near future, according to a Panels Research poll taken Tuesday and Wednesday for The Jerusalem Post and its Hebrew sister paper, Ma'ariv Sof Hashavua. The poll was taken in honor of Thursday's anniversary of the March 17, 2015 general election in which Netanyahu's Likud Party emerged victorious by a wide margin. Asked if there is a replacement for Netanyahu as prime minister in sight, 46% of respondents said yes, 41% said no, and 13% said they did not know. The candidates who fared the best were Yesh Atid leader Yair Lapid, Bayit Yehudi head Naftali Bennett, and former IDF chief of staff Gabi Ashkenazi.

Times of Israel

EU Denounces Israel's West Bank Land Appropriation

The European Union on Thursday blasted Israel's land appropriation this week of 580 acres near the West Bank city of Jericho, saying it raises questions about Jerusalem's commitment to the two-state solution. The United States, United Kingdom and Germany have already condemned the decision, while the United Nation has urged Israel to reverse the move. "Israel's decision to declare 234 hectares near Jericho in Area C of the West Bank as state land is a further step that risks undermining the viability of a future Palestinian state and therefore calls into question Israel's commitment to a two-state solution," the EU said in a statement.

See also, "EU: Israel's 'Land Seizure' Threatens Peace Process" (Ynet News)

Jerusalem Post

Shin Bet: Personal Issues Motivated Recent Lone-Wolf Attacks

Psychological problems are a recurring motive for Palestinian "lone wolf" attackers as of late, the Shin Bet (Israel Security Agency) said on Wednesday. The security agency's website cited the example of Fouad Tamimi, who wounded two Border Police officers in a shooting attack on Salah a-Din Street in east Jerusalem earlier this month. According to the Shin Bet, Tamimi was known as a thief and a drug addict. Like other attackers, he was not identified with any terrorist group nor did he have any prior security arrests, according to the Shin Bet.

See also, "Stabbing Attack at Jerusalem Mall" (Arutz Sheva)

Ynet News

Netanyahu: Breaking the Silence Crossed Another Red Line

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu accused Breaking the Silence of "crossing another red line" on Thursday evening following an investigative report aired on Channel 2 documenting the NGO's activists trying to obtain sensitive and classified operational intelligence about the IDF. The prime minister said that the "security investigative authorities are examining the issue." The Channel 2 report claimed that Breaking the Silence worked to place its people in classified units in the IDF in order to gather information that the organization could then use in its activities against "the occupation." In addition, the report claimed that the NGO's activists interviewed IDF veterans on issues that do not concern human rights, but rather military secrets.

See also, "Breaking the Silence Under Investigation After Report Claims It Collects Military Intelligence" (Ha'aretz)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ynet News

US Rejects Kurds' Self-Governed Autonomous Zones in Syria

The US State Department, responding to a Kurdish bid for autonomy in northern Syria, said it did not recognized self-governed zones inside the war-torn country and was working for a unified, nonsectarian state under different leadership. "We don't support self-ruled, semi-autonomous zones inside Syria. We just don't," said State Department spokesman John Kirby. "What we want to see is a unified, whole Syria that has in place a government that is not led by (President) Bashar Assad that is responsive to the Syrian people. Whole, unified, nonsectarian Syria, that's the goal," Kirby said, adding that other countries supported that aim as well.

Times of Israel

Putin: Russia Can Ramp Up Syria Presence Within 'Hours'

President Vladimir Putin on Thursday warned Russia could ramp up its military presence in Syria within "several hours" if needed, as he urged all sides of the conflict to respect a ceasefire. Putin spoke during a ceremony in the Kremlin's sumptuous St. George's Hall to bestow awards on servicemen who fought in Syria, with the military's top brass among some 700 personnel from the armed forces in attendance. "If there's a need, Russia literally within several hours can ramp up its presence in the region to the size required for the unfolding situation and use the whole arsenal of possibilities we have at our disposal."
See also, "Putin: Russia Can Rebuild Its Syria Forces in 'a Few Hours'" (Ynet News)

Ha'aretz

Top General: If Erdogan Is in Power, Israel Faces Problems

Amid ongoing negotiations toward reconciliation between Israel and Turkey, the IDF deputy chief of staff made rare remarks on Tuesday regarding the negative effects the regime of Recep Erdogan has on the two countries' relationship. "As long as Turkey is ruled by a party with a strong Islamist orientation, by a ruler as adversarial as Erdogan, as long as this is the situation – we can expect problems and challenges," Maj. Gen. Yair Golan said at a conference on "The IDF's current challenges" at Bar-Ilan University.
See also, "IDF Deputy Chief Cautions Over Turkey Relations Under Erdogan Rule" (BICOM)
See also, "White House Calls on Turkey to Respect Democratic Values" (Times of Israel)

Ma'ariv – March 18, 2016

The Last Campaign

By Ben Caspit

Meir Dagan died a worried man. His body had been devoured by cancer; his soul had been devoured by concern. The State of Israel was the love of his life. For decades, he defended it with his body. Over the past few years, he looked at the direction in which the country was going, and was alarmed. He had never doubted the state's future, and suddenly, he feared for its fate. He enlisted into another, final battle for the state. He lost that battle.

He fought in all of Israel's wars from the Six-Day War on. He sustained serious injuries, he was decorated, and he did not break. [...] He gave the angel of death a fight, against all the odds. He was a sober man and did not pray for a miracle. He simply fought every day anew. "I'm playing for time," he would say to anyone who asked how he was feeling. He knew that he was dying and did all he could to postpone it. […]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At that demonstration, on the eve of the elections, in Rabin Square, when he spoke about leadership and about Zionism, he could not hold back his tears. He knew that soon he would not be here. His enormous will power extended his life by a few precious and important years. He was keeping himself alive by virtue of the last droplets of his determination. […]

Dagan was the spearhead of the clash between the political and the military echelon over an attack on Iran in the years 2010-2011. He feared an act of lunacy by Netanyahu and Barak, and did not hesitate to clash with them. Together with him were Yuval Diskin, his close friend and GSS director, chief of staff Gabi Ashkenazi and IDF Intelligence Branch director Amos Yadlin. This was not a rebellion and not a putsch, but rather an attempt to adhere to the law and to sanity.

When Barak and Netanyahu ordered the directors of the security branches at the forum of seven to put the security establishment on alert ahead of a strike, they refused to do this. Dagan was the person who gave the firmest speech, which reached the point of loud shouting. The order was not legal. The kind of alert that Netanyahu and Barak wanted requires a decision of the security cabinet and the cabinet. Dagan discerned Barak and Netanyahu's attempt to bypass them and to ignore the law. He knew that this kind of alert could leak and deteriorate the entire region to war and this was why he was opposed. He stressed that he would obey any order given, as long as it was legal and approved in a security cabinet decision.

Later, when he asked if he truly believed that Netanyahu was capable of having the courage to attack Iran, he said: "It's not a matter of courage. He did not have the courage, but the orders that he gave, which were illegal, could still have caused the situation to deteriorate to the point where it would have been impossible to prevent a war."

His relationship with Netanyahu was not good and became worse after the assassination of Mabhouh in Dubai, which was attributed to the Mossad, and perceived as a stinging failure of the Mossad under his leadership.

On his last on the job, Dagan met with the senior analysts at Mossad headquarters and gave an astounding performance, in which he described, in clear words, his opposition to attacking Iran's nuclear facilities and the disaster this was liable to cause Israel. This was unprecedented. Dagan did not regret this to his dying day.

"It was my duty," he later told me, "like me, all the other heads of the security branches, and those who replaced them, felt the same way. This combination of Bibi and Barak could have visited disaster on the state, even without their having planned this."

Dagan's problem with Netanyahu was over his decision-making ability. If there is one thing Dagan detests, it's cowardice. In long conversations with him over the years, he told me about the process of getting Netanyahu to approve a Mossad operation: "I would come and present the operation to him. If it was a simple operation, he would approve it verbally. If it was an operation that could encounter complications, he would be silent, or nod.

Back and forth, up and down. I would ask him, Mr. Prime Minister, you are nodding, what does that mean, do you approve? I need to know. He knew that the conversation was being recorded and did not want to leave a recording of him approving an operation that might encounter trouble. I asked him to prepare a key for his head movements, so that I could understand. I asked him to speak aloud. He would evade me. He would try to say, 'talk to the cabinet secretary,' but I would not agree. Sometimes he would even hint that I shouldn't inform him. that I should tell him afterwards. I didn't agree. I developed a system: when I wanted an operation approved, I would bring a large forum with me, including the actual combatants. Facing a lot of people, he would approve, for the façade. This shocked me. Think about Mossad fighters embarking on an operation and knowing that the prime minister left no recording and did not approve it verbally. If it was successful, he would take the credit. If it failed, it wouldn't be his fault."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This caused Dagan to detest Netanyahu. This was no longer something he could control. […]

After ending his term in the Mossad, Dagan thought about entering political life. […] His illness sabotaged his intentions, but not his mission. In the final days of the last Netanyahu government, Dagan went to all the party leaders in an effort to form an alternative coalition and to topple Bibi. […] Dagan, with the last of his strength, enlisted in the effort against Netanyahu, and failed. […]

I had long conversations with him in the last few years. I asked him about his huge effort in an attempt to replace Netanyahu. This is what he said: "I'm sick. I know that I'm going to die. Soon I will not be here. I have no vested interests and I ask nothing for myself. Personally, I have nothing against Bibi. He is a smart man, very educated, with good energy. The only thing I care about is the future of the state and its welfare. I took part in Israel's hardest wars. I went through terrible times. I never doubted our future and our strength. In these years, under Netanyahu's governments, I am starting to doubt the country's future. This is killing me."

That conversation took place a short time after the end of Operation Protective Edge. Dagan further said: "Look at how an organization like Hamas, from the bottom league, teaches us a lesson. He [Netanyahu] is not willing to take responsibility. Just as he was scared to approve operations for me, he is scared to do the right thing. The only thing that truly interests him is to continue to be prime minister."

"He will do anything to survive. Believe me, I don't hate him. I love Israel. He spent 11 billion shekels on a war that won't happen, and he didn't know how to win a war that was. Look how many bunker-buster bombs were fired at Hamas's tunnels. This is disgraceful. After all, this had no effect. Look how many meetings he calls. They never end. Hours and hours. Why all this talk? Every meeting is over two hours long and is a waste of time. It is an excuse not to make decisions."

"To undertake a mission," Dagan said, "you need to do four things: define the mission, appoint a commander, allocate the means and set a timetable. With Bibi, none of these things are done. They don't exist. And that's why missions are not undertaken. He would postpone Mossad missions because of primaries because he didn't want to run into complications. He doesn't know how to distinguish between his personal benefit and the country's. He is certain that they are the same thing."

It drove him crazy that Israel was not capitalizing on the opportunities in its path. "This is a rare period of time that will not recur," he told me once, "there is the potential of forging an amazing relationship with many Arab states, Israel has no real enemies in the region at the moment; this window of opportunity must be taken advantage of. But he doesn't want and he isn't ready; he is fossilized in his views. We could change reality and history by correctly capitalizing on events around us," said Dagan. "This missed opportunity drives me crazy."

It isn't easy to write this on the open grave of Meir Dagan, but this was his legacy. He was never scared to state his opinion, even though stating an opinion had become scary. The courageous are few; the cowards are in control. That is the reason that Meir Dagan, the man who knew no fear, leaves behind him a particularly big void. Go in peace Meir. You did enough. Thank you for everything.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ben Caspit is a senior columnist for Ma'ariv and other Israeli newspapers.

Washington Institute – March 16, 2016

How Would the Palestinians React to a UNSC Resolution?

If Washington and other parties hope to enshrine the contours of future peacemaking through a Security Council resolution, they will need to overcome numerous obstacles relating to Palestinian politics, regional priorities, and America's diminished standing in the region.

By Ghaith Al-Omari

Since the collapse of negotiations in April 2014, U.S. officials have been careful not to rule out the possibility of publicly spelling out outlines of a peace deal through a presidential speech or UN Security Council (UNSC) resolution. And the idea of providing such an outline, commonly referred to in peace process parlance as "parameters," is not exclusively American. EU diplomats, most vociferously the French, have spoken of it often, as have the Palestinians.

The main logic behind the idea is that, at a time when the parties themselves are unable to reach a deal -- indeed, when the very notion of a two-state solution to the conflict is rapidly losing ground -- such parameters would preserve the two-state concept and create a diplomatic reference point for the resumption of negotiations when times are more opportune. Specifically, they would lay out formulas to guide future resolution of the thorniest issues, calling for measures such as the division of Jerusalem, a nonmilitarized Palestinian state along the 1967 lines, equitable land swaps to compensate for Israeli annexation of certain settlements, the right of Palestinian refugees to move to the Palestinian state but not Israel, and some form of recognition for Israel's Jewish character.

If a new UNSC resolution were the vehicle used to enshrine these parameters, it could become the definitive peace document in much the same way that Resolution 242 served as the basis for future peace initiatives. Despite this praiseworthy objective, however, any UNSC-based approach faces practical obstacles that could not only thwart the effort, but even produce results contrary to the stated intentions. Israel has consistently opposed both the concept of an imposed UNSC solution and many of the specifics, particularly those relating to Jerusalem and borders, so bringing the Israelis along would present its own set of challenges. But dealing with the Palestinian reaction would not be simple either.

PALESTINIAN OBSTACLES

Although Palestinian officials have repeatedly demanded a UNSC parameters resolution, they want this resolution to wholly reflect their positions. December 2014 offers a telling example of how they would likely react to such a proposal. After the collapse of bilateral negotiations led by Secretary of State John Kerry, the Palestine Liberation Organization sought to put forward a parameters resolution, but to do so they had to go through Jordan, the lone Arab UNSC member at that time. In order to garner the minimum nine votes necessary to pass such a resolution -- assuming none of the permanent council members exercised their veto power -- the Jordanians embarked on drafting a balanced resolution that reflected sensitivity to Palestinian positions but also incorporated legitimate Israeli positions. Yet the Palestinians were uncomfortable with the latter elements and insisted on a maximalist draft, which the Jordanians, to their chagrin, felt compelled to submit. Unsurprisingly, the resolution failed to gain nine votes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To understand this behavior, one must realize that the Palestinians had taken the UNSC route primarily for domestic political reasons, not diplomatic reasons. After the bilateral negotiations collapsed, Palestinian leaders were left with nothing to offer their public on the diplomatic front, having already exhausted their prior campaign to gain admittance into UN agencies. They needed to be seen as doing something, but the erosion of their domestic standing deprived them of the political cachet needed to make significant compromises. Thus, submitting a resolution was the primary objective, not passing it. Accepting anything short of a resolution that faithfully mirrored Palestinian positions would have left the leadership vulnerable to domestic opponents.

The Palestinian political scene has only grown more brittle since then. The public's faith in diplomacy has plummeted, and the Palestinian Authority's domestic standing and ability to compromise have further eroded. In addition, recent polls show that around two-thirds of Palestinians believe President Mahmoud Abbas should resign, bringing the question of succession to the fore. That once-taboo topic is now commonly discussed in public and private, and many senior Palestinian politicians are already positioning themselves for the day after Abbas.

If a compromise-based parameters resolution were submitted under such circumstances, it is difficult to imagine any Palestinian politician confronting the inevitably negative public reaction, or any presidential aspirant wanting to be seen as endorsing it. More likely, they would compete in rhetorical one-upmanship to show their opposition to every component of these parameters, particularly regarding refugees and recognition of Israel's Jewish character. Instead of reigniting discussion of a two-state solution and arming the peace camp with new arguments, issuing parameters now would probably cement the negative, uncompromising trends in the internal Palestinian debate.

INTERNATIONAL OBSTACLES

Some observers contend that the two parties need not endorse a UNSC resolution. On the contrary, the argument goes, Israeli and Palestinian protests would indicate that they had been confronted with the necessary set of painful compromises. For this approach to be meaningful, however, the parties would need to be confronted not only with balanced parameters, but also with solid and wide international consensus on a two-state solution, mainly to ensure that Israeli and Palestinian objections do not spill over and color the reaction of others, particularly but not only the Arab states.

Indeed, it can safely be assumed that the Palestinians would lobby Arab states, as well as European and other states, to join them in rejecting any parameters that do not meet their current maximalist standards. And if they successfully mobilized such support, they could trigger a very negative chain of events. For example, instead of reaffirming consensus around the contours of Palestinian-Israeli peace, the parameters might instead expose rifts within the international community and endanger the already battered two-state paradigm. This would be particularly damaging if the Palestinians convinced their supporters to modify the resolution's text in such a way as to force a U.S. veto.

In addition, the Palestinians would likely bring the matter to the Arab League, at a time when relations between that body's members are so problematic that this year's Arab Summit had to be canceled. Under such circumstances, some member states could decide to question and reopen the Arab Peace Initiative, effectively destroying Arab consensus on the two-state solution and dealing a significant blow to the prospects of that solution coming to pass.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Building a solid Arab and international front in support of peace parameters would therefore require two elements. First, the substance of the parameters should clearly reflect the difficult compromises that both sides need to make, including on contentious issues such as abandoning the right of return, accepting the division of Jerusalem, delineating borders along the 1967 lines with equal land swaps, and recognizing Israel's Jewish character. Past discussions in the UN and the Quartet have demonstrated that there is no international consensus yet on these issues.

Second, the United States would need to have the political credit to convince others, particularly Arab countries, to expend their own political capital on supporting controversial parameters and bringing the Palestinians along -- or at least convincing them to moderate the tone of their response. For both the 1991 Madrid peace conference and the 2007 Annapolis conference, three factors greatly facilitated the creation of such coalitions: (1) the peace process was a top Arab priority, (2) Arab states regarded U.S. engagement in peacemaking as partial compensation for the invasion of Iraq (and in the case of Madrid, this was coupled with a sense of gratitude for the liberation of Kuwait), and (3) Arab leaders were in no doubt that the United States was the sole international and regional leader, and that it was willing to exercise this leadership. In today's world, Washington would be hard-pressed to find Arab leaders who consider the Palestinian issue a priority worth expending political capital on, or who view the United States with gratitude, fear, or faith in its regional leadership.

In short, numerous elements relating to Palestinian politics, regional priorities, and America's standing in the region -- not to mention a bevy of Israeli political and diplomatic factors not discussed here -- raise serious challenges to the idea of proposing U.S. or UNSC parameters for Palestinian-Israeli peace. If these challenges are not addressed properly, a parameters resolution could backfire, feeding the Palestinian public's already dangerous skepticism about the feasibility of diplomacy, encouraging more hardline rhetoric among their leaders, and eroding regional and international support for a two-state solution. Instead of giving future leaders a solid international agreement on two-state contours and generating vibrant, healthy debate among Palestinians, an unbalanced resolution -- or one issued without intensive prior consultation with major global stakeholders -- could shatter international consensus and drive the parties even further away from ending the conflict.

Ghaith al-Omari, a senior fellow at The Washington Institute, previously served in various advisory positions with the Palestinian Authority.

S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace
633 Pennsylvania Ave. NW, 5th Floor, Washington, DC 20004
For comments, please contact us at info@centerpeace.org .
www.centerpeace.org

2016 S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace, All rights reserved.
YOU ARE RECEIVING THIS EMAIL BECAUSE YOU SIGNED UP FOR OUR NEWS UPDATES.

unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "The Common Good" <patriciaduff@thecommongood.net>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 2/26/2016 6:05:29 PM
Subject: New News! (2/26/2016)

News as of February 26, 2016

Weekly roundup about our democracy and The Common Good community

Polls

Hillary's campaign gets new push from victory in Nevada Democratic caucus: Clinton 52.6% to Sanders 47.3% AP

Trump wins South Carolina: Trump 32%, Rubio 22.5% Cruz 22.3%, Bush 8%, Kasich 8%, Carson 7% CBS News

Trump wins Nevada: Trump (45.9%) Rubio (23.9%) Cruz (21.4%) Carson (4.8%) Kasich (3.6%) Wash Post

Domestic Affairs

Fight to have Apple open San Bernardino terrorist phone is heating up: [Apple and DOJ] are now urging Congress to "pursue new ground rules for when tech companies must provide law enforcement with greater access to customers' secure, private data." Tony Romm, Politico

Guantanamo proposal fuels more partisan politics: When announcing his plan to shut down the prison, Obama pointed out that former Republican presidential nominees have also supported closing the facility. With the bill dead on arrival, questions arise over whether Obama will take executive action. Jordan Fabian and Kristina Wong, The Hill

Nevada Gov. Brian Sandoval removes himself from consideration a day after reports he was being vetted by the Obama administration. Brent Kendall, WSJ

Shooting rampage in Kansas, 3 killed: Authorities say the man, Cedrick Larry Ford, 38, was issued an abuse protection order from the courts 90 minutes prior to the shooting. John Eligon and Katie Rogers, NYT

2016 Campaign

The most raucous of all GOP debates: Rubio and Cruz realize they have a finite amount of time to make this a one-on-one race with Trump. Jerry Seib, WSJ

Despite a good debate performance, 'Marco-mentum' is still an illusion: Joe Scarborough argues that despite Rubio's performance at Thursday's debate, this may not be enough to further propel his campaign because of his losses to date. Joe Scarborough, Wash Post

NJ Gov. Chris Christie endorses Donald J. Trump: Maggie Haberman, NYT

Trump shatters the GOP: "The Republican party has now fragmented into three main divisions. Ted Cruz heading the traditional conservative purists, Marco Rubio heading the mainstream lane of the GOP, and Donald Trump heading what seem just like angry populists." Shane Goldmacher, Politico

Jeb Bush ends campaign after a disappointing finish in South Carolina's primary on Saturday. Jesse Byrnes, The Hill

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Congressional Hispanic Caucus PAC to endorse Clinton: Kelsey Snell, WashPost

The Economy

Finance, not tech, is driving growth in US billionaires: "40% of growth in U.S. billionaires comes down to the finance sector...27% of all U.S. billionaires in 2014 worked in finance." Silvia Ascarelli, Marketwatch

Has globalization peaked?: "As export values are falling in the US, China, Africa, and the Middle East, questions are rising over whether globalization has reached its limit." Shawn Donnan and Joe Leahy, FT

US growth 'remains robust': "Worries about US recession may be a moot point as the dollar strengthens against the common currency and the yen and as American companies accumulate stockpiles faster than was expected." Richard Blackden, Shawn Donnan, and Sam Fleming, FT

Helicoptering money - some calling for doling out dollars with the economy slowing: "The next step is likely to include fiscal expansion...With fiscal expansion might go direct monetary support, including the most radical policy of all: the "helicopter drops" of money recommended by the late Milton Friedman." Martin Wolf, FT

World's top finance officials meet at G-20 to discuss global economy: Some of the major concerns cited are Japan being on the brink of recession, Europe's low growth, and China's struggling economy. Keith Bradsher, NYT

US manufacturing jumped 4.9% as orders for long-lasting manufactured goods posted largest monthly gain since last spring: This could be "a sign the battered manufacturing industry could be stabilizing after one of its worst years since the recession ended." Anna Louie Sussman, WSJ

Will democracy follow capitalism into Cuba? "Capitalism could be Cuba's salvation. Cuba began in 2011 to liberalize very gradually, allowing private enterprise to flourish in certain sectors, particularly those related to tourism, like restaurants. The steady infiltration of capitalism just might reform the country." Steven Rattner, (TCG Speaker), Op-ed, NY Times

Plans to break up big banks not all they are cracked up to be: "Risks such as lower lending activity and the fact that small banks still present a risk if they fail, along with other arguments hint that breaking up big banks may not be the solution." Christian Stracke, Op-Ed, Pimco

The relationship between stocks and oil prices: "One plausible explanation of the tendency for stocks and oil prices to move together is that both are reacting to a common factor, namely, a softening of global aggregate demand, which hurts both corporate profits and demand for oil." Ben Bernanke, Brookings Institution

Foreign Affairs/National Security

North Korea faces tougher sanctions from the US and China: Pyongyang's nuclear weapon test led the two countries to make this negotiation, which will be voted on by the UN Security Council in upcoming days. This appears to be a diplomatic shift on Beijing's end, but it is unclear if China would be willing to pursue tougher sanctions. Somini Sengupta, NYT

Growing concern over ISIS in Libya: More than a dozen American officials have spoken about their rising concern regarding ISIS, as "the Islamic State's branch in Libya is deepening its reach across a wide area of Africa, attracting new recruits from countries like Senegal." Eric Schmitt, NY Times

How ISIS secret banking network prospers: "Every day, hundreds of money-exchange offices in Iraq, Syria, Turkey and Jordan funnel millions of dollars in and out of militant-held territory. Shiite militias and Iraqi Kurdish fighters are bribed to guard and grant passage of these cash shipments along at least three routes. On the final leg, Islamic State imposes taxes on cash entering and exiting its territory, which buys the smuggler protection." Margaret Coker, WSJ

In the West, the political center holds — but barely: "David Miliband (TCG Speaker) argues that the left- and right-wing revolts stem from the same force: globalization. "The right has no good answer to the problem that globalization erodes people's identities. The left has no good answer to the problem that it exacerbates inequality,"...That leaves traditional politicians struggling to hold on to their supporters while outsiders promise easy answers." Fareed Zakaria, Op-Ed, Wash Post

US-Syrian tension date back to the late 1950s: The US lacks understanding of the historical context and the Syrian perspective about the crises. Robert. F. Kennedy Jr., (TCG Speaker) Politico

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

US & Russia have reached a deal for a cease-fire to begin in Syria on Saturday: Eliza Collins, Politico

Iran election: counting starts after high turnout: "Iranians have been electing a new parliament and Assembly of Experts, a clerical body that appoints the Supreme Leader...The outcome could affect reformist President Hassan Rouhani's chances of re-election in 2017." BBC

Upcoming Events

Congresswoman Tammy Duckworth (D-IL), Candidate for US Senate

Monday, February 29, 2016
Breakfast & remarks: 10:30-11:30am

RSVP

Deborah Ross, former US Representative for NC, Candidate for US Senate

Tuesday, March 1st, 2016
Breakfast & remarks: 11-12pm

RSVP

The Common Good Forum on "Security and Opportunity in Turbulent Times"

Friday, May 20, 2016, 8am-4pm, Sessions all day on national and economic security

RSVP

Thank you TCG Digest contributors: TCG Staff, Isabelle Lehner, Emily Samuels, and Isaac Getlan, and our interns Emily Abrams, Juliet Kirk, Uzma Azhar, Daniela Gutierrez, and Grace Ewing.
Visit our website www.thecommongoodusa.org, Facebook, and our Twitter @TheCommonGood. JOIN IN by sending us your ideas, news, and reactions to admin@thecommongood.net .

This email was sent to podesta@law.georgetown.edu
why did I get this? unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences
The Common Good · 115 East 57th St · Suite 1010 · New York, NY 10022 · USA

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
To: "Fariba Yassaee" <fyassaee@albrightstonebridge.com>
Date: 8/18/2015 12:26:05 PM
Subject: Re: Albright: Another Bush Gets It Wrong on Iraq

Fariba,
I tried calling but maybe you changed your main line. Will you tell Madeleine I loved her op-ed and so did my current boss!
John

On Tuesday, August 18, 2015, Fariba Yassaee <fyassaee@albrightstonebridge.com > wrote:

All, pasted below and at link is a piece Madeleine wrote in response to Jeb Bush's position on Iraq.

http://www.politico.com/magazine/story/2015/08/another-bush-gets-it-wrong-on-iraq-121435.html#.VdJv8oKCOnM

IN THE ARENA
Another Bush Gets It Wrong on Iraq
By MADELEINE K. ALBRIGHT

August 17, 2015
Since leaving office, I have come to a détente with many of my Republican friends, agreeing not to keep rehashing mistakes of the past and to instead focus on the future of America's foreign policy. However, Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush's brazen attempts to rewrite history in a series of campaign appearances last week cannot go unchallenged. By blaming President Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton for the rise of ISIL, Governor Bush is clearly seeking to absolve his brother's administration of responsibility for today's problems in Iraq. This argument may serve Governor Bush's political interests, but it does a disservice to the truth

No honest discussion of the situation today in Iraq can brush aside the mistakes that were made by the Bush administration during the invasion and its aftermath, much of it based on faulty intelligence and flawed assumptions. They sent too few troops to secure the country. They replaced a government that was a sworn enemy of Iran with one that had close ties to the mullahs. They disbanded the Iraqi Army and dismissed thousands of Sunni officers, who soon launched a violent insurgency.
None of these facts were acknowledged by Governor Bush in his speech at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library or in his recent campaign appearances in Iowa, because they undermine his attempts at blame shifting.

According to Bush's emerging narrative, the fatal U.S. error in Iraq was the withdrawal of our troops on December 31, 2011. If that is the case, then the error was made by President George W. Bush, who negotiated that withdrawal date in a binding agreement reached with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in 2008. The Obama administration sought to extend the mission for U.S. troops, and by all accounts Secretary Clinton strongly supported such a residual presence. But Prime Minister Maliki refused to give U.S. troops immunity from prosecution—and the administration wisely decided not to put U.S. troops at risk to support a government that did not want them there any longer.
It is these circumstances that Governor Bush believes led to the rise of ISIL, but once again, he is only telling part of the story. ISIL, which emerged from al Qaeda in Iraq, was established in 2003 in the chaos that followed the invasion. AQI became a magnet for disaffected Sunnis and remnants of Saddam Hussein's army, who still help lead ISIL.

No one, Democrat or Republican, would claim that all is going well in the Middle East today. The Obama administration has certainly made mistakes, and the Bush administration did not do everything wrong. We should also not fall into the trap of assuming everything is America's fault. Sectarian Iraqi leaders, the Assad regime in Syria and malign Iranian influence also bear responsibility for the tremendous problems facing the region.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Still, the United States has been and will be an important force in the Middle East. Our country does not need a backward-looking partisan fight over our policy in the region. Instead, we should be having a substantive, forward-looking discussion about the kind of role we can play in bringing stability to a critical part of the world.

To his credit, Governor Bush did present some ideas for how his administration would deal with Iraq. While his rhetoric has been lofty, and his criticism of President Obama and former Secretary Clinton has been sharp, the policies he proposes look remarkably similar to what the administration is already doing—supporting the Iraqi military in their fight against ISIL. The areas where he appears to differ are his willingness to put more U.S. lives at risk by sending troops into combat, and his unwillingness to rule out waterboarding in interrogations. Governor Bush also spoke of the importance of alliances, but his rhetoric and proposed actions would jeopardize these important sources of strength. Nothing would infuriate our European allies more than Governor Bush's plan to break away from the nuclear agreement with Iran that they spent years negotiating alongside us. Similarly, Governor Bush made a point of using the term "Islamic terrorists," a phrase that our allies in the Arab world have pressed us not to use because it feeds the false narrative that we are at war with a religion.

Words matter in the world of diplomacy, and so does leadership. The reputation of the United States was severely damaged during President' Bush's administration. Today, America's place in the world is far stronger than it was in 2009 thanks to the leadership of President Obama and former Secretary Clinton. They renewed alliances, relentlessly pursued our terrorist enemies, and forged international coalitions on Iran sanctions and on the fight against climate change. That's a laudable record of achievement—one that needs no re-writes.

In the months ahead, I would encourage Mr. Bush to be a true student of foreign policy rather than a hurler of political potshots. The United States cannot afford another President Bush who blinds himself to global reality and who forges ahead into chaos. Americans deserve a president who will acknowledge the past and will forge a better future.

Read more: http://www.politico.com/magazine/story/2015/08/another-bush-gets-it-wrong-on-iraq-121435.html#ixzz3j7jyKZKa

Fariba Yassaee | Vice President
Albright Stonebridge Group LLC

1101 New York Avenue, NW | Suite 900 |Washington, DC 20005

T +1.202.842.7222 | D +1.202.370.3584 | Skype: fariba.yassaee

fyassaee@albrightstonebridge.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Eizenstat, Stuart" <seizenstat@cov.com>
To: "Jacob (Jake) J. Sullivan (Jake.Sullivan@gmail.com)" <Jake.Sullivan@gmail.com>
Date: 7/14/2015 11:24:06 AM
Subject: FW: Roundup: Iran Deal Analysis

Dear Jake,

It appears that Hillary has already spoken. I do hope in a formal statement she will say that as President, NOT just that all options are on the table, which is a hackneyed phrase, but that "As President I will do whatever it takes to assure that Iran never develops a nuclear weapon." There should also be the kind of statement I have suggested of working closely with our allies in the region, especially Israel, to counter Iranian terrorist activity, and to be certain they have the means to fully defend themselves against Iran.

Former Congressman and HFRC Chairman Howard Berman, my partner at Covington, told me that as a result of the 4:00 pm White House telephonic briefing of the Washington Institute group that singed the letter of concern, he believes all five concerns have been taken care of, in one way or another. He said Dennis Ross (my JPPI co-chair) has put out a statement suggesting there is no better option. Howard says he will not join a group of Democrats (e.g. Evan Bayh, Mary Landrieu) opposing the deal.

I am forwarding some comments he has accumulated. He told me in Israel there is wall-to-wall opposition, including Herzog and Livni.

Best wishes,
Stu

From: Berman, Howard
Sent: Tuesday, July 14, 2015 5:52 PM
To: Eizenstat, Stuart
Subject: FW: Roundup: Iran Deal Analysis

Howard L. Berman
Senior Advisor
Covington & Burling LLP
One CityCenter, 850 Tenth Street, NW, Washington, DC 20001
T +1 202 662 5658 | HBerman@cov.com
www.cov.com

COVINGTON

From: David Halperin [mailto:dhalperin@ipforum.org]
Sent: Tuesday, July 14, 2015 12:30 PM
Subject: Roundup: Iran Deal Analysis

Dear Friends:

Israel Policy Forum will soon provide conference calls, Insider Briefs, and in-person briefings with American and Israeli perspectives regarding the Iran nuclear deal announced this morning .

I know your inboxes are already inundated with reactions. In this email, I am providing a Roundup of excerpts of analysis / reactions that you can skim / review as you wish.

While continuing to provide resources, IPF will remain focused on our core mission and the implications for regional security and diplomacy going forward. And, we will continue to call for close US-Israel cooperation , befitting strategic allies.

Clearly, such dialogue is essential to create the kind of assurances that undoubtedly will be needed to advance regional security in the wake of today's announcement.

Best -

David

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

David A. Halperin
Executive Director
Israel Policy Forum (IPF)
140 West 57th Street, Suite 6C
New York, NY 10019
Direct: 212-315-1742
Cell: 516-355-1300

Nicholas Burns, to the NY Times :

> "The reality is that it is a painful agreement to make, but also necessary and wise," said R. Nicholas Burns, who drafted the first sanctions against Iran, passed in the United Nations Security Council in 2006 and 2007, when he was undersecretary of state for policy. "And we might think of it as just the end of the beginning of a long struggle to contain Iran. There will be other dramas ahead."

Jeffrey Goldberg, Atlantic Columnist :

> "The Iran drama is only beginning. Assuming that Obama can sell this deal to Congress—Chuck Schumer, a nation turns its lonely eyes to you—this will be a multi-year story of implementation. I wish I could believe what Obama seems to suspect, that this deal will set in motion a virtuous cycle in which moderates (relative moderates, of course) gain power in a liberalizing Iran. But I don't think that this is happening soon. For now, I hope that Obama will study the reality of Iranian activity in the region, and begin to push back against Iran's ambitions with more alacrity than he has done so far.

White House Talking Points / Graphics and Resources Page (includes video of President Obama's address):

> After many months of principled diplomacy, the P5+1 -- the United States, the United Kingdom, France, China, Russia and Germany -- along with the European Union, have achieved a long-term comprehensive nuclear deal with Iran that will verifiably prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon and ensure that Iran's nuclear program will be exclusively peaceful going forward.
>
> This deal stands on the foundation of the Joint Plan of Action (JPOA), achieved in November of 2013, and the framework for this Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action (JCPOA), announced in Lausanne on April 2, 2015 that set the requirements for the deal with the P5+ 1 and Iran, alongside the European Union announced today.
>
> Now, with this deal in place, the U.S., our allies, and the international community can know that tough, new requirements will keep Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon. Here's how:

AIPAC Statement :

> "During these negotiations, we outlined five critical requirements for a good deal. We are deeply concerned based on initial reports that this proposed agreement may not meet these requirements, and thereby would fail to block Iran's path to a nuclear weapon and would further entrench and empower the leading state sponsor of terror."

Ilan Goldenberg, via Times of Israel :

> As the fight over the Iran deal gets political, Democrats will be less inclined to oppose the president, explained Goldenberg, a former senior staffer on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee covering Middle East issues. "The more the question becomes — 'Do you trust Obama or do you support Netanyahu and the Republicans?' — the less likely the Democrats are to vote against the deal."
>
> Rather than confrontation, the Israeli prime minister should seek to make amends with the administration and start a serious dialogue about what Washington and Jerusalem can do together to counter Iran's aggressive actions in the region and to ensure Tehran does not violate the nuclear agreement, Goldenberg suggested.
>
> "The biggest strategic mistake Netanyahu can make is to walk away for the next 18 months and wait for next president," he said. "I don't think Israel can afford that. If he does that, he's only going to further widen the partisanship and turn Israel into a political wedge issue."
>
> Instead of hoping for Congress to shoot down the deal, Netanyahu should encourage it to pass legislation that would support the agreement's vigorous implementation, Goldenberg continued. The Hill has several tools at its disposal:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

mechanisms to ensure sanctions snap back automatically if Iran violates the deal, more money for international inspectors, the creation of a permanent board with a congressional mandate to oversee the arms control agreement, and so on.

Rep. Steve Israel via website :

"I was skeptical at the beginning of this process, and I remain skeptical of the Iranians. In the fall, there will be a vote on this deal, and my obligation is to review every word, sentence, and paragraph of the deal to ensure it satisfies my continued concerns. Until then, you can continue to count me in the 'skeptical' column.

Ian Bremmer, President, Eurasia Group, via facebook :

The Iran deal is done. It's a historic moment. But as important as it is to defang Iran's nuclear threat, the bigger story is what the deal means for Iran's new standing in a crumbling geopolitical order. Three changes will matter most.

First, the competition between Shia Iran and Sunni Saudi Arabia will heat up, and the balance of power will tip toward Tehran. Saudi Arabia is now pumping the most oil since 1980, but an unsanctioned Iran will cut into Saudi market share. Iran is the holder of the world's fourth-largest proven crude oil reserves and second-largest natural gas reserves, and will soon bring 1 million barrels a day back to the market. Meanwhile, proxy fights in Iraq, Yemen, Syria, and elsewhere will intensify. As the U.S. and Europe look to reduce their presence in the region, the escalation of proxy wars between Saudi Arabia and Iran will heighten the risk of direct conflict.

Next, Iran will open for business. The world will trade again with Iran's $420 billion economy. Trade with the EU could expand as much as 400 percent, from $8.3 billion last year. Economic benefits will spill across the Gulf. Dubai will become a launch pad for foreign investment in Iran. And the investors are coming. Iran is not just another Middle Eastern petro-state; it offers investors a diversified economy with an established capital market. Its population of 80 million, the second largest in the Middle East, promises consumer demand across sectors as varied as travel and logistics to pharmaceuticals and consumer products. By some estimates, the nuclear deal could accelerate growth in Iran to 8 percent over the next three years and motivate the potential return of hundreds of thousands of highly talented Iranians.

Finally, Iran will lead the fight against ISIS. Obama is in no position to put U.S. boots on the ground, but the more battles ISIS wins in the Middle East, the more of a problem it will become internationally. Washington needs someone with the will and resources to deal ISIS a strong blow. And that's Iran. Though economic sanctions and a global arms embargo have limited the sophistication of Iran's military powers (Iran spends a fifth as much as Saudi Arabia on boosting its military assets), the expansion of Iranian influence and economic capabilities will pave the way for greater defense leadership in the Middle East. Iraqi Shia militias, backed by Iran, will offer a desperately-needed counter to ISIS.

Will Iran cheat on the deal? Yes. The U.S. and Iran aren't about to start trusting one other, much less become fast friends. But in the world created by the deal, Iran starts to matter much more than Saudi Arabia and other old-guard U.S. allies.

Today's deal isn't the end of the story. It's only the end of the first chapter.

Ehud Ya'ari, top Arab Affairs Analysts, on Channel 2 news:

"It's not as bad as we thought."

Jane Eisner, editor in chief, Forward :

"The vexing problem for American Jews is that consideration of this deal has become so intertwined with support for Israel that it may be impossible to arrive at an unbiased judgment."

Hillary Clinton, in private meeting with House Democrats

The deal is an "important step in putting a lid on Iran's nuclear program."

MK Isaac Herzog, as reported by the Jerusalem Post:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Herzog will be travelling to the US to "demand a dramatic package of security measures for Israel." ... "In regards to security I am more extreme than Netanyahu."

Tzipi Livni on Iran deal:

"dangerous and destructive"

Benjamin Netanyahu on Iran deal :

"Stunning, historic mistake."

Naftali Bennett, via twitter :

On July 14th, 2015 a terror nuclear superpower is born. Israel will defend itself.

Sen. Joe Lieberman via House Foreign Affairs Committee :

"There is much more risk for America and reward for Iran than there should be in the agreement... This is a bad deal for America, a bad deal for Iran's neighbors in the Middle East and a bad deal for the world."

Dennis Ross via Washington Post :

"Opponents need to explain what happens if the rest of the world accepts this deal, Iran says it is ready to implement it — and Congress blocks it. Will the European Union, which explicitly commits in the agreement to lift sanctions once Iran has fulfilled its main nuclear responsibilities, not do so because Congress says no? Can sanctions really be sustained in these circumstances, particularly if the Iranians don't increase their enrichment and say they will observe the deal? Could we be faced with a world in which the sanctions regime collapses, Iran gets its windfall and is only two months from breakout, and there is little on-ground visibility into its program? Maybe the answer is no, but the skeptics need to explain what we can do to ensure that this is not the outcome."

Aaron David Miller oped- in Wall Street Journal :

"Whether you're about to break open the champagne or don sack cloth over the U.S.-Iran nuclear deal , you may have questions about the agreement. Here are five things to look out for in the coming days, as we all assess the text of the agreement and reactions to it.:"

Abe Foxman, via ADL Statement :

"We are deeply disappointed by the terms of the final deal with Iran announced today which seem to fall far short of the President's objective of preventing Iran from becoming a nuclear weapon state. The thrust of the deal relies substantially on Iran's good faith and the ability of the IAEA to effectively carry out its inspection obligations."

Sen. Chuck Schumer statement :

"Supporting or opposing this agreement is not a decision to be made lightly, and I plan to carefully study the agreement before making an informed decision."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Andres Moreno" <amoreno@progressivemediausa.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 5/16/2008 12:14:03 PM
Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Speech in Louisville, KY

Just off the phone with our tracker Jacob Roberts who was on the ground today in Louisville, KY. Below are the notes from our call.

Louisville, KY - McCain Speech at National Rifle Association Annual Meeting

Big Highlights: McCain asserts he is not Barack Obama. Highlights his long standing support of the second amendment. Attacks assault weapons ban, and proclaims that a President Obama or President Clinton would put gun rights at risk. Continues to remark on Bush's 'appeasement' comments in Israel, and speaks on Iraq war and strict constructionist judges.

Background Details
- McCain was preceded by the playing of a McCain ad highlighting the 2nd amendment and victory in Iraq. – included clip of last year's address where he yelled at anti-war protesters
- Audience Size: approximately 1,000
- The crowd warmed up to him as he spoke about gun rights, and judges
- The audience left by the dozens as he began to speak about the war in Iraq
- McCain came off as nervous and unsettled – stumbled reading off yet another huge teleprompter
- Secret Service Everywhere, Metal Detectors Used
- McCain appeared from off stage, after speech he walked the ropes with Cindy shaking audience hands

Major Speakers Tracked:
John McCain
John Bolton
Mitt Romney
Mitch McConnell

Press:
- Local Press – (Definitely Fox and CBS – others most assuredly there)
- CNN – Dana Bash
- Carl Cameron may have been there

Link to transcript:
http://www.standardnewswire.com/news/239202741.html

Transcript:
It is a pleasure to be here this afternoon. I know you have heard from a number of my friends and colleagues today -- Governors Huckabee and Romney, Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison, Ambassador John Bolton, and Kentucky's own, Senate Republican Leader Mitch McConnell. And you have heard from an American hero, Greg Stubbe, who sacrificed greatly so that Americans might be secure in our freedom. We wish him well in his recovery.

At the outset, let me recognize the life of a great American, Charlton Heston. All Americans remember him as a great actor, and for the memorable roles he played. Many of us also remember him as a man who stood up for the oppressed. He marched for civil rights in the 1960s. And his firm commitment to defending the constitutional rights of Americans -- all Americans and all constitutional rights -- led him to serve as President of the NRA. It was not a popular stand at the time with many of his friends in Hollywood, but his principles mattered more to him than popularity. We will miss Charlton Heston, and we can best honor him by honoring the good he did and the causes he served.

When I first ran for Congress in 1982, I was proud to have the support of gun owners. For more than two decades, I've opposed efforts to ban guns, ban ammunition, ban magazines, and dismiss gun owners as some kind of fringe group unwelcome in "modern" America. The Second Amendment isn't some archaic custom that matters only to rural Americans, who find solace in firearms out of frustration with their economic circumstances. The Second Amendment is unique in the world. It guarantees an individual right to keep and bear arms. To argue anything else is to reject the clear meaning of our Founding Fathers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Self-reliance is the ethic that made America great, and our Founders understood that. They knew there would be circumstances where Americans might need to use firearms to protect themselves and their families. Some Second Amendment detractors think this is a mere abstraction, or a relic of America's distant past. But Americans exercise their Second Amendment rights every day to protect themselves from criminals, as happened in Scottsdale, Arizona where earlier this year, a 74-year-old woman defended her home from a man who repeatedly attempted to break in, extort money and threatened to set fire to her garage. The Second Amendment -- and its guarantee of an individual right to keep and bear arms -- is certainly not an abstraction.

But the clear meaning of the Second Amendment has not stopped those who want to punish firearms owners -- and those who make and sell firearms -- for the actions of criminals. It seems like every time there is a particularly violent crime, the anti-gun activists demand yet another restriction on the Second Amendment. I opposed the ban on so-called "assault weapons," which was first proposed after a California schoolyard shooting. It makes no sense to ban a class of firearms based on cosmetic features. I have opposed waiting periods for gun purchases.

I have opposed efforts to cripple our firearms manufacturers by making them liable for the acts of violent criminals. This was a not-so-cleverly disguised effort by some to use lawsuits to bankrupt gun manufacturers. They sued gun manufacturers to hold them legally responsible for the actions of lawbreakers. Had they prevailed, they would have bankrupted manufacturers, driven the costs of guns and ammunition sky high, and forced government and military customers to buy from foreign sources.

Like your members, I am a committed conservationist. I have long supported multiple uses for public lands that ensure they are available for this and future generations to hunt, fish and explore. Over 12 million hunters in the United States contribute $25 billion to the economy, much of it in rural areas. Hunters pay billions of dollars in federal revenue through license and other fees. Here in Kentucky, hunters spend over $400 million and support thousands of jobs. Senators Obama and Clinton claim they support our hunting heritage, but they voted to allow lawsuits that would force American gunmakers out of business and to ban ammunition commonly used for hunting. Their votes reveal their real views -- far more than their occasional statements of theoretical support for the Second Amendment heard on the campaign trail.

Over the years, I haven't agreed with the NRA on every issue. I have supported efforts to have NICS background checks apply to gun sales at gun shows. I recognize that gun shows are enjoyed by millions of law-abiding Americans. I do not support efforts by those who seek to regulate them out of existence. But I believe an accurate, fair and instant background check at guns shows is a reasonable requirement. I also oppose efforts to require federal regulation of all private sales such as the transfer between a father and son or husband and wife. I supported campaign finance reform because I strongly believed our system of financing campaigns was influencing elected officials to put the interests of "soft money" donors ahead of the public interest. It is neither my purpose nor the purpose of the legislation to prevent gun owners or any other group of citizens from making their voices heard in the legislative process.

Those disagreements do not detract from my long record of support for the Second Amendment and the work we have done together to protect the rights of gun owners from the political attitudes of the moment in Washington that view the Second Amendment as a once quaint custom that must now yield to the judgment of modern enlightened opinion. We have real differences with the Democratic candidates for President. They have learned something since 2000. They don't talk about their plans for gun control. They claim to support hunters and gun owners. But just because they don't talk about gun control doesn't mean they won't support gun control. Let's be clear. If either Senator Clinton or Senator Obama is elected President, the rights of law-abiding gun owners will be at risk. They have both voted as Senators to ban guns or ban ammunition or to allow gun makers to be sued out of existence.

It seems every election, politicians who support restrictions on the Second Amendment dress up in camouflage and pose with guns to demonstrate they care about hunters, even though few gun owners fall for such obvious political theater. After Senator Obama made his unfortunate comment that Pennsylvanians "cling to guns and religion" out of bitterness, Senator Clinton quickly affirmed her support for the Second Amendment. That drew Senator Obama's derision. "She's running around talking about how this is an insult to sportsmen, how she values the Second Amendment," he said. "Like she's on the duck blind every Sunday, packin' a six shooter!" Someone should tell Senator Obama that ducks are usually hunted with shotguns.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senator Obama hopes he can get away with having it both ways. He says he believes that the Second Amendment confers an individual right to bear arms. But when he had a chance to weigh in on the most important Second Amendment case before the U.S. Supreme Court in decades, District of Columbia v. Heller, Senator Obama dodged the question by claiming, "I don't like taking a stand on pending cases." He refused to sign the amicus brief signed by a bipartisan group of 55 Senators arguing that the Supreme Court should overturn the DC gun ban in the Heller case. When he was running for the State Senate in Illinois, his campaign filled out a questionnaire asking whether he supported legislation to ban the manufacture, sale and possession of handguns with simple, "Yes."

The Heller case should be decided soon. But however that case is decided, the federal judiciary will continue to be an important forum for protecting Second Amendment rights. The next President will appoint literally hundreds of federal judges, and is likely to have the opportunity to nominate one or more Supreme Court justices.

In America, the constitutional restraint on power is as fundamental as the exercise of power, and often more so. Yet the Framers knew these restraints would not always be observed. They were idealists, but they were worldly men as well, and they knew that abuses of power and efforts to encroach on individual rights would arise and need to be firmly checked. Their design for democracy was drawn from their experience with tyranny. A suspicion of power is ingrained in both the letter and spirit of the American Constitution.

In the end, of course, their grand solution was to allocate federal power three ways, reserving all other powers and rights to the states and to the people themselves. The executive, legislative, and judicial branches are often wary of one another's excesses, seeking to keep each other within bounds. The framers knew exactly what they were doing, and the system of checks and balances rarely disappoints.

Quite rightly, the proper role of the judiciary has become one of the defining issues of this presidential election. It will fall to the next president to nominate qualified men and women to the federal courts, and the choices we make will reach far into the future. My two prospective opponents and I have very different ideas about the nature and proper exercise of judicial power. We would nominate judges of a different kind, a different caliber, a different understanding of judicial authority and its limits. And the people of America -- voters in both parties whose wishes and convictions are so often disregarded by unelected judges -- are entitled to know what those differences are.

Federal courts are charged with applying the Constitution and laws of our country to each case at hand. But a court is hardly competent to check the abuses of other branches of government if it cannot control its own judicial activism.

Real activists seek to make their case democratically -- to win hearts, minds, and majorities to their cause. Such people throughout our history have often shown great idealism and done great good. By contrast, activist lawyers and activist judges follow a different method. They want to be spared the inconvenience of campaigns, elections, legislative votes, and all of that. Some federal judges operate by fiat, shrugging off generations of legal wisdom and precedent while expecting their own opinions to go unquestioned.

The decisions of our Supreme Court in particular can be as close to permanent as anything government does. And in the presidential selection of those who will write those decisions, a hunch, a hope, and a good first impression are not enough. I will not seek the confidence of the American people in my nominees until my own confidence is complete -- until I am certain of my nominee's ability, wisdom, and demonstrated fidelity to the Constitution.

There are many other differences between my views and Senator Obama's. I favor lower taxes, less government spending, and less federal bureaucracy. Senator Obama has clearly stated his preference for raising the tax burden on Americans, increasing government spending and giving the government more authority over the lives of American families and businesses. We have differences on health care. I prefer to give American families more control over their health care decisions. Senator Obama would prefer the government exercise greater control. Senator Obama would meet unconditionally with some of the world's worst dictators and state sponsors of terrorists. I would not add to the prestige of those who support violent extremists or seek to destroy our allies.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But I would like to close my remarks with an issue that I know is much on the mind of Americans -- the war in Iraq. Senator Obama has said, if elected, he will withdraw Americans from Iraq quickly no matter what the situation on the ground is and no matter what U.S. military commanders advise. But if we withdraw prematurely from Iraq, al Qaeda in Iraq will survive, proclaim victory and continue to provoke sectarian tensions that, while they have been subdued by the success of the surge, still exist, and are ripe for provocation by al Qaeda. Civil war in Iraq could easily descend into genocide, and destabilize the entire region as neighboring powers come to the aid of their favored factions. A reckless and premature withdrawal would be a terrible defeat for our security interests and our values. Iran will view it as a victory, and the biggest state supporter of terrorists, a country with nuclear ambitions and a stated desire to destroy the Sta te of Israel, will see its influence in the Middle East grow significantly.

The consequences of our defeat would threaten us for years, and those who argue for premature withdrawal, as both Senators Obama and Clinton do, are arguing for a course that would eventually draw us into a wider and more difficult war that would entail far greater dangers and sacrifices than we have suffered to date. Thanks to the counterinsurgency instigated by General Petreaus, after four years of terribly costly mistakes, we have a realistic chance to succeed in helping the forces of political reconciliation prevail in Iraq, and the democratically elected Iraqi Government, with a professional and competent Iraqi army, impose its authority throughout the country and defend its borders. We have a realistic chance of denying al Qaeda any sanctuary in Iraq. We have a realistic chance of leaving behind in Iraq a force for stability and peace in the region, and not a cause for a wider and far more dangerous war. I do not argue against withdrawal bec ause I am indifferent to war and the suffering it inflicts on too many American families. I hold my position because I hate war, and I know very well and very personally how grievous its wages are. But I know, too, that we must sometimes pay those wages to avoid paying even higher ones later. I want our soldiers home, too, just as quickly as we can bring them back without risking everything they suffered for, and burdening them with greater sacrifices in the years ahead. That I will not do. I have spent my life in service to my country, and I will never, never, never risk her security for the sake of my own ambitions. I will defend her, and all her freedoms, so help me God. And I ask you to help me in that good cause. Thank you, and God bless you.

--
Andres Moreno
Deputy Director - Tracking/Media Monitoring
Progressive Media USA
202-609-7688 (office)
703-501-6661 (cell)
amoreno@progressivemediausa.org

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	Normapercy@aol.com
To:	john.podesta@gmail.com
Date:	7/31/2015 7:44:22 AM
Subject:	Thank you from 'America in the Obama years': a 4-hour tv history for the BBC,etc

Dear Mr Podesta,

I'm writing - with real apologies for taking so long - to thank you for the great interview you gave us a few weeks ago. You conveyed a marvelous sense of what it was like inside the Oval, the constraints that the President had to deal with, and particularly the careful work that went into 'getting the numbers as ambitious possible'.

Thanks also for taking the trouble to answer in a way that works best in our program. I hope that if you get the chance to watch some of the DVDs of our past series, you will see it has worked in the past - and hopefully it will repay your effort again.

We will keep you posted on our broadcast date in the spring.

Until then, all best wishes to you and to Hillary's campaign.

Best regards,

NormaPercy,
Mick Gold,
Delphine Jaudeau

norma percy series producer
AMERICA IN THE OBAMA YEARS
www.brooklapping.com
View a sample of THE IRAQ WAR http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/world-22694542

Brook Lapping
Portland House
Bressenden Place Londond SW1

+44 207 428 3103
07802 420 083 mobile
when in US 1-301 801 0634

In a message dated 24/04/2015 17:56:16 GMT Daylight Time, john.podesta@gmail.com writes:

Let's see if we can work something out. Eryn handles my schedule.

On Apr 24, 2015 12:43 PM, "Lotte Murphy-Johnson" <lotte@brooklapping.com > wrote:

Brook Lapping

America in the Obama years

a 4-hour television history for the BBC

John Podesta

Founder, Center for American Progress

24 April 2015

Dear Mr Podesta,

I am writing to ask for a filmed interview for our four-hour TV history of US politics in the Obama years. The series will be broadcast early in 2016 on the BBC – and on partner broadcasters in America, Europe, Canada, Australia, Japan and the Middle East.

You probably have forgotten but we met long ago (in the first week of the Center for American Progress). You gave us an off-the-record briefing for our series ELUSIVEPEACE. We still remember a very funny story about President Clinton's bout of food poisoning after a delayed visit to Pakistan – or was it India?

What is unusual about our histories is that the story is told only by the decision-makers and their close advisors. No journalists or pundits tell the audience what to think. (To view some short excerpts, click on this link: Brook Lapping Documentaries .)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The London Times said of our most recent series, THE IRAQ WAR, for the BBC and the National Geographic Channel: "Television is rarely as gripping, informed and important as this."

Other series – such as IRAN AND THE WEST (2009) and PUTIN RUSSIA & THE WEST (2012) – have won top awards on both sides of the Atlantic, including five Peabody Awards, four duPonts, two British Academy Awards and a prime time Emmy. They are used to brief policy-makers and are part of university syllabuses. A note on our method and some reviews are attached.

Those we have interviewed for previous series include Bill Clinton (three times), Jimmy Carter, George H. W. Bush, Walter Mondale, Dick Cheney, Colin Powell, Condoleezza Rice, Madeleine Albright, Bill Burns, Mike McFaul, Jim Jones, as well as Tony Blair, Vladimir Putin, Jacques Chirac and Mikhail Gorbachev. That such people are willing to take part – and do so again, after they have seen the result – we hope speaks for itself.

For AMERICA IN THE OBAMA YEARS we have interviewed or are arranging interviews with (among others): Robert Gates, Valerie Jarrett, Kathleen Sebelius, Cecilia Munoz, Jason Furman, Phil Schiliro, Jack Lew, Samantha Power, William Daley, David Axelrod, Jim Messina, Larry Summers, Ben Rhodes, Peter Orszag, Mona Sutphen, Dick Durbin, Joe Lieberman, Chris Dodd, Bill Burns, Wendy Sherman and Jake Sullivan.

We would like to talk to you about your time with President Obama – especially how you successfully pushed forward the President's climate change agenda through executive action and the historic deal you reached with China, dealing with the ISIS crisis, the immigration executive order and the decision to start normalising US relations with Cuba.

This is a serious history that will reach millions worldwide. Without your participation we can't get it right. We hope you can spare us an hour.

Best wishes,

Norma Percy, Series Producer

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace" <info@centerpeace.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 7/26/2015 8:29:35 PM
Subject: News Update - July 27, 2015

S. DANIEL ABRAHAM
CENTER FOR MIDDLE EAST PEACE

Israel and the Middle East News Update

Monday, July 27

Click here for a printer-friendly version.

Headlines:

- Israel Rejects Kerry's Warning: We Won't Stop Voicing Concerns
- Huckabee says Obama Marching Israelis to 'Door of the Oven'
- Khamenei Tweets Image Showing Obama Committing Suicide
- Assad: Iran Deal is Proof that we Must not Compromise
- Israeli, Palestinian Negotiators hold Low-Key Talks in Amman
- Two-States Caucus Head Hilik Bar to Present Diplomatic Plan
- U.S. Attorney General: We will not Prevent Pollard's Release
- Religious Leaders Gather at President's Home for Unity Summit

Commentary:

- Ha'aretz: "The Elusive Objectives and Risky Results of Netanyahu's War on Obama"
  - By Chemi Shalev
- Wall Street Journal: "The Iran Deal and the 'Problem of Conjecture'"
  - By Niall Ferguson

Ha'aretz

IL Rejects Kerry's Warning: We will Voice Concerns

Senior Israeli officials have rejected U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry's admonition that if Congress fails to approve the nuclear deal reached between world powers and Iran, the international community would place the onus of the failure on Israel. "The U.S. Congress will make its decision according to American interests which will take into consideration its allies," the official said on Sunday, in response to Kerry's criticism. "Attempts to prevent Israel from expressing its position will not stop us from saying what we think about this bad deal with Iran which threatens Israel's security."

See also, "Secretary Kerry addresses Iranian nuclear accord at Council on Foreign Relations" (MSNBC)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jerusalem Post

Huckabee: Obama Marching Israelis to 'the Oven'

The Obama administration's nuclear accord with Iran is comparable to the Holocaust, Republican presidential hopeful Mike Huckabee intimated during an interview over the weekend. Speaking with Breitbart News Saturday, the former Arkansas governor called Barack Obama "feckless" and "naive," adding that by signing the deal the President "will take the Israelis and march them to the door of the oven." "This is the most idiotic thing, this Iran deal. It should be rejected by both Democrats and Republicans in Congress and by the American people. I read the whole deal. We gave away the whole store. It's got to be stopped," he said.

Times of Israel

Khamenei Tweets Obama Committing Suicide

Iran's Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei tweeted an image of what appears to be President Barack Obama shooting himself in the head, even as his country's most senior diplomat condemned the US for aggressive language. The image, which was posted on Khamenei's Twitter account on Saturday, shows a silhouette of a man wearing a pin of an American flag on his suit lapel, holding a gun to his head. The accompanying text is a quote by Khamenei from July 18: "We welcome no war, nor do we initiate any war, but if any war happens, the one who will emerge loser will be the aggressive and criminal US." Iran's President Rouhani on Sunday mocked Kerry for a veiled warning that the US had not ruled out a military strike should Iran be found to violate the agreement.

Ynet News

Assad: Deal is Proof that we Must not Compromise

Syrian President Bashar Assad on Sunday praised Iran for its agreement with world powers and attacked the West for its "hypocritical" approach to the civil war that has ravaged his country for four years. "The nations that are devoted to their rights must win," said the embattled Syrian leader in his first public address in months. "Iran is the best proof for this in terms of its achievements in the nuclear department." Assad described the nuclear agreement as a great victory for Iran. "This is a country that was under siege for three decades and was at war for eight years, and despite this, it is the first in the Islamic world in terms of nuclear production and industry."

Times of Israel

Israeli, Palestinian Negotiators hold Talks in Amman

Interior Minister Silvan Shalom held talks with senior Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat in Amman in recent days, Israeli sources told The Times of Israel on Sunday. The two met in a bid to calm tensions between the two sides, which have spiraled in the past week. Shalom, a senior Likud lawmaker, also serves as the chief Israeli negotiator in peace talks with the Palestinians. He said in a recent speech that Israel and the Palestinians "need to renew negotiations and try to reach understandings and agreements." He also said at the time that he was in favor of "frank talks that are conducted discreetly," apparently such as those in Amman. The official topic and outcome of the recent discussions were unclear, although the meeting was described as a "trust-building" move.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jerusalem Post

Two-States Caucus Head Hilik Bar to Present Diplomatic Plan

The head of the Knesset's caucus for two states for two peoples, Zionist Union MK Hilik Bar, will reveal his new diplomatic framework at the Knesset Monday together with the head of his party, Isaac Herzog. The plan calls for an end of all claims between Israel and Palestinians, as well as a significant part of the moderate Arab world. It would keep Jerusalem united without walls but enable both sides to call it their capital. It would keep the refugee problem outside Israel's borders, and leave most settlers in their homes. "It solves the conflict with a two-state solution while keeping a firm Jewish majority, and it takes the one-state solution off the table," Bar said. "It explains how to learn lessons from past failures, and presents steps that can already be taken now, before and during negotiations to promote a two-state solution."

Ha'aretz

U.S. AG: We will not Prevent Pollard's Release

U.S. Attorney General Loretta Lynch said on Saturday that Israeli spy Jonathan Pollard has served enough time to be released, in accordance with the law under which he was sentenced to life in prison in 1987. Speaking at a security conference in Aspen, Lynch said that the Justice Department "will not interfere in the case" – in other words, will not try to prevent Pollard's release. Lynch denied any link between Pollard's possible release in the near future and the nuclear agreement signed with Iran. "It would have been extremely far-thinking of people 30 years ago to sentence Mr. Pollard and set this mandatory release date to coincide with the Iran deal," she said cynically.

See also, "Obama administration preparing to release Israeli spy Jonathan Pollard" (Ha'aretz)

Ynet News

Religious Leaders Gather with President for Unity

Rabbis and leaders of various Jewish movements – Orthodox, Conservative, and Reform – on Thursday attended an event hosted by President Rivlin at his residence ahead of the Tisha B'Av fast. The participants discussed the destruction of Jerusalem and the unity of Israel, and in the spirit of the times expressed a commitment to a tolerant, fair, and respectful conversation – even regarding controversial issues. "Like family, a society also needs solidarity and brotherhood," President Rivlin told the attendees. "A society without this – as the Talmud teaches us – is destined for destruction. The notion of family is intrinsic to a healthy society."

Ha'aretz - July 26, 2015

The Elusive Objectives and Risky Results of Netanyahu's War on Obama

Did Israeli ministers and American Jewish leaders carry out due diligence before deploying their armies against the Iran agreement?

By Chemi Shalev

Section 40 of Israel's Basic Law: The Government, which deals with Declaration of War, says "the State shall not launch a war other than by authority of a cabinet decision." The official dictionary of the Israel Defense Forces defines "war" as "a situation in which rival sides employ their forces and resources in order to impose their will on each other or in order to prevent such imposition." The definition states that it encompasses unarmed confrontations, such as economic or psychological warfare, as well. Which raises the question: Did the Israeli cabinet authorize the war that Israel has launched in order to impose its will on the Obama administration over the Iran nuclear agreement? Shouldn't it have done so, give that such a war could have implications and ramifications that are no less consequential than those of a "conventional" war?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After all, this could very well be the decisive battle of what may be described as the Six Year War between Benjamin Netanyahu and Barack Obama. Israel is employing its "forces and resources," deploying its emergency reserves of influence and goodwill, recruiting its nuclear experts and PR mavens, calling up its crack divisions of the pro-Israel lobby. And its order of battle includes the Republican Party, a politically powerful and zealously steadfast ally.

But it is facing the full force of a disciplined administration, led by a president committed to repel any attack on an Iran policy that is supported by most of his party and a solid if skeptical majority of the American public. And given the importance of the Iran nuclear deal to his current foreign policy and future legacy, for Barack Obama this is a fight to the finish, a politically existential battle in which failure is not an option.

The question of whether the nuclear agreement concluded in Vienna two weeks ago is as horrid as Israel claims or as terrific as the administration maintains is irrelevant: This is the agreement, and contrary to what anyone may tell you, there is no other. The fight is over whether the deal will live or die, and its possible outcomes are like a choice between the plague and cholera: between the disaster portrayed by Israel if the deal goes through to the catastrophe predicted by the administration if it doesn't.

It should go without saying that Israel cannot afford to embark on a campaign to kill the deal only to flex its muscles or to prove a point or for ulterior motives or out of the inertia of a gambler who bets his house after losing his money. The only possible justification for such a potentially costly confrontation with its most powerful ally can come after careful consideration that yields an honest assessment that victory is possible, that its gains will be worth the casualties and damage that will certainly be incurred, and that such a victory won't be worse than either inaction or defeat.

If the Israeli leadership hasn't carried out such due diligence, it has been derelict in its duty and could one day be rightfully investigated for the omission. The same is true of AIPAC and other Jewish organizations, including local Federations, who have defiantly come out against the deal with Tehran. It is their full and democratic right to do so, of course, but only after careful and considered debate about the pros and cons of such a campaign, not as a result of peer pressure or donor influences or other extraneous factors.

The stakes couldn't be higher. Administration spokespersons, from Obama through Kerry to the last of the anonymous briefers have painted a grim picture of the fallout from a Congressional veto: America will be isolated, its allies enraged, the sanctions regime collapsed and Iran triumphant; a military attack will loom larger than ever before. Israel and its supporters have refrained from portraying a plausible alternative scenario, other than full reversal, stronger sanctions and a miraculous "better deal." No one has actually dared to claim that after the president is dealt such a devastating political blow, America might be stronger, Russia and China more compliant, the Middle East safer and Tehran humbled and eager to renegotiate from square one. Even the deal's most ardent critics realize that this is pure fantasy.

From statements made in recent days by Obama, Kerry and others it is also clear that Israel and its "lobbyists" will be held jointly responsible with the GOP for the mayhem that may follow a Congressional veto. Even if Israeli spokesmen describe Kerry's warnings that Israel will be isolated like never before as "threats," their inconvenient truth cannot be ignored. Only in La La Land can anyone seriously assume that after torpedoing an agreement supported by the overwhelming majority of the world, Israel and the Republicans will be hailed as conquering heroes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A decade ago, the American Jewish community had to mount a concerted campaign to counter the claims made by widely respected political scientists Stephen Walt and John Mearsheimer about the Israel Lobby and its supposedly pivotal role in pushing America to war in Iraq. And that was with a gung-ho administration that needed no encouragement to take on Saddam Hussein, and with an experienced Israeli prime minister like Ariel Sharon who maintained an extremely low profile during the months leading up to the 2003 war.

In 2015, however, the administration is promoting a diplomatic agreement, not seeking an excuse to go to war. And far from lobbying discreetly on the sidelines, the Israeli prime minister is flaunting his opposition to the proposed deal, brazenly infiltrating the administration's hinterland in Congress, openly exhorting his troops, Henry V style, to go "once more unto the breach" to topple Obama's dangerous peacemaking.

When things turn ugly, and Israel and the Jews stand accused for both plausible and anti-Semitic reasons, there will be no easy deniability this time around. And the Jewish community will be otherwise engaged anyway, torn between most of its leadership, which follows Netanyahu, and most of its masses, who remain loyal to Obama.

There have been harsh confrontations between Israel and U.S. administrations in the past: None have seemed quite so harsh, bitter and potentially damaging, directly and collaterally. Benjamin Franklin is quoted as saying that the price of war is not paid while it is being waged – the invoice is presented only when it is over. In a campaign with unclear motives, undefined objectives and dubious gains even in victory, the price is bound to be high and the bill both painful and inevitably shocking.

Wall Street Journal – July 26, 2015

The Iran Deal and the 'Problem of Conjecture'

Obama is hoping that the nuclear pact will lead to equilibrium in the Middle East. All the evidence points the other way.

By Niall Ferguson

In making the case for his nuclear-arms-control deal with the Islamic Republic of Iran, President Obama has confronted Congress with a stark choice. "There really are only two alternatives here," he declared at last week's press conference. "Either the issue of Iran obtaining a nuclear weapon is resolved diplomatically through a negotiation or it's resolved through force, through war."

This binary argument is so central to his administration's case that the president provided a second formulation: Without the deal, he said, "we risk even more war in the Middle East, and other countries in the region would feel compelled to pursue their own nuclear programs, threatening a nuclear arms race in the most volatile region in the world."

The president insists that the Iran deal is tightly focused on "making sure" that the Iranians "don't have a bomb." It is not, he says, "contingent on Iran changing its behavior" in any other respect—notably the funding of proxy armies and terrorist organizations throughout the Middle East. "The incremental additional money that they've got to try to destabilize the region," according to Mr. Obama, is not “more important than preventing Iran from getting a nuclear weapon.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Listening to all this, I am reminded of what Henry Kissinger once called the “problem of conjecture.” Writing in 1963, before anyone had devised a way to slow down a Soviet nuclear-arms program vastly bigger than any Iran will ever have, Mr. Kissinger summed up the dilemma that faces any strategic decision maker: “the choice between making the assessment which requires the least effort or making an assessment which requires more effort.” The problem of conjecture is that if a statesman “acts on the basis of a guess, he will never be able to prove that his effort was necessary, but he may save himself a great deal of grief later on. . . . If he waits, he may be lucky or he may be unlucky.”

The key point of the problem of conjecture is that the payoffs are asymmetrical. A successful pre-emptive action is never rewarded in proportion to its benefits because “posterity forgets how easily things might have been otherwise.” Indeed, the statesman who acts pre-emptively is more likely to be condemned for the upfront costs of pre-emption than to be praised for its benefits in the form of averted calamities. By contrast, playing for time is not absolutely certain to lead to disaster. Something may turn up.

To illustrate his point, Mr. Kissinger cited the classic example of the policy of appeasement, which was designed to slow down, not to halt or reverse, the rearmament and expansion of Nazi Germany. If the democracies had moved earlier to contain Germany, Mr. Kissinger argued, “we wouldn’t know today whether Hitler was a misunderstood nationalist, whether he had only limited objectives, or whether he was in fact a maniac. The democracies learned that he was in fact a maniac. They had certainty but they had to pay for that with a few million lives.”

The analogy with 1930s Europe is as overused as it is rarely applicable. But in one respect it is relevant here. Like President Obama today, Britain’s Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain was playing for time in 1938, reasoning that a conflict at that point would be worse than a conflict in the future. The conjecture, then as now, was that buying time would improve the relative strategic position.

Whatever Mr. Obama may say, the point of this nuclear deal isn’t just to postpone the Iranian acquisition of nuclear weapons by 10 years. For it to be more than a mere deferral, it also must improve the relative strategic position of the U.S. and its allies so that by 2025 they will be in a stronger position to stop Iran from entering the club of nuclear-armed powers. How might the U.S. achieve this?

As the president put it, his “hope is that building on this deal, we can continue to have conversations with Iran that incentivize them to behave differently in the region, to be less aggressive, less hostile, more cooperative . . . in resolving issues like Syria or what’s happening in Iraq, to stop encouraging Houthis in Yemen.” His goal by the time he “turn[s] over the keys to . . . the next president, is that we are on track to defeat ISIL . . . that we have jumpstarted a process to resolve the civil war in Syria, [and] that in Iraq . . . we’ve also created an environment in which Sunni, Shia and Kurd are starting to operate and function more effectively together.”

This echoes Mr. Obama’s illuminating account of his strategy for the Middle East to the New Yorker magazine in January 2014. “It would be profoundly in the interest of citizens throughout the [Middle East] if Sunnis and Shias weren’t intent on killing each other,” he mused. And “if we were able to get Iran to operate in a responsible fashion—not funding terrorist organizations, not trying to stir up sectarian discontent in other countries, and not developing a nuclear weapon—you could see an equilibrium developing between Sunni, or predominantly Sunni, Gulf states and Iran.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In short, for all the high-flown rhetoric of the president's speeches, his goal is the classic realist objective of a balance of power in the region. The technicalities of the Iran deal—the number of centrifuges, the size of the enriched-uranium stockpile, the rigor of the inspections regime—need not detain us here. The key question is whether or not slowing down Iran's nuclear program will increase regional stability. Critics of the deal should acknowledge that it might, for in the realm of conjecture there are no certainties. But the president and his advisers should admit that the probability is very, very low.

"The really important question," Mr. Obama told the Atlantic magazine in May, is "how do we find effective partners—not just in Iraq, but in Syria, and in Yemen, and in Libya—that we can work with, and how do we create the international coalition and atmosphere in which people across sectarian lines are willing to compromise and are willing to work together in order to provide the next generation a fighting chance for a better future?" The answer: Not this way.

Why should Iran suddenly mend its ways? In return for merely slowing down its pursuit of nuclear weapons, it is being handed up to $150 billion in previously frozen assets, a commercial bonanza as sanctions are lifted, and the prospect of an end to conventional arms and ballistic-missile embargoes after, respectively, five and eight years. All Iran has to do is keep the International Atomic Energy Agency happy that it is sticking to its nuclear commitments. There will be no "snap back" of sanctions if Tehran opts to use its new resources to double or quadruple its support for Hezbollah and Hamas, the Assad regime in Syria, and the Houthi rebellion in Yemen.

Now ask yourself: How are Iran's rivals likely to respond to this timeline of Iranian rearmament: increased support for proxies this year, upgraded conventional weapons in 2020, ballistic missiles in 2023, and nukes in 2025? The president's conjecture is that by buying time he also gets closer to a regional balance. The alternative and much more likely scenario is that he gets an arms race and escalating conflict.

Historical analogies must be used with care. Last week the president boldly likened his deal with Iran to Richard Nixon's opening to China and Ronald Reagan's strategic-arms-reduction treaty with the Soviet Union. These analogies are misleading. Mao Zedong and Mikhail Gorbachev did their deals with the U.S. from positions of weakness. In the early 1970s, the Chinese Communists were threatened externally by the Soviets and internally by their own crazy Cultural Revolution. In the 1980s the Soviets were losing the Cold War not only economically but ideologically. By contrast, though under intense economic pressure because of the U.S.-led sanctions campaign, the Iran regime has been gaining strategically since the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003 and domestically since the crushing of the Green Revolution in 2009.

In the Cold War, communism posed a twofold challenge: the Leninist and the Maoist. The U.S. had some success containing the Soviet version in Europe and the Middle East, but struggled to contain the Maoist version in Korea, risked Armageddon to keep Soviet missiles out of Cuba, and failed miserably to save South Vietnam. The Kissingerian solution was to be closer to the two Communist powers than they were to each other.

The U.S. used a mix of détente and containment on the Soviets, and engagement with the Chinese. But Washington also built very strong alliances in Europe and Asia. And the U.S. overtly resisted the ideological challenge posed by both brands of Marxism.

What, by contrast, is the strategy today? Faced with two forms of Islamic extremism, Shiite and Sunni, we are tilting toward Iran, the principal sponsor of the former. We are alienating our allies, moderate Sunnis as well as Israelis. In doing so, I fear, we are stoking the flames of sectarian conflict at all levels, from the local to the national to the regional. And all the while President Obama repeats the hollow mantra that "Islam is a religion of peace."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To repeat: No one can say for sure what will come of the president's strategy. It may magically produce equilibrium in the Middle East, as he hopes. But all the evidence points the other way: toward a continuing escalation of violence in the region, and indeed throughout the Islamic world.According to the International Institute of Strategic Studies' Armed Conflict Database, total fatalities due to armed conflict increased world-wide by a factor of roughly four between 2010 and 2014. The Middle East and North Africa accounted for more than 70% of the increase.

According to the statistics on terrorism gathered by the National Consortium for the Study of Terrorism and Responses to Terrorism, the number of terrorist incidents world-wide quadrupled between 2006 and 2013, while the number of fatalities rose by 130%. In that period, the percentage of fatalities attributable to Muslim groups rose to 92% from 75%.

President Obama's conjecture is that his nuclear-arms deal with Iran will somehow break these trends. My conjecture is that the effect will be exactly the opposite. Even before he hands over the White House keys to his successor, we shall see that there was no simple, binary choice between peace and war. We bought time. We postponed Iran's nuclear breakout. But we also stoked the flames of a conflict that doesn't need nukes to get a lot more lethal than it already is.

S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace
633 Pennsylvania Ave. NW, 5th Floor, Washington, DC 20004
www.centerpeace.org

2015 S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace, All rights reserved.
YOU ARE RECEIVING THIS EMAIL BECAUSE YOU SIGNED UP FOR OUR NEWS UPDATES.

unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Milia Fisher" <milia.fisher@gmail.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 10/8/2015 11:52:56 AM
Subject: NOT time sensitive: Revised US - China Draft from Rudy

John-

Revised draft on the recent White House summit between President Obama and President Xi below from Rudy deLeon.

Rudy wanted you to be aware that they have an updated draft ready for review but it's totally up to you how quickly you want to process this-- it can easily wait until next week when you're back in to the office.

Rudy will continue to let the China side know that we are working on this, but he has not committed to a specific timeline for completion.

_____

Milia,

Would you share with John this revised draft on the recent White House summit between President Obama and President Xi. The original draft from the China side was almost 8 pages long, and reflected positions that do not reflect current opportunities and challenges in US-China relations. Our current draft is less than 3 pages.

After John and you offer comments, we will forward to our counterparts.

Rudy.

Revised

September 2015 White House Summit: Opportunities

And Challenges as US-China leaders meet

By John Podesta, Tung Chee Hwa,

Wang Jisi, and Rudy deLeon

October 2015

This past month -- September 2015 -- has seen another important exchange in US – China relations as

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

President Barack Obama and President Xi Jinping completed their summit meeting at the White House in Washington. Building on earlier high level exchanges, the two leaders announced further progress on climate change, established a new high level dialogue on cybercrime, a set of principles for information technologies including protections of intellectual property in the electronic domain, and conducted discussions on national security issues offering the different perspectives of each country with an effort to improve communication.

Earlier in the month, there were ceremonies commemorating the seventieth anniversary of the end of World War II. Both America and Chinese were reminded of the common sacrifice and service in those times by renewing stories of the American Flying Tigers in the CBI, recognizing the Chinese people who gave shelter to the Jewish refugees of Europe and protected them in the Shanghai Ghetto, and remembering the common commitment of the allies, their veterans and the citizens who sacrificed so much.

Seventy years later, many of those same allies were recently joined by a peaceful Germany in negotiations to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons to Iran, a display of diplomatic agreement that now must be enforced with resolution and vigor. For China, its constructive participation in the P5 + 1 talks was further evidence of its growing experience and recognition of its important role in global diplomacy.

President Obama and President Xi, even as they deal with domestic and economic concerns, make the effort to demonstrate that these two leaders can work together to join the other nations of the Asia-Pacific region in charting policies that will build upon the current dynamic during the next seventy years in the Asia-Pacific region that blossomed in the post war period.

The American President, in his remarks at the White House noted, “the United States welcomes the rise of a China that is stable, prosperous and peaceful -- because that benefits us all. Our work together -- to increase our trade, boost the global economy, fight climate change and prevent Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon -- shows that when the United States and China work together, it makes our nations and the world more prosperous and more secure. Even as our nations cooperate, I believe -- and I know you agree -- that we must address our differences candidly. The United States will always speak out on behalf of fundamental truths. We believe that nations are more successful and the world makes more progress when our companies compete on a level playing field, when disputes are resolved peacefully, and when the universal human rights of all people are upheld.”

In the joint press conference in the Rose Garden, President Xi noted that “with 36 years of development, the interests of China and the United States are deeply interconnected, and we have greater responsibilities for world peace and human progress. There are broad areas that the two sides should and can work together. The Chinese side stands ready to work with the United States to uphold a spirit of perseverance, and advance bilateral relations to seek further progress to the better benefits of the Chinese and American people and the people in the world.”

In September 2013, the Center for American Progress and the China-U.S. Exchange Foundation convened a distinguished group of American and Chinese experts for a high-level track II dialogue in Beijing to discuss and explain the momentum of China-U.S. relations. In a Washington program that followed the two sides presented their recommendation on how the US and China can construct in the 21st Century a security and economic model that will be unique and constructive.

Despite the constructive developments and expectations mentioned, pessimistic observations of U.S.-China relations seem to be on the rise among policy analysts, opinion leaders, and the media in both countries. In several instances there are valid reasons why tensions exist. With regular dialogue now in place on economic and national security questions, the top leaders on both sides will need to steady the political questions that exist between the two countries.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As veteran participants in U.S.-China relations we remain hopeful that the common interests between our two peoples are strong enough to move us forward rather than backward, and that the leaderships of our two nations have enough wisdom to avoid the human errors that precipitated earlier powers into mistakes and miscalculations.

To be sure, there are opportunities and challenges in the US-China relationship. But the bilateral ties have weathered many ups and downs since Mao Zedong and Richard Nixon shook hands in 1972 and broke the barrier between our two great nations. There is reason to believe that with such a degree of mutual understanding, shared stakes, and extensive communication, and with the personal connections and friendship accumulated over the past 43 years, the cooperative relationship will continue to move forward.

In his recent book “On China,” Dr. Henry Kissinger notes that the relationship between China and the U.S. should not be a zero-sum game but be defined as “co-evolution. . . It means that both countries pursue their domestic imperatives, cooperating where possible, and adjust their relations to minimize conflict.”

We believe that the two countries have unique domestic needs, even as both are faced with daunting tasks at home, including foundations that will maintain economic strength, opportunity for the middle class, strengthening the social safety net, generate environmental improvement, developing clean energy, balancing budget priorities, and providing security. In most of these issue areas, there are increasing opportunities for the two countries to further their cooperation that reflects the “benefits” and “responsibilities” that the two Presidents discussed at the September Summit in Washington.

--
Milia Fisher
(858) 395-1741

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Clinton Foundation Press Office" <press@clintonfoundation.org>
To:	"Clinton Foundation Press Office" <press@clintonfoundation.org>
Date:	2/5/2016 3:34:06 PM
Subject:	Clinton Foundation News & Guidance

Hi all – We wanted to give you some updates on recent events, Foundation work, and announcements in the news.

Clinton Foundation launches digital 2015 Annual Report
Today we released our Annual Report for 2015 . This report shows the impact that our programs have had in the last year through stories of those around the world who are benefitting from our work. It also shows the progress that these programs have made over the past year, reaching more people. For example:

> The Clinton Development Initiative has reached more farmers, in total helping improve the incomes and livelihoods of 105,000 farmers as of 2015, up from 85,000 the year before;
>
> The Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership has expanded its reach to impact the lives of 450,000 through market opportunities created by social enterprises in Latin America, the Caribbean, and South Asia;
>
> The Alliance for a Healthier Generation has broadened its work to more than 31,000 schools in 50 states providing students with healthier foods and more physical activity in an effort to decrease childhood obesity.

Read the Annual Report at 2015.clintonfoundation.org

Share the Report and watch the "Year in Review" on FACEBOOK: https://www.facebook.com/ClintonFoundation/videos/vb.389051904549590/922265787894863/?type=2&theater
Share the Report and watch the "Year in Review" on TWITTER: https://twitter.com/ClintonFdn/status/695733980461555713

CGI Winter Meetings Kicks off 2016 Year of Commitment-Making
This week CGI kicked off the 2016 year of commitment-making at the Winter Meeting, where President Clinton announced the "Partnering for Global Prosperity" theme, and members and participants came together to discuss key issues such as refugees, urban transformation, youth development, and the environment. The program kicked off with a one-on-one conversation between President Clinton and Hamdi Ulukaya, Founder and CEO of Chobani and Founder of Tent Foundation.

Watch the webcast of the conversation: http://livestream.com/CGI/events/4777387

Share the webcast on TWITTER: https://twitter.com/Livestream/status/695298216061976576
Share the webcast on FACEBOOK: https://www.facebook.com/ClintonFoundation/posts/921581857963256

Clinton Foundation's Health Work and President Clinton's Post-Presidency
Forbes highlighted President Clinton's work tackling some of the biggest health issues facing the United States today. The story discusses the 2016 Health Matters Summit and CHMI's work to combat prescription drug abuse, mental health problems and health disparities.

> "However, like when Bill Gates began dedicating efforts to his Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, former U.S. President Clinton has embarked on an Part II of his life that in many ways is as important as Part I in impacting the health of millions."
>
> "The Health Matters Summit was just one of wide range of efforts that have been spearheaded by the Clinton Foundation, whose president is former U.S. Secretary of Health and Human Services Donna Shalala."

Share the article on TWITTER: https://twitter.com/ClintonFdn/status/694158472515096582
Share the article on FACEBOOK: https://www.facebook.com/ClintonFoundation/posts/919709944817114

PA High Schools to Supply Free Narcan through CHMI and Adept Partnership
In continuing coverage of Adapt Pharma and CHMI's collaboration to offer a free carton of Narcan, a nasal spray that quickly reverses heroin overdose, to all high schools in the U.S., the Philadelphia Inquirer , Lancaster Online , NBC 10 , and NJ.com wrote about how Pennsylvania will be the first state to supply the live-saving antidote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

NBC 10 wrote, "The state is the first to supply Narcan, which reverses a heroin overdose, free to all public high schools. Each school will get one carton of Narcan nasal spray.

'I am thrilled to announce my administration's next step in the fight against the opioid epidemic,' said Gov. Tom Wolf. 'By equipping trained professionals in schools with this drug, we are providing another way to save Pennsylvanian lives. It is our responsibility to give these struggling individuals another chance at life.'

Besides the antidote, schools will also have access to new educational materials and training. Adapt Pharma and the Clinton Foundation offered the drug-overdose antidote."

How the Development Sector Can Use Virtual Reality

Devex posted a piece about the development sector's growing use of virtual reality media. The piece highlights CGI's virtual reality film, "Inside Impact," including a video interview with the producer of the film.

"I pulled the headphones over my ears, fastened the headset to my face, and waited for the start of a virtual reality film titled "Inside Impact: East Africa." I was transported from the Social Innovation Summit in Silicon Valley, California, to Tanzania, where I sat in a room with Bill Clinton and a Solar Sister entrepreneur. While I did not want to leave this world, where I was just steps from the former president in a quiet living room with kids watching from the corner and birds chirping outside, another part of me wanted to reach out and say something to Robert Holzer, the executive producer of the film who stood right beside me."

Share the article on TWITTER: https://twitter.com/ClintonFdn/status/694595817206865920
Share the article on FACEBOOK: https://www.facebook.com/ClintonFoundation/posts/920456964742412

CGI Commitment Mobilizes African-American Faith Leaders to Fight HIV Epidemic

To commemorate National Black HIV/AIDS Awareness Day (Feb. 7), theGrio published this op-ed from Pastor John Faison Sr. about the CGI commitment made by the NAACP and Gilead Sciences to significantly scale up their initiative, The Black Church and HIV: The Social Justice Imperative. Through their commitment, they are enlisting faith leaders as change agents to address the disproportionately severe impact of HIV on African-Americans.

"I know all too well that "faith without works is dead." Which is why I was encouraged when in 2013 the NAACP and Gilead walked the walk by making a "Commitment to Action" through the Clinton Global Initiative to significantly scale up The Black Church & HIV initiative.

By 2018, we aim to conduct 45 faith leader trainings in the 30 cities most impacted by HIV, secure proactive resolutions from seven of nine historically black mainline denominations, and integrate HIV as a social justice issue into required curricula in five predominantly African-American theological seminaries.

We've made progress on our CGI commitment—500 more faith leaders are rallying their congregations to fight this epidemic because of our effort. But we need hundreds more to help lead us to a new Promised Land where, instead of milk and honey, good health and true justice await us."

Newest Class of Presidential Leadership Scholars Announced

On Tuesday, we announced the newest class of Presidential Leadership Scholars. The Presidential Leadership Scholars program is a leadership development initiative that draws upon the resources of the presidential centers of Lyndon B. Johnson, George H.W. Bush, William J. Clinton, and George W. Bush. The Arkansas Democrat-Gazette wrote about the program and the scholars selected for the 2016 class, including two Arkansans.

"Two Arkansans were among 61 people chosen to be Presidential Leadership Scholars this year, according to the Clinton Foundation.
Over the next six months, they'll learn about leadership challenges faced by four former presidents -- Lyndon Johnson, Bill Clinton, George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush -- and will visit those presidents' libraries."

"'This is a really intense leadership program that's been thoughtfully designed,' said [Presidential Leadership Scholar John Forrest] Ales. 'It's just an incredible thing to be a part of.'"

Share the announcement on TWITTER: https://twitter.com/ClintonFdn/status/694572337883172864

In Case You Missed It:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Blue Star Families announced a new partnership with CHMI to support spousal employment for military families by offering workforce development training and career building opportunities to military spouses. Read a piece in the Military Times about the partnership.

Before the Health Matters Summit officially kicked off, the Clinton Foundation hosted a Day of Action at La Quinta High School, where more than 75 students, teachers, and parents came together to cultivate a community garden and prepare and donate 150 healthy meals. Read a piece authored by a local student volunteer on the importance of health and giving back, and read another piece here about the day and its impact.

In a special one-on-one conversation with Clinton Foundation President Donna Shalala, World Cup and Olympic champion Abby Wambach discussed the participation of women and sports. Read a Desert Sun story and listen to Abby share thoughts about the topic.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	6/20/2015 3:22:34 AM
Subject:	H4A News Clips 6.20.15
Attachments:	6.20.15 H4A News Clips.docx

H4A News Clips

June 20, 2015

TODAY'S KEY STORIES..... 5

Hillary Clinton Says No to Granting 'Fast Track' Authority on Trade Deal // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 19, 2015 5

Hillary Clinton and Bernie Sanders dominate on Facebook // Politico // Hadas Gold – June 19, 2015..... 7

Inside Hillary Clinton's Grassroots Campaign // TIME // Sam Frizell – June 19, 2015 7

SOCIAL MEDIA..... 10

Martin O'Malley (6/19/15, 3:22 PM) – It's time we recognize this is a national crisis. It's time we say what we're all thinking: that this is not the America we want to be living in..... 10

Olivia Nuzzi (6/19/15, 12:34 PM) – Candidates to acknowledge racism behind #CharlestonShooting: Ben Carson, Bernie Sanders, Lindsey Graham, Martin O'Malley..... 10

ABC News (6/19/15, 4:54 PM) – White House: Pres. Obama "has said before that he believes the Confederate flag belongs in museums" -@ABCPolitics..... 10

Mike Allen (6/19/15, 8:21 AM) – Charleston, S.C. (AP) – South Caroline governor tell NBC Charleston church shooter should get the death penalty 10

Sam Stein (6/19/15, 10:31 AM) – Per source, Side Blumenthal faced 3x as many qs on Clinton foundation and Brock empire than Benghazi w/ @srlevine2..... 10

Sarah Kliff (6/19/15, 12:04 PM) – No matter how you score it, CBO says Obamacare repeal increases the deficit. http://1.usa.gov/1LnEATF 10

Nick Minock (6/19/15, 2:13 PM) – May or Riley, who usually doesn't side with the death penalty, said he's open to it in this case #cbsnews #Charleston..... 10

Matt Katz (6/19/15, 7:42 PM) – At Christie Family meeting 2 weeks ago, his wife & kids gave him the green light to run for prez, @GovChristie tells Fox News..... 10

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 10

Changing Views on a Female President // NYT // Lynn Vavreck – June 19, 2015 10

Hillary Clinton's Hampton's Quandry // NYT // Amy Chozick – June 19, 2015 12

Log On and Hit 'Like'...Facebook Measures the Candidates // NYT // Alan Rappeport – June 19, 2015 . 17

Hillary Clinton confidante is confident that release of full Benghazi deposition would absolve him // WaPo // Colby Itkowitz – June 19, 2015..... 17

Hillary Clinton's trade fiasco // Politico // Ben White – June 19, 2015 18

Hillary Clinton fundraising off Treasury putting woman on $10 bill // Politico // Nick Cass – June 19, 2015 19

Judge reopens FOIA case on Hillary Clinton aide Abedin // Politico // Josh Gerstein – June 19, 2015... 19

Hillary Clinton: Donald Trump's racial rhetoric 'not acceptable' // Politico // Adam B. Lerner – June 19, 2015 20

Clinton criticizes predatory lenders during veterans forum // AP // Michelle Rindels – June 18, 2015.. 22

Hillary Clinton Is Trouncing Everyone in the Facebook Primary // Bloomberg // Andrew Feather – June 19, 2015 22

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton Wants Woman on $10 Bill But Won't Say Which One // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein – June 19, 2015 23

Lawyer for Clinton Confidant Wants Congress to Release Testimony // Bloomberg // Billy House – June 19, 2015 24

Clinton: Stop For-Profit Colleges From Targeting Veterans // TIME // Sam Frizell – June 18, 2015 25

Hillary Clinton sees a different California than her husband once did // LA Times // Kurtis Lee – June 19, 2015 26

Hillary Clinton hitting three $2,700-per-person Westside fundraisers today // LA Daily News // June 19, 2015 27

Ex-charity exec who helped expose $5 00G Clinton Foundation donation faces legal threats // Fox News // Adam Shaw – June 19, 2015..... 28

Hillary Clinton Doesn't Need the Media...Yet // National Journal // S.V. Date – June 19, 2015..... 30

The Great 2016 Foreign Policy Gamble // National Journal // Josh Kraushaar – June 18, 2015..... 32

EMILY's List Already Raising Big Bucks for Hillary Clinton // HuffPo // Paul Blumenthal – June 19, 2015 34

Hillary Clinton's Wall Street Address // HuffPo // Bill Moyers and Michael Winship – June 19, 2015.... 35

Sidney Blumenthal's Benghazi Testimony Focuses More on Domestic Politics Than The Attack // HuffPo // Sam Levine and Sam Stein – June 18, 2015 38

Voters Generally Support Clinton Voting Push // Public Policy Polling // - June 20, 2015..... 40

Hillary Clinton: Donald Trump's speech drives Charleston-like violence // Breitbart // Ben Shapiro – June 19, 2015 41

Hillary Clinton alludes to Donald Trump's racist rhetoric as fuel for hateful acts like the Charleston shooting // NY Daily News // Cameron Joseph – June 19, 2015 42

How Hillary Clinton will raise gobs of cash from Wall Street while trashing the industry in public // Business Insider // Linette Lopez – June 19, 2015..... 43

How Hillary Clinton thanked a pizza place that's been feeding her campaign // Business Insider // Hunter Walker – June 19, 2015..... 44

Hillary Clinton Talks First Term To H'wood Donors At Tobey Maguire's House // Deadline // Dominic Patten – June 20, 2015..... 45

Hillary Clinton Woos Young Holly wood Democrats at Fundraisers in L.A. // Hollywood Reporter // Tina Daunt – June 19, 2015..... 46

Harassment Complaints Tripled at State Department Under Clinton, Kerry // Free Beacon // Joe Schoffstall – June 19, 2015..... 46

Clinton to Fundraise at L.A. House of Tax Evading Clinton Foundation Donor // Free Beacon // Brent Scher – June 19, 2015..... 47

Hillary Clinton's 24-hour fundraising jaunt in Hollywood expected to net $1 million // Washington Times // Jennifer Harper – June 19, 2015..... 48

Hillary Clinton stressing support for immigration reform // AZ Central // Dan Nowicki – June 19, 2015 49

Where Does Clinton Foundation Money Go? // FactCheck.Org // Robert Farley – June 19, 2015..... 53

A note from Jorge Ramos // Fusion // Jorge Ramos – June 19, 2015..... 57

Judicial Watch Statement in Reponse to Federal Court Reopening Lawsuit Seeking Information on Top Clinton Aide Huma Abedin // Digital Journal // June 19, 2015 58

I'm A Republican Woman & I'm Voting For Hillary // Refinery 29 // Asma Hasan – June 19, 2015 59

These Women Probably Don't Fit the Bill: Fans Suggest Hillary, Bey oncé and Taylor for #TheNew10 // People // Tierney Mcafee – June 19, 2015..... 61

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 61

DECLARED..... 61

O'MALLEY..... 61

An Angry O'Malley Calls for an Assault Weapons Ban // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 19, 2015..... 61

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley's Two-Word Response to Charleston Shooting: 'I'm Pissed' // Bloomberg // Sydney McNeal – June 19, 2015 63

O'Malley: 'I'm pissed' about gun climate // CNN // Theodore Schleifer – June 19, 2015..... 64

Martin O'Malley is 'Pissed About Gun Control // TIME // Sam Frizell – June 19, 2015 65

O'Malley says he won't be deterred from criticizing Clinton // Baltimore Sun // Michael Dresser – June 19, 2015 65

Martin O'Malley Launches Major Post-Charleston Gun Control Push With "I'm Pissed" // Buzzfeed // Evan McMorris-Santoro – June 19, 2015..... 67

SANDERS..... 68

Bernie Sanders hits the Las Vegas strip, takes aim at billionaire Sheldon Adelson // WaPo // Philip Rucker – June 19, 2015 68

Bernie Sanders and immigration? It's complicated // Politico // Seung Min Kim – June 19, 2015..... 69

Sanders gains with blunt talk of rich vs. poor // AP // June 19, 2015..... 72

Bernie Sanders Faces Awkward Issues for His Liberal Allies: Immigration and Guns // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein – June 19, 2015..... 74

Clinton, Sanders, Paul top Facebook chatter in key early presidential states // McClatchy // David Lightman – June 19, 2015..... 76

Bernie Sanders Calls for Broader End to Deportations // TIME // Philip Elliot – June 19, 2015..... 77

Where Bernie Sanders disappoints liberals // CNN // Dan Merica – June 19, 2015..... 79

Bernie Sanders wants to talk about guns. But not right now. // CNN // Dan Merica – June 19, 2015..... 81

Why Sanders is a good fit for Warren Backers // CNN // Erica Sagrans and Charles Lenchner – June 19, 2015 83

Sanders has favored a lighter touch on gun control than Clinton, O'Malley // Boston Globe // Anne Linksey and Tracy Jan – June 19, 2015..... 84

Ready for Warren Sets Up Outlet for Members to Back Bernie Sanders // National Journal // Eric Garcia – June 19, 2015 87

Sanders denounces 'billionaire class' outside GOP donor's Vegas casino // The Hill // Jonathan Easley – June 19, 2015 88

Ready for Warren endorses Sanders // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – June 19, 2015..... 89

Bush, Sanders and the long, slow death of the GOP // The Hill // Bernie Quigley – June 19, 2015..... 89

Democrats May Keep Bernie Sanders Off New York Primary Ballot // Gothamist // Emma Whitford – June 18, 2015 91

Inside the mind of Bernie Sanders: unbowed, unchanged, and unafraid of a good fight // Guardian // Paul Lewis – June 19, 2015..... 92

CHAFEE..... 100

Only Lincoln Chafee Knows Which Woman Should Be on the $10 Bill // Bloomberg // Emily Greenhouse – June 19, 2015 100

UNDECLARED..... 102

WEBB..... 102

Jim Webb to speak to Clinton County Democrats // Des Moines Register // Jason Noble – June 19, 2015 102

OTHER..... 102

'Ridin' With Biden' in 2016, but So Far the Vice President's Not Aboard // NYT // Peter Baker – June 19, 2015 102

Chasing Clinton, Sanders and O'Malley Court Teachers Unions // US News and World Report // Allie Bidwell – June 19, 2015..... 104

What Did O'Malley and Sanders Tell the NEA? // Ed Week // Alyson Klein – June 18, 2015..... 106

GOP..... 108

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DECLARED..... 108

BUSH..... 108

Voodoo, Jeb! Sty le // NYT // Paul Krugman – June 19, 2015..... 108

Jeb Bush Pledges Debate on Gay Marriage After Court Ruling // NYT // Jeremy Peters – June 19, 2015 109

Jeb Bush's slam against Washington, D.C. // WaPo // Glenn Kessler – June 19, 2015..... 110

Like grandfather, like father, like son: Jeb Bush Jr. joins the campaign fray // WaPo // Ed O'Keefe – June 19, 2015 113

Five myths about Jeb Bush // WaPo // Brian E. Crowley – June 19, 2015 115

Jeb Bush Emphasizes Anti-Abortion Record as Florida Governor // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur – June 19, 2015 118

Jeb Bush Makes Surprise Pick for Political Director // WSJ // David James – June 19, 2015..... 119

Jeb Bush might have a big problem on his hands if he wins the White House // AP // Annie Greene – June 19, 2015 119

Jeb Sells Catholicism to Evangelicals // Daily Beast // Betsy Woodruff – June 19, 2015..... 121

Jeb Bush demonstates the opposite of economic wonkery // MSNBC // Steve Benen – June 19, 2015. 123

Paul Krugman: Jeb Bush's economic policies could turn the entire country into a failed Kansas-style "experiment" // Salon // Scott Eric Kaufman – June 19, 2015..... 124

Jeb Bush's pathetic Charleston dodge: "I don't know" if white supremacist suspect was motivated by racism // Salon // Scott Eric Kaufman – June 19, 2015..... 125

Jeb Bush already a winner – when it comes to campaign logos // Dallas News // Christy Hoppe – June 19, 2015 125

Jeb Bush changes tune, calls Charleston shooter 'racist' // Tampa Bay Times // Kirby Wilson – June 19, 2015 127

Bush makes his case vs. Walker, Rubio, minus criticism // Des Moines Register // Jennifer Jacobs – June 19, 2015 127

As Florida Governor, Jeb Bush Bought Land from Timber Company That Later Paid Him $1 Million // IB Times // Andrew Perez – June 19, 201 5..... 130

Jeb! Bush isn't sure what motivated the killer who 'wanted to start a race war' // Daily Kos // Barbara Morrill..... 133

RUBIO..... 134

Marco Rubio's supply -side problem: Why anti-tax fanatics have it in for him // Salon // Simon Maloy – June 19, 2015 134

PAUL..... 135

Rand Paul Names Hedge Fund Chief Mark Zpitznagel as Economic Adv isor // NYT // Alexandra Stevenson – June 19, 2015 135

Rand Paul taps hedge-fund manager as senior economic advisor // Politico // Daniel Strauss – June 19, 2015 136

A New 'Rand Paul' Super PAC is Making Paul's Official Super PAC Nervous // Bloomberg // David Weigel – June 19, 2015 137

Rand Paul Pitches Plan to 'Blow Up' Tax Code // AP // June 19, 2015..... 139

Rand Paul's First Two Books Are Full Of Fake Founding Fathers Quotes // Buzzfeed // Andrew Kaczynski and Megan Apper – June 18, 2015..... 141

CRUZ..... 144

Ted Cruz: Democrats using Charleston as 'excuse' to take away gun rights // WaPo // Katie Zezima – June 19, 2015 144

Cruz commits to 'full Grassley' in caucus run // Des Moines Register // Matthew Patane – June 19, 2015 145

PERRY..... 147

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rick Perry calls Charleston church shooting an 'accident' // WaPo // Patrick Svitek – June 19, 2015.... 147

Rick Perry Says Obama Administration Always Overreacts to 'Accidents' Like Charleston Shooting // Think Progress // Kay Steiger – June 19, 2015..... 148

GRAHAM..... 148

Returning Home to Console, Lindsey Graham Joins the Mourning // NYT // Ashley Parker – June 19, 2015 148

Lindsey Graham: Confederate Flag Is a "Part of Who We Are" // Mother Jones // Inae Oh – June 19, 2015 150

CARSON..... 151

'Crazy' Ben Carson Is The GOP's Voice of Sanity on Charleston // Daily Beast // Olivia Nuzzi – June 19, 2015 151

Ben Carson Not for Traditional Marriage // Real Clear Politics // Rebecca Berg – June 19, 2015..... 153

TRUMP..... 155

Carl Icahn politely declines Trump Cabinet offer // Politico // Adam B. Lerner – June 19, 2015..... 155

Carl Icahn Says He'll Never Be Trump's Treasury Secretary // Bloomberg // Ben Brody – June 19, 2015 155

Trump slams Hillary Clinton, calls her 'pathetic' // CNN // Theodore Schleifer – June 19, 2015..... 156

Donald Trump 'felt bad' for bashing Jeb Bush // CNN // Tom LoBianco – June 19, 2015..... 156

Trump campaign responds to Hillary linking him to South Carolina shooting: 'She must be nervous' // Breitbart // Alex Swoyer – June 19, 2015 157

Charleston: Hillary Clinton says Trump-like comments can spark race attacks // Telegraph // Rob Crilly – June 20, 2015 158

UNDECLARED..... 159

WALKER..... 159

Scott Walker unveils new Web site as he stockpiles money for unlikely presidential bid // WaPo // Matea Gold – June 19, 2015..... 159

ScottWalker.com goes live // Politico // Nick Gass – June 19, 2015..... 161

How Scott Walker dismantled Wisconsin's environmental legacy // Salon // Siri Carpenter – June 19, 2015 162

Scott Walker's Wisconsin job agency gave out $124 million without review // Chicago Tribune // June 19, 2015 166

CHRISTIE..... 168

Chris Christie rips Rand Paul on the Patriot Act // Politico // Daniel Strauss – June 19, 2015..... 168

KASICH..... 169

Operation replace Jeb Bush // Politico // Alex Isenstadt – June 19, 2015..... 169

OTHER..... 171

GOP Presidential Candidates: The More the Scarier // RealClearPolitics // Jonathan Riehl & David B. Frisk - June 20, 2015 171

Republican candidates struggle to talk about race, guns // Politico // Eli Stokols and Daniel Strauss – June 19, 2015 174

GOPers road-test their religious messages // Politico // Kyle Cheney, Katie Glueck, and Eli Stokols – June 19, 2015 176

Top Repulican Candidates Tread Lightly on Gay marriage at Evangelical Summit // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur and Josh Eidelson – June 19, 2015..... 179

Post-Charleston, Republicans Urge Prayers But No Action // Real Clear Politics // Rebecca Berg – June 19, 2015 181

Wilmore: Santorum, Fox News on Charleston 'Makes My Fking Head Explode' // TPM // Brendan James – June 19, 2015 182

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

RNC raised $9.3M in May // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – June 19, 2015..... 183

OTHER 2016 NEWS..... 184

TOP NEWS..... 184

DOMESTIC..... 184

Today in Politics: Charleston Shooting Leads to a Campaign Pause // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 19, 2015 184

NRA board members blames pastor for Charleston deaths // Politico // Nick Gass – June 19, 2015..... 184

McConnell promises Senate vote on late-term abortion bill // AP // Alan Fram – June 19, 2015..... 185

Iowa court allows remote dispensing of abortion pill // AP // June 19, 2015..... 186

The Left and Right Try to Lobby Pope Francis Months Ahead of U.S. Visit // Bloomberg // Melinda Henneberger – June 19, 2015..... 187

Cashing In // US News and World Report // Kenneth T. Walsh – June 19, 2015..... 190

Iowa Supreme Court: Ban on telemed abortion unconstitutional // Des Moines Register // Tony Leys – June 19, 2015 192

INTERNATIONAL..... 194

Iran Still Aids Terrorism and Bolsters Syria's President, State Department Finds // Michael Gordon and Eric Schmitt – June 19, 2015..... 194

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS..... 197

The opacity of Hillary's Clinton's e-mail // WaPo // Rick Morris – June 19, 2015..... 197

Hillary Clinton is playing the "woman card" too early // WaPo // Ed Rogers – June 19, 2015 197

Hillary Clinton wants to take us back to yesterday, not the future // Fox // Cal Thomas – June 18, 2015 198

ASU suckered by Clinton Foundation // AZ Central // Laurie Roberts – June 19, 2015..... 200

MISCELLANEOUS ADDED BY STAFF..... 201

Marriage Equality Is Only Step One // Medium // Gavin Newsom – June 18, 2015..... 201

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Hillary Clinton Says No to Granting 'Fast Track' Authority on Trade Deal // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 19, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton said she would "probably not" vote for fast-track authority for the trade deal that President Obama is seeking, but she acknowledged that she once said positive things about "the potential" for the Trans-Pacific Partnership agreement.

Mrs. Clinton made the comments in an interview with Jon Ralston, a Nevada journalist, after spending Thursday in the state, which holds early caucuses.

Mrs. Clinton, who has not taken a yes-or-no position on the trade deal, which is strongly opposed by labor groups, is in a bind over an agreement she once praised as a potential "gold standard" for trade deals when she was secretary of state.

"I said positive things about the process and the potential," said Mrs. Clinton, who occasionally called Mr. Ralston

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Joe" during the interview.

"Some people don't like any trade agreement, and some people are willing to take any trade agreement," she said. Asked whether she would vote in favor of fast-track authority if she were still in the Senate, Mrs. Clinton replied, "Probably not, because that's a process vote, and I don't want to say that's the same as T.P.P."

Mrs. Clinton has been criticized for not taking a clear position on the issue since becoming a candidate. Her husband, former President Bill Clinton, indicated this week that trade deals, on balance, tend to work, a position consistent with his views when he was president.

Mrs. Clinton also spoke again about the shooting death of nine people at a black church in South Carolina; a 21-year-old white man, allegedly fueled by racial hatred, is accused of opening fire after sitting through a prayer study.

"We have to have a candid national conversation about race and about discrimination, prejudice, hatred," Mrs. Clinton said. "Unfortunately the public discourse is sometimes hotter and more negative than it should be."

She then turned her comments to Donald J. Trump, the real estate mogul who, in kicking off his presidential campaign this week, accused Mexico of allowing rapists and other criminals to sneak into the United States.

Without naming Mr. Trump, she said that a recent candidate had "said some very inflammatory things about Mexicans — you don't talk like that" in political campaigns.

"I think he is emblematic," Mrs. Clinton said.

But there's another culprit, she said.

"Let's just cut to the chase – it's guns. We have to have a better balance," she said.

Mrs. Clinton noted that there was widespread support for background checks for gun buyers, but that Congress had failed to act "in the face of tremendous pressure from the gun lobby."

She said she witnessed it first-hand when her husband fought for the assault weapons ban as president in the 1990s. She did not say whether she would now support such a measure herself. An assault weapons ban is far more politically contentious than background checks.

Hillary Clinton and Bernie Sanders dominate on Facebook // Politico // Hadas Gold – June 19, 2015

Hillary Clinton and Bernie Sanders are dominating the Facebook conversations among all the presidential candidates in some of the most important early primary states, data provided by Facebook for the past month shows.

From May 13 to June 13, Clinton dominated the conversation in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. Sanders came in second in Iowa and New Hampshire, while Rand Paul came in second in South Carolina.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In Iowa, Clinton had 66,000 Iowans make 289,000 interactions (which Facebook defines as likes, comments, posts, and shares) about her. Sanders had 30,000 Iowans make 153,000 interactions about him for the same time period. Paul had 24,000 people make 98,000 interactions about him in Iowa during that time period.

In New Hampshire during the same time period, Clinton had 32,000 people make 145,000 interactions about her, while Sanders had 23,000 people make 123,000 interactions about him and Paul had 12,000 people make 59,000 interactions about him.

Clinton makes the largest mark in South Carolina, far outpacing any other candidates. From May 13 to June 13 she had 104,000 people make 460,000 interactions about her. In second place was Paul, with 34,000 people making 132,000 interactions about him. Ben Carson comes in third, with 24,000 people making 120,000 interactions about him. South Carolina's own Lindsey Graham comes in fourth, with 43,000 people making 100,000 interactions about him.

Martin O'Malley barely registers on Facebook in these early states, making the bottom three in each state, never going above 3,000 people or 5,000 interactions.

The data for the early primary states is more or less in line with Facebook data nationwide on the candidates. For example, From June 3 through June 9, Clinton topped Facebook interactions nationwide with 2.1 million people making 5.7 million interaction about her. Sanders followed with 999,000 people making 3 million interactions about him with Rick Perry close behind at 1.1 million people making 2.2 million interactions about him (Perry announced his candidacy on June 4).

It's important to note that this data includes any mentions, both positive and negative, and is current only up until June 13, before one candidate who makes a lot of noise on Facebook hadn't announced: Donald Trump. Trump, who announced his candidacy on Tuesday, had 3.4 million people on Facebook in the U.S. generate 6.4 million interactions about him in the 24 hours after his announcement, according to data provided by Facebook earlier this week.

See the full data sets, courtesy of Facebook, below.

Inside Hillary Clinton's Grassroots Campaign // TIME // Sam Frizell – June 19, 2015

At first, there was nothing on the screen, just the hum of a distant, crowded room. Then Hillary Clinton appeared, peering out of a television into Liz and Tom Nash's bedroom on the Upper East Side of Manhattan.

The former Secretary of State looked into the camera and gazed directly, it seemed, at the sixteen everyday Americans gathered in the Nashes' apartment. "I wish I could be everywhere," Clinton said, "but I'm very happy to be right here."

This was the latest technological trick from the Democratic candidate's campaign: a live videostream that beamed Clinton out of corn country in Iowa and into an elegant bedroom with ninth-floor views of Manhattan rooftops.

As part of Clinton's broader push to build a far-reaching 50-state grassroots campaign, she rallied supporters on Saturday evening via videostream in more than 650 house parties in all 435 congressional districts stretching across the country.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Upper East Side party had gathered in the Nashes' in a prewar apartment one block from Central Park. Still-life paintings of pears and flowers and photos of the family skiing dotted the rooms. Biographies of Franklin D. Roosevelt and Lyndon Johnson and two copies of Robert Caro's The Power Broker sat on the bookcases, and a framed print of the American painting by Ammi Phillips of a girl in a red dress holding a cat hung on the dining room wall.

During the call, Clinton rallied her supporters in Manhattan and elsewhere to get organized. "I want to ask each and every one of you at all the house parties that are taking place all over our country: please get involved in this campaign," she said from a living room in Sioux City. "Please go to hillaryclinton.com , sign up to be a volunteer, to knock on doors and to talk to your friends. We have a lot for people to do."

The guests applauded when the broadcast ended after about 10 minutes, and then they headed for the dining room, where guacamole and tortilla chips, San Pellegrino and white wine lay on the table beside three white "Clinton 2016" paper napkins. The group munched and praised the campaign launch on Roosevelt Island that day, where framed by the Manhattan skyline, Clinton had rolled out a lengthy wish list of Democratic proposals before promptly flying to Iowa.

"It wasn't just a good speech. It was from the heart and articulate and hard-hitting," said Gale Brewer, Manhattan's borough president, former New York City councilwoman and friend of the hosts. "I think it was a real turning point."

"She's had a busy day," Peter Slusser, an older man in a blazer and sneakers said, stretching his legs.

"We feel so launched," launch-day host and Clinton volunteer Liz Nash said, summing up the mood. "The beginning of the rest of my life is looking really good based on this morning's performance. And yes, I have had one glass of wine, but I love the woman, I really do."

Nash's party was one of many incubators for Clinton's new campaign, which plans to build on events like this one to mobilize supporters. The 435-congressional-district simulcast was partly a marketing stunt showing the Clinton juggernaut is ubiquitous and raring to go. But Clinton's staff also believes that parties like the Nashes' will eventually convert all those flakey spinach pockets and glasses of white wine into votes and campaign dollars.

"It's events like this, and the more-than-650 others we held around the country that night, that are really the building blocks and the lifeblood of this campaign," Marlon Marshall, the Clinton campaign's director of state campaigns and political engagement told TIME. "You don't build something that big in one fell swoop—you build it state by state, community by community, house party by house party."

Clinton already has staff in all 50 states, as well in Puerto Rico, the District of Columbia, and the territories. In the early primary states, Clinton has nearly 12,000 committed volunteers and 15 offices as part of what will amount to a $100-million primary effort, according to a campaign tally from last week.

There's little immediate value to paying a Clinton staff member for territories like Guam, which has no votes in the Electoral College and a population little bigger than Fargo, North Dakota. But then-Sen. Obama defeated Clinton in the 2008 Guam primary against Hillary Clinton by a margin of just seven votes, and Guam may actually someday be up for grabs. "We take nothing for granted," campaign manager Robby Mook likes to say.

Many people at the Nashes' apartment on Saturday had helped out on political campaigns before.

Gerrie Nussdorf, a retired psychologist from the West Village who wore a baseball cap and T-shirt from the 2008 campaign bearing Clinton's name, recalled how she had volunteered for in seven states for the candidate eight years ago. She began listing them: "New York, Pennsylvania, Texas, Montana—that's the only one where we lost the primary—"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"You had a good record," Brewer, the Manhattan borough president interjected.

Brewer has endorsed Clinton already, as have other New York politicians like congresswoman Carolyn Maloney and city public advocate Letitia James. But Bill de Blasio, the city's progressive mayor who ran her first Senate campaign, has notably not yet backed Clinton.

"I don't think that matters," said Brewer of the mayor, sitting in the Nashes' warmly lit living room. "I don't know what he's waiting for. Some comment on inequality, maybe."

Few left the party with firm commitments to organize for Clinton. But they had some rough ideas. Caroline Converse, an Upper East Side resident, canvassed for President Obama in 2012 and plans to pitch in this year, too. Haleigh Collins, a 20-year-old junior at Bowdoin College who saw Clinton speak in Portland, Maine, says she'll sit in the student union and sign up voters. Liz Nash said she'll continue volunteering regularly at the Brooklyn campaign headquarters, where she recently met Clinton.

The sheer size of Clinton's campaign infrastructure leaves little room for other candidates to take on talent and even enthusiastic volunteers. Even with Bernie Sanders hiring staff in Iowa and New Hampshire as he gains in the polls, it's all aboard the Clinton campaign train for most.

And Clinton seems happy to include the willing, no matter where they live. "Obviously, Iowa is particularly important because it is the first state, but I think the entire country is important too," Clinton had said earlier, live from the Hawkeye State. "I don't want anybody to feel left out."

SOCIAL MEDIA

Martin O'Malley (6/19/15, 3:22 PM) – It's time we recognize this is a national crisis. It's time we say what we're all thinking: that this is not the America we want to be living in.

Olivia Nuzzi (6/19/15, 12:34 PM) – Candidates to acknowledge racism behind #CharlestonShooting: Ben Carson, Bernie Sanders, Lindsey Graham, Martin O'Malley

ABC News (6/19/15, 4:54 PM) – White House: Pres. Obama "has said before that he believes the Confederate flag belongs in museums" -@ABCPolitics

Mike Allen (6/19/15, 8:21 AM) – Charleston, S.C. (AP) – South Caroline governor tell NBC Charleston church shooter should get the death penalty.

Sam Stein (6/19/15, 10:31 AM) – Per source, Side Blumenthal faced 3x as many qs on Clinton foundation and Brock empire than Benghazi w/ @srlevine2

Sarah Kliff (6/19/15, 12:04 PM) – No matter how you score it, CBO says Obamacare repeal increases the deficit. http://1.usa.gov/1LnEATF

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nick Minock (6/19/15, 2:13 PM) – Mayor Riley, who usually doesn't side with the death penalty, said he's open to it in this case #cbsnews #Charleston

Matt Katz (6/19/15, 7:42 PM) – At Christie Family meeting 2 weeks ago, his wife & kids gave him the green light to run for prez, @GovChristie tells Fox News.

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

Changing Views on a Female President // NYT // Lynn Vavreck – June 19, 2015

On Saturday, Hillary Rodham Clinton told thousands of people at a rally on Roosevelt Island in New York City that she wanted the United States to be a place "where a father can tell his daughter yes, you can be anything you want to be, even president of the United States." It was a line she used in her concession speech in 2008 and one that highlights what could happen if she or, less likely, Carly Fiorina win her party's nomination and ultimately the presidency. Nearly 100 years after women were given the right to vote, Americans may send their first woman to the Oval Office.

The role that female candidates will play in 2016 — and probably in most future presidential campaigns — helps highlight how attitudes have changed over the last 80 years. The changes over the decades can be described in one word: gradual. But the state of opinion today, about the possibility of a female president, demands a different word: accepting.

It wasn't always so.

Only two years after the "you've come a long way, baby" Virginia Slims ad campaign was this stark reminder from a poll the company commissioned in 1970: Two-thirds of Americans agreed that there wouldn't be a female president for a "long time" and that it was "just as well." The marketers at Virginia Slims turned this skepticism about a female president into a print ad showing a campaign button for "Rosemary for President" above the tagline "Someday."

For 40 years the American National Election Study has asked a random sample of adults a question about whether women and men should be equals in the workplace. The question asks: "Some people feel that women should have an equal role with men in running business, industry and government. Others feel that women's place is in the home. Where would you place yourself ... or haven't you thought much about this?"

In 1972, the first year the question was on the survey, 29 percent of the population thought a woman's place was in the home. Only 47 percent of the population thought women should have an equal role to men at work; another 24 percent placed themselves squarely in the middle or didn't know what to think about the question. By 1980, 20 percent of Americans thought women should stay at home, and a decade later nearly 15 percent felt this way.

The last time the question was asked in 2008, 7 percent of Americans still thought a woman's place was in the home, 10 percent couldn't take a side, and 83 percent backed equality and work.

Still today, a small portion of the electorate is unsure about whether women and men should have equal roles in government or business — and this has implications for whether a woman can win the Oval Office.

Another series of questions from the Gallup Organization sheds light on beliefs about a female president more specifically — and the trends look familiar: very low levels of support for a female president at the start of the 20th century and steady movement toward support into the 21st century.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In 1937, Gallup asked approximately 1,500 adults if they would vote for a woman for president if she were qualified "in every other respect." The wording of the question reveals a lot about the nature of opinions about women in the White House at that time. And there were clear reservations in the responses: 64 percent of Americans said no, they would not vote for a woman for president if she were qualified in "every other" way.

Being a woman was a deal-breaker.

By 1945, Gallup had changed the question's wording: "If the party whose candidate you most often support nominated a woman for president of the United States, would you vote for her if she seemed best qualified for the job?" More than half (55 percent) of Americans said they would not vote for that woman. Throughout the 1950s and 1960s, support grew slowly, edging just past 50 percent near the end of the 1960s.

During the 1970s, people became increasingly comfortable saying they would vote for a qualified woman for president, and by 1978, nearly three-quarters of the population said they would do so if their party gave them that choice. There are obvious differences between saying you would vote for a woman and actually doing so, but the change in responses to this question over time is compelling.

In this decade, nearly all Americans (95 percent via the Roper Center) say they would vote for a woman if she were qualified and were a party nominee, and although there are differences by age, education and income, the pace of change on this topic has been roughly the same across all these groups over the decades. There are very few differences based on gender.

And nearly everyone in America also believes that men and women should play equal professional roles.

When Mrs. Clinton said to supporters on Saturday that she may not be the youngest candidate in the race, but she would be the "youngest woman president in the history of the United States," she was reminding generations of Americans of a time, not so long ago, when girls only dreamed of striking out on their own, without a man, and independently contributing to the world around them. Most Americans over 40 remember those days.

Hillary Clinton's Hampton's Quandry // NYT // Amy Chozick – June 19, 2015

For the past several summers, Bill and Hillary Clinton have done what New York City's moneyed residents have done for decades: They spent their vacation amid the prime beachside real estate of Long Island.

In 2011 and 2012, there was the eight-bedroom, 12,000-square-foot East Hampton rental with a heated pool that the couple took for part of August, the kind of house that typically goes for $200,000 per month, according to local real estate listings.

Then, in 2013, they opted for an equally pricey six-bedroom mansion in Sagaponack with a private pathway to the beach. (Mrs. Clinton worked on her memoir, "Hard Choices," from a sunny office with an ocean view.)

Last year, when speculation about Mrs. Clinton's presidential run reached a fever pitch, the former first couple chose the comparatively lower-key town of Amagansett, just up Montauk Highway from the lobster shacks and fishermen at the end of Long Island. The seven-bedroom bluffside estate with sweeping views of Gardiners Bay, the kind of house in that area that rents for $100,000 for the month of August, was next door to the home of the Clinton friend and donor Harvey Weinstein.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the more than 20 years that the Clintons have been in the public eye, much of that time on one campaign trail or another, the couple's choice of vacations spots has been well chronicled and exhaustively debated, going back to the first presidential summer, at the moneyed enclave of Martha's Vineyard.

1993 On his first extended vacation as president, Bill Clinton chose Vail, Colo., where he golfed twice with former President Gerald R. Ford, jogged, entertained friends with a sax rendition of "My Funny Valentine" and attended an outdoor performance of the Bolshoi Ballet Academy. That same summer, the Clinton family also spent time on Martha's Vineyard, coaxed there by his friend Vernon E. Jordan Jr.

1995 Nicknamed the "vacationer in chief," Mr. Clinton and family chose horseback riding and hiking in Jackson, Wyo. By then the Clintons were a mainstay on Martha's Vineyard, where they went that fall to attend the wedding of their friends Mary Steenburgen and Ted Danson.

1998 At the height of the Monica Lewinsky scandal, the Clinton family retreated to a 12-day vacation on Martha's Vineyard. "This is a family that has some healing to do," Mike McCurry, the White House press secretary, said as they boarded Air Force One to the island.

1999 With Hillary Clinton expected to run for the United States Senate in New York, the Clintons spent a weekend in the Hamptons and five days in the low-key Finger Lakes region, in the previously little-known village of in Skaneateles, N.Y. They also returned to Martha's Vineyard.

2000s The Clintons keep the Vineyard in the mix but also become fixtures in the Hamptons, with Mr. Clinton raising money for his philanthropic foundation there and Mrs. Clinton finding a welcome vacation from her Senate work. During the heated 2008 Democratic presidential primary, Mrs. Clinton found some of her most devoted backers behind the hedges of their Hamptons estates.

2011-12 The Clintons spend two summer vacations in the East Hampton, N.Y., home of the developer Elie Hirschfeld, which they rented for prime late-August days. The oceanfront house has a large heated pool, eight bedrooms and 12,000 square feet of space where the Clintons' extended family could stay. They did not continue to rent the home after the expenses associated with it ate up the bulk of their security deposit, according to several people with knowledge of the transaction.

2013 With the grueling travel of the State Department behind her and a book to write, Mrs. Clinton and husband relaxed in a rented $11 million house on 3.5 acres of prime real estate in Sagaponack, N.Y., with six bedrooms, four fireplaces, ocean views and a private path to the beach.

2014 Mrs. Clinton stopped at a bookstore in East Hampton to sign copies of her latest memoir, "Hard Choices," but she chose to vacation slightly farther east in the comparatively laid-back town of Amagansett.

But the Clintons' go-to vacation spot for the last several summers now seems problematic, as Mrs. Clinton, who is seeking the Democratic nomination for president, delivers a populist economic message that the deck is stacked in favor of the wealthiest Americans and that she plans to "reshuffle the cards."

Thus, it may not be ideal for Mr. and Mrs. Clinton to be photographed mingling at summer cocktail parties with the likes of Jerry Seinfeld, Alec Baldwin, Steven Spielberg and other wealthy Hamptons regulars.

The Clintons looked into renting another home in the Hamptons, but they have hesitated to sign a lease, said several real estate agents in the Hamptons, who could discuss the Clintons only on condition of anonymity for fear of jeopardizing their client list.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Campaign aides have said Mrs. Clinton will take a vacation in August, but they declined to comment on the specifics of when or where.

Whether they rent there or not, the couple are expected to spend much of their vacation on the shores of Long Island, where their circle of New York friends and donors own luxe houses.

The Clintons will also spend at least one weekend in their old vacation haunt of Martha's Vineyard, likely alongside President and Michelle Obama, to celebrate the 80th birthday of their friend Vernon E. Jordan Jr. (Mr. Jordan and other friends lured Mr. Clinton to the island in the early years of his presidency, and it quickly trumped his previous leisure spot in Arkansas. A White House spokesman said it was too early to confirm Mr. Obama's August plans.)

Another presidential candidate, former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida, who on Monday declared that he was seeking the Republican nomination, has already drawn criticism for his summer vacations in Maine. The Boston Globe reported that Mr. Bush is getting his own four-bedroom, 3,000-square-foot cottage on the Bush family oceanside compound in Kennebunkport.

Donors who did not want to talk on the record offering Mrs. Clinton unsolicited advice said they hoped she could avoid the inevitable claims of elitism by not renting a Hamptons home again, given the optics of a presidential campaign and the still-sluggish economy. (One donor advised she should at least opt for the less-flashy Sag Harbor.)

At the same time, Mrs. Clinton and her allies, under intense pressure to raise money for both her campaign and Priorities USA Action, a super PAC supporting her bid, will need to woo the country's wealthiest Democrats this summer, wherever the 0.001 percent happen to be. "There is only going to be one fund-raiser for Hillary in the Hamptons this summer: it starts on Memorial Day and ends on Labor Day," said Robert Zimmerman, a fund-raiser for Mrs. Clinton with a home in Southampton.

With her kickoff rally in New York last Saturday and a week of campaigning in early nominating states behind her, Mrs. Clinton will dive into a breakneck schedule of fund-raisers across the country.

"The fund-raising for Hillary has been easier than other fund-raising, but it's never easy," said Jay Jacobs, a Nassau County Democrat and longtime Clinton friend.

Many of Mrs. Clinton's most devoted backers, including the Washington lobbyist Liz Robbins and Alan Patricof, a New York-based investor, have homes in the Hamptons and have hosted fund-raisers for the Clintons' various charitable and political causes in the past.

The hyperkinetic Clintons tend to work on their vacations, squeezing in fund-raisers for the Bill, Hillary & Chelsea Clinton Foundation. In 2013, Mr. Patricof hosted a high-dollar gala at the Topping Rose House in Bridgehampton. Guests included Mortimer B. Zuckerman, the publisher of The Daily News, and the real estate executive Peter S. Kalikow, who each donated $25,000.

"Some of us will go into catastrophic withdrawal if we're not tapped to raise money for one of the Clintons," said Ken Sunshine, a veteran Democratic activist and public relations executive with a home in Remsenburg.

But this year, it's not so simple.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As she mounts a campaign built on lifting the middle class and alleviating the growing gap between rich and poor, Mrs. Clinton has come under criticism for her family's wealth.

Mr. and Mrs. Clinton have earned more than $125 million in paid speech income since leaving the White House in 2001, according to financial disclosures. That level of income "shows how out of touch they've truly become," said Reince Priebus, chairman of the Republican National Committee.

The attack appears to have made inroads.

A CNN poll released June 2 showed that 47 percent of voters believed Mrs. Clinton "cares about people like you," down from 53 percent last July.

Mrs. Clinton's allies said the issue was less about perception and more about practicality. The excruciating pace of a presidential campaign, even in its infancy, doesn't allow for two consecutive weeks of downtime, much less the long walks on the beach and clambakes the Clintons have come to enjoy in previous years. "They probably won't have the time to spend out there, so why spend the money?" Mr. Patricof said.

But it could pay for Mrs. Clinton to have a presence in the Hamptons. Already, some of the women who move to vacation homes for the season and are active in charitable causes have inquired about hosting fund-raisers and luncheons to raise money for Mrs. Clinton, said Alison Brod, a public relations executive and Hamptons hostess.

"It's a time for people to show their allegiance and show off their houses at the same time," Ms. Brod added.

The parties won't exactly feature the poolside glamour the area is known for. Campaign finance rules dictate that a married couple may spend $2,000 on expenses like cocktails and appetizers. That doesn't go far in an enclave where a party tent can cost tens of thousands of dollars, not including the band, passed hors d'oeuvres and Veuve Clicquot that go in it.

"Let's face it, none of the people coming to my event on Monday are coming for the coconut shrimp," Mr. Jacobs said ahead of the June 1 fund-raiser at his family home in Laurel Hollow, N.Y., a Long Island enclave with a very distinct vibe from the Hamptons. "They're coming to see Hillary."

Republican presidential hopefuls will also find ripe fund-raising ground in the Long Island hamlets, where conservative, deep-pocketed donors will open their wallets, and their beach houses, in droves.

In 2012, the Republican nominee, Mitt Romney, picked up $3 million in a single weekend in the Hamptons, with back-to-back events at the sprawling East End estates of Ronald O. Perelman, the Revlon chairman; David H. Koch, the billionaire conservative; and Clifford M. Sobel, a donor and ambassador for George W. Bush. (The Obama campaign used the weekend blitz to reinforce its charge that Mr. Romney was out of touch, despite Mr. Obama's own Hamptons fund-raising.)

"There's such a great amount of wealth here," said Samantha Yanks, editor in chief of Hamptons Magazine. But, she added, "It's tricky for politicians to be associated with that for too long."

"It's a place you come, you visit and fund-raise, but, as a politician, you don't necessarily want to be living in," she said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Clintons' summer vacation plans have always jelled at the last minute and been wrought with political symbolism. In 1999, when Mrs. Clinton was close to running to be a senator from New York, the Clintons tacked on five days in the Finger Lakes region upstate, in addition to time on Martha's Vineyard and fund-raising in East Hampton.

Indeed, for the last several summers, the Clintons have been a part of the fabric of the Hamptons. Mr. Clinton takes his young niece and nephew for miniature golf and his 9-year-old arthritic chocolate Labrador, Seamus, for walks on the beach.

The family dines at Babette's, a casual French bistro with an outdoor patio, and Almond, the Bridgehampton restaurant partly owned by Jason Weiner, the brother-in-law of Mrs. Clinton's close aide Huma Abedin. Mr. Clinton celebrated his 67th birthday in the Hamptons at a dinner party that included Paul McCartney and Jimmy Buffett as guests.

Some Hamptons-based donors said it was too early to tell whether Mrs. Clinton's Secret Service detail would become a mainstay on the narrow farm roads near Long Island Sound.

"Summer starts after July Fourth," Mr. Patricof said.

Log On and Hit 'Like'...Facebook Measures the Candidates // NYT // Alan Rappeport – June 19, 2015

If elections were won based on Facebook chatter, Hillary Rodham Clinton, Senator Bernie Sanders and Senator Rand Paul would be the front-runners in early primary season states.

The social media company has released figures on how the candidates — and presumed candidates — fared in terms of Facebook interactions in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina from mid-May to mid-June. Interactions represent likes, posts, comments and shares about a candidate.

Mrs. Clinton is leading all candidates in the three states, and is generating the most interest in South Carolina, where she has 460,000 interactions from 104,000 people.

Mr. Sanders, the independent from Vermont running for the Democratic nomination, trails Mrs. Clinton in Iowa and New Hampshire, but leads all the other Republicans in those states. Mr. Sanders, a socialist who rails against the influence of corporate money in politics, has an enthusiastic cadre of followers on Facebook and Twitter.

Mr. Paul, who has also invested in a sophisticated social media strategy and likes to "troll" his opponents online, comes in third place in Iowa and New Hampshire, after Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Sanders. He is doing even better in South Carolina, where he is in second place.

Former Gov. Jeb Bush, of Florida has some ground to make up on the Facebook front. He ranks fourth in Iowa, fifth in New Hampshire (following Senator Ted Cruz of Texas) and seventh in South Carolina.

The social media dynamics in South Carolina are somewhat different than Iowa and New Hampshire, as Senator Lindsey Graham, who hails from the state, is generating more discussion there and Ben Carson ranks third.

Some White House hopefuls such as Senator Marco Rubio of Florida and Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, who has yet to declare, have landed in the middle of the pack despite national polls that label them as "top tier" candidates.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But social media chatter is no substitute for formal surveys, as interest in a candidate, such as Donald Trump, can overshadow how seriously voters take them as a potential president.

Hillary Clinton confidante is confident that release of full Benghazi deposition would absolve him // WaPo / / Colby Itkowitz – June 19, 2015

Details from Tuesday's Benghazi committee deposition of Hillary Clinton friend Sid Blumenthal have leaked out in bits and pieces, but the full eight-hour exchange remains unavailable to the press and public.

Now Blumenthal's attorney is demanding a transcript of the interrogation be released.

"Leaks like these are distorting the truth by mischaracterizing facts and circumstances," Attorney James Cole wrote Friday in a letter to Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), the Republican charged with leading Benghazi investigation. "They are creating an incomplete and unfair narrative about the deposition, Mr. Blumenthal's knowledge about Libya, and the tragedy that occurred in Benghazi."

The letter, obtained by the Loop from a Democratic committee aide, followed one sent by Democrats on Wednesday also calling for the full transcript be made public to "provide important background and context to his emails."

Blumenthal sent memos to Clinton when she was secretary of state about the security situation in Libya before and after the attacks on the diplomatic compound in September 2012 that killed four Americans, including U.S. Ambassador Christopher Stevens. Gowdy has said he plans to make those e-mails public.

A Gowdy spokeswoman declined to comment.

Democrats on the committee, who have long argued that the Republicans have slow walked the investigation to coincide with Clinton's run for the White House, say the deposition transcript will show that most of the GOP questions were politically motivated.

By their count, Blumenthal's interactions with Clinton were brought up 160 times. The Clinton Foundation was mentioned more than 50 times. And Blumenthal's own business interests in Libya were cited more than 270 times.

But the Benghazi attacks themselves were only specifically referenced 20 times, the Democrats say. The four people who died, including Stevens, were not mentioned once.

We'd love to confirm those stats ourselves. But we don't have the transcript…

Hillary Clinton's trade fiasco // Politico // Ben White – June 19, 2015

Hillary Clinton is an absolute mess on trade right now. She was a strong advocate of TPP as Secretary of State and in her pre-campaign book "Hard Choices." But now says there is stuff in it she doesn't like. She's backed Nancy's Pelosi's approach, which was to torpedo TAA in order to stop TPA. But without TPA there is no TPP, which

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton once supported. Many of her comments on the topic lately have made no logical sense whatsoever.

This is probably the most bizarre: “The TPA is a process issue. The issue for me is what’s in the deal,” she said this week in New Hampshire. “I think this is a chance to use this leverage so that the deal does become one that more Americans and members of Congress can vote for.” Where to start? TPA is not a process issue. Without it there is no TPP. And what kind of leverage was she talking about? TPA is designed to give the administration leverage to get the best trade terms possible. Blocking it would take that leverage away.

Clinton might as well have said: “I can’t anger the left or feed Bernie Sanders’ momentum by backing my former boss on TPA so an advisor told me to dismiss it as a ‘process issue’ so that’s what I’m doing even though it makes no sense and everyone knows it.”

The heat is only going to rise if the current legislative gambit to get TPA done works, which it probably will. Which means Obama could finish TPP and send it to Congress. Perhaps Clinton’s need to tack so nakedly and embarrassingly to the left will be over by the time that happens and she can return to her previous support for TPP. But she will not have covered herself in glory (or consistency or trust-worthiness) by the time that happens.

Hillary Clinton fundraising off Treasury putting woman on $10 bill // Politico // Nick Cass – June 19, 2015

Hillary Clinton’s campaign is fundraising off news this week that the Treasury Department will put a woman on the newly redesigned $10 bill in 2020.

“Women are too often erased from our nation’s history — putting a woman on a major piece of currency is a first step toward fixing that,” reads the email that went out to supporters on Friday. “Let’s celebrate this historic event by chipping in $10 to Hillary for America — because we’ve still got barriers left to break.”

A spokeswoman for Clinton’s campaign did not elaborate on which woman Clinton would like to see on the new $10 bill, telling Bloomberg Politics that “there’s no doubt they have a long list to choose from.”

Treasury Secretary Jack Lew announced the change on Wednesday, while also noting that he is considering keeping Alexander Hamilton on some of the bills.

Judge reopens FOIA case on Hillary Clinton aide Abedin // Politico // Josh Gerstein – June 19, 2015

Reacting to the disclosure that Hillary Clinton exclusively used a private email account during her tenure as secretary of state, a federal judge agreed Friday to reopen a conservative group's Freedom of Information Act lawsuit seeking details about the employment arrangements of top Clinton aide Huma Abedin.

However, U.S. District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan declined — for now — to address claims from Judicial Watch that Clinton's use of the private account and server led State Department officials to commit a fraud on the court by certifying they had turned over all responsive records.

"In view of revelations that then-Secretary of State Clinton and members of her staff used personal email accounts to conduct State Department business, and that emails from those accounts may not have been covered by State Department searches for documents responsive to the FOIA request at issue in this case, the plaintiff seeks to reopen this case for further proceedings," Sullivan noted in an order Friday. "The newly discovered information is a changed circumstance regarding the prior judgment in this case--i.e. the stipulated dismissal in 2014."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The State Department agreed to reopen the case, but rejected Judicial Watch's claims of fraud. Sullivan said he was re-opening the case under the "changed circumstances" in federal court rules "rather than spilling ink to resolve [the parties'] dispute as to whether Judicial Watch has submitted clear and convincing evidence of fraud by the State Department."

The FOIA lawsuit seeks information about Abedin's continued employment at State as a "special government employee" after she stepped down from her role as deputy chief of staff to Clinton in 2012. Critics have said the arrangement, first reported by POLITICO in 2013, courted conflicts of interest because Abedin was also working for the consulting firm, Teneo, at the same time.

The State Department inspector general is conducting a review of State's "special government employee" program, according to a letter the IG sent to Senate Judiciary Committee in April.

A spokesman for Clinton's presidential campaign had no immediate comment on the development.

Clinton publicly acknowledged in March that she solely used a private email account as secretary. In response to a request from the State Department last year, she turned over to her former agency in December about 30,000 emails totaling roughly 55,000 printed pages. She also acknowledged having about 32,000 emails erased after her lawyers determined they were private or personal in nature.

Judicial Watch has said it wants relevant information from Clinton's emails, as well as any Abedin or other Clinton aides kept on private accounts. Abedin is known to have maintained an account on the same clintonemail.com domain her boss used.

Sullivan is an appointee of President Bill Clinton.

Hillary Clinton: Donald Trump's racial rhetoric 'not acceptable' // Politico // Adam B. Lerner – June 19, 2015

Hillary Clinton took a swipe at Donald Trump on Thursday, saying — without mentioning the New York real estate tycoon by name — that his presidential launch speech was offensive to Mexicans and "emblematic" of the kind of rhetoric that cannot be tolerated in the wake of the tragic South Carolina shootings.

"We have to have a candid national conversation about race and about discrimination, prejudice, hatred," Clinton said in an interview with KNPB's Jon Ralston. "But unfortunately the public discourse is sometimes hotter and more negative than it should be, which can, in my opinion, trigger people who are less than stable."

"For example," the former secretary of state added, "a recent entry into the Republican presidential campaign said some very inflammatory things about Mexicans. Everybody should stand up and say that's not acceptable. You don't talk like that on talk radio. You don't talk like that on the kind of political campaigns."

"You can name him," Ralston responded, but Clinton refused to use Trump's name.

"I think he is emblematic," she said. "I want people to understand it's not about him, it's about everybody."

"We should not accept it," Clinton said of hateful speech in national political conversation. "Decent people need to stand up against it."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump fired back at Clinton's remarks on Friday in a post to Instagram.

"Wow, it's pretty pathetic that Hillary Clinton just blamed me for the horrendous attack that took place in South Carolina. This is why politicians are just no good. Our country's in trouble," he said.

Hillary's comments referred to a line from Donald Trump's discursive Tuesday announcement speech, in which he claimed that Mexico is sending criminals to the United States.

"When Mexico sends its people, they're not sending their best," Trump told the audience. "They're not sending you. They're not sending you. They're sending people that have lots of problems and they're bringing those problems with us. They're bringing drugs, they're bringing crime, they're rapists, and some, I assume, are good people."

Other Republican presidential candidates have not yet spoken out against Trump. Former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina told a conservative radio host that Trump is "endlessly entertaining" and his campaign pitch is "tapping into the frustration of the American people with the professional political class."

Hillary Clinton did not just condemn Trump's speech — she also reiterated President Obama's assertion that gun policy should be included in a national discussion of how to combat mass murders.

The Democratic 2016 frontrunner called the president's speech Thursday "very moving" and agreed with his sentiment on the relevance of guns in creating tragedies.

"Let's just cut to the chase: It's guns," she said, adding that state and local politicians need to join in a national effort to combat "tremendous lobbying pressure from the gun lobby."

The interview also touched on Clinton's earlier assertion that whether to grant President Obama fast-track authority on trade "is a process issue," not a substantive question that requires her to take a position. She has declined to take a firm stand on the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP), a massive 12-country trade deal that many Democrats oppose.

Clinton told Ralston that, given what she knows now, she would not vote for fast-track authority if she were still in the U.S. Senate without greater aid to workers.

"At this point, probably not because it's a process vote and I don't want to say it's the same as TPP," Clinton said. "Right now I'm focused on making sure we get trade adjustment assistance and I certainly would not vote for it unless I were absolutely confident we would get trade adjustment assistance."

The former secretary of state also sought to explain why she promoted the TPP while serving in the Obama administration, but refuses to take a position on it now.

"When [TPP] began to be negotiated I said it holds out the promise to be the gold standard" of trade deals, Clinton said. "I said positive things about the process and the potential."

"If we could get the right kind of agreement that was good for workers, good for wages, good for the environment, labor, safety, health and good for our national security, that would be great for America," she said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton criticizes predatory lenders during veterans forum // AP // Michelle Rindels – June 18, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton on Thursday vowed to protect veterans from aggressive for-profit colleges and predatory lenders while preserving the dominance of the U.S. military.

The former secretary of state spoke at a historic VFW post in Reno before about 200 people and five panelists from the military community. She said her top priorities as president would include taking care of veterans when they return home.

Clinton argued for continuing the post-9/11 G.I. Bill and promised to veto any efforts to pare down its benefits. She said her plan to get veterans into school and the workforce included cracking down on for-profit colleges that can saddle former servicemembers with heavy debts.

Her plan called for closing the "90-10 loophole," which prevents colleges from deriving more than 90 percent of their revenue from federal financial aid. The 90 percent cap doesn't count Defense Department grants or VA benefits, which entices for-profit colleges to market to veterans.

Clinton also said she supported strengthening the Military Lending Act to prevent payday lenders from victimizing servicemembers.

Nevada's caucuses are a key early event in the path to the Democratic nomination, and the state is also expected to be one of a narrow range of swing states in the November 2016 election. Several presidential candidates scheduled campaign appearances in the state this week, including Republican Ben Carson and Democratic Sen. Bernie Sanders.

Hillary Clinton Is Trouncing Everyone in the Facebook Primary // Bloomberg // Andrew Feather – June 19, 2015

It's not even close—Hillary Clinton has been far and away the presidential candidate with the most Facebook buzz.

According to data from Facebook collected May 13, 2015 to June 13, 2015, Clinton leads in all of the first three primary states when it comes to likes, posts and views. In fact, she has about twice as many interactions as the second place candidate in both Iowa and New Hampshire and more than four times the online interaction of the closest candidate in South Carolina.

The charts below illustrate two metrics: unique people and total interactions. Interactions include likes, posts comments and shares. Unique people measures the number of unique individuals that contributed to the interactions of a given candidate.

Senator Bernie Sanders is holding second place with a firm grip, however, with his online outreach excelling in both Iowa and New Hampshire. Sanders' populist message has resonated with younger audiences who tend to spend more time using social media, and on sites like Reddit, where Sanders has an active "subreddit" page. Sanders' strength showed up in Facebook interaction data from both Iowa and New Hampshire, but he sits in fourth place in South Carolina behind two Republicans.

Rand Paul holds second place in South Carolina but has only generated about a quarter of the interactions created by the Clinton campaign. Libertarian-leaning candidates have traditionally done well online. One of the most striking examples comes from Paul's father's bid for the White House in 2008. According to the New York Times, independent supporters of Ron Paul's 2008 Presidential campaign raised $4 million online in a single day.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrats have historically performed better than Republicans online, which helps explain Clinton's dominance and Sanders' strength. The disparity between the parties online was demonstrated by a study published by the Harvard University Institute for Politics. In 2014, researchers at Harvard found that Democrats between the ages of 18 to 29 are more likely to use almost every social media platform than Republicans of the same age group. Moreover, even if the same percentage of Republicans and Democrats in that age group use a given service, there are almost twice as many Democrats as Republicans in that age group, according to a 2014 Gallup Poll.

Trump, the missing variable

Donald Trump announced his candidacy outside of Facebook's dataset, but the level of online interaction he is generating may reach that of the frontrunners depending on how long his candidacy lasts.

According to Facebook, Trump's announcement generated 6.4 million interactions from 3.4 million people. In comparison, Hillary Clinton generated 10.1 million interactions from 4.7 million unique people, and Rand Paul generated 1.9 million interactions from 865,000 unique people. Data on Trump from the early primary and caucus states was not available.

Hillary Clinton Wants Woman on $10 Bill But Won't Say Which One // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein – June 19, 2015

There's a long list of women who could join Alexander Hamilton on the $10 bill, Hillary Clinton's campaign said Friday, endorsing the Treasury Department's plans to redesign the currency.

“Putting a woman on the $10 bill is a long overdue step toward recognizing the tremendous impact women have had on the history of our country," senior policy advisor Maya Harris said in a statement to Bloomberg.

While suggestions for the bill have ranged widely, including many ineligible options like Beyonce and Clinton herself (though some of those came as jokes from the right , since the winning woman cannot be a living person), the campaign declined to weigh in on who the candidate might want to see on the bill.

"We're looking forward to seeing which woman is selected by U.S. Department of Treasury – but there's no doubt that they have a long list to choose from," Harris said.

The Treasury Department this week announced plans to modernize the $10 bill. As part of that process, some of the new bills will carry the image of a woman of historic importance, Treasury Secretary Jacob Lew announced. Hamilton's image will remain on other $10 bills. It will mark the first time that a feminine face has appeared on paper U.S. currency since the 19th century.

Lawyer for Clinton Confidant Wants Congress to Release Testimony // Bloomberg // Billy House – June 19, 2015

A lawyer for Hillary Clinton confidant Sidney Blumenthal says House Republicans are leaking pieces of his closed-door testimony before the House committee investigating the September 11, 2012 attacks in Benghazi.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

James Cole, in a letter dated Friday to the Benghazi panel's chairman, Representative Trey Gowdy of South Carolina, requests the immediate release of Blumenthal's full testimony transcript and related emails because, he writes, these selective leaks are "distorting the truth."

Blumenthal was called to give a closed-door deposition Tuesday about memos and advice on Libya he sent then-Secretary of State Clinton prior to the attacks on the U.S. facilities in which four Americans were killed.

"There have been numerous leaks and about his emails and testimony many of which have given an inaccurate account of what occurred in the deposition," says Cole's letter. The emails refer to nearly 60 messages produced for the committee by Blumenthal regarding Libya and Benghazi.

Cole adds that "it is unfair to my client" to let this inaccurate record persist of his testimony, which was given behind closed doors on Tuesday.

Cole cites several specific press accounts carrying such "selective details" he says were released by members or staffers of the committee. The list includes one story published by Bloomberg News the day after Blumenthal's testimony.

Stories by the National Review, Politico, and Fox News were also cited by Cole.

Gowdy and committee Republicans had no comment about the letter, which was released by a spokesman for committee Democrats, Paul Bell.

Cole's letter comes as Democrats on the House Select Committee on Benghazi have themselves been calling for release of the complete transcript of closed-door testimony, along with related e-mails.

The panel's top Democrat—Elijah Cummings of Maryland—said in a statement earlier Friday the committee has, since Blumenthal's testimony on Tuesday, "become a sieve, with anonymous 'sources' repeatedly leaking selected excerpts of Mr. Blumenthal's emails out of context."

Cummings said the transcript reveals exactly how Republicans are spending taxpayer dollars -- investigating Clinton "and her personal relationships rather than the attacks in Benghazi," he said in the statement.

"It's time to end this circus," Cummings said. "The Committee should immediately release all of Mr. Blumenthal's emails and his full deposition transcript together."

Earlier this week, all five Democrats on the panel said they want Republicans to release publicly the full transcript of the committee's hours-long deposition Tuesday with Blumenthal.

In a letter to committee Chairman Trey Gowdy of South Carolina released Wednesday, the Democrats said, “Rather than selectively leaking only certain information about Mr. Blumenthal, the American people deserve the benefit of Mr. Blumenthal's responses to the hundreds of questions that you and other Select Committee Members asked him, including questions about these same emails.”

Clinton: Stop For-Profit Colleges From Targeting Veterans // TIME // Sam Frizell – June 18, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton announced on Thursday a new plan intended to stop for-profit colleges from fleecing veterans who use federal G.I. Bill funds to attend school.

Speaking before a roundtable with veterans in Reno, Nevada, Clinton focused her remarks on the so-called 90-10 rule. The rule requires for-profit colleges to accept at least 10% of their money from private dollars rather than federal financial aid and loans, with the idea of holding the schools more accountable to the open market.

But an unintended loophole in the 90-10 rule means that federal military benefits like the Post-9/11 G.I. Bill can count toward schools' 10%. That leads for-profit schools to aggressively target veterans in search of federal dollars, often deceptively. Proponents of a new bill say that veterans at many for-profit schools have high dropout rates and leave badly in debt.

Clinton would plan to close the loophole.

It's hardly a sweeping vision for the country of the tenor that Clinton laid out in her campaign launch speech on Saturday. But in the coming months, advisers say Clinton will continue to roll out policy proposals at the rate of about one per week.

Two bills similar to Clinton's proposal introduced in the House and Senate have foundered without gaining much momentum.

Clinton also said on Thursday she would plan as President to address predatory lending to veterans, healthcare and expanding job options after service.

She sang the praises of bipartisan compromise, too. "In a democracy, nobody has all the answers," Clinton said. "You have to get up everyday and say, 'I'm willing to work for anyone whose willing to work for the good of America and in particular the good of our veterans.'"

Hillary Clinton sees a different California than her husband once did // LA Times // Kurtis Lee – June 19, 2015

When Bill Clinton arrived in California for the state's 1992 Democratic primary he was a considerable underdog.

He had a commanding delegate tally and was well on his way to securing the party's presidential nomination, but faced a political titan in the state: the former and future governor, Jerry Brown.

The result? He beat Brown by 7 percentage points.

Now, more than two decades after that June 1992 primary victory, his wife, Hillary Rodham Clinton, has embarked on her second White House run.

On Friday, she arrives in Los Angeles for three Westside fundraisers, including one at the home of actor Tobey Maguire and his wife, Jennifer Meyer.

Unlike the opponents her husband faced, Hillary Clinton's rivals are longshots at best and have no substantial ties to California. Rather than worry about a contested primary, this Clinton can focus on California's other role in Democratic politics, the cash machine.

For both parties, California has proven a fertile place for raising money. But for Democrats, that's particularly true. During the last presidential cycle, President Obama raised almost $63 million from people who listed a California residence, as opposed to just over $41 million for Mitt Romney, the Republican nominee, according to a compilation by the Center for Responsive politics, which tracks campaign fundraising.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But California's position as a Democratic stronghold wasn't always so steadfast.
Before Bill Clinton's 1992 victory, in which he beat incumbent President George H.W. Bush 46% to 32% in the state, California had a healthy track record of electing Republican candidates. Four years earlier, Bush defeated Democrat Michael Dukakis by 3 percentage points. Two of the last five Republican presidents, Ronald Reagan and Richard Nixon, were Californians.

While Bill Clinton raised cash in the Democratic money belt of the Westside, he also spent time in Southern California actively campaigning. In the 1992 election, it was not uncommon to see the Arkansas governor travel to South Los Angeles to meet with African American voters. He even addressed Orange County Republicans on a visit in December 1991.

"There really has been this bond between California and the Clintons that is interesting," said Chris Lehane, a Democratic strategist, who worked in the Clinton administration. "Californians have given their support and the Clintons have embraced this state."

Lehane notes several Clinton administration officials, including Leon Panetta, who served as chief of staff and John Emerson, who worked as deputy director of Intergovermental Affairs, had histories in California politics. Panetta, a former member of Congress, went on to serve as Secretary of Defense and head of the CIA in the Obama administration. Emerson is ambassador to Germany.

Such connections have stuck with the Clintons. "Just look at 2008," said Lehane. "Hillary won California by a wide margin over President Obama."

At least on this trip, however, Hillary Clinton does not have plans for retail politicking of the sort her husband displayed in 1992. After a day of fundraising, she plans to travel north to San Francisco on Saturday to address the U.S. Conference of Mayors.

Hillary Clinton hitting three $2,700-per-person Westside fundraisers today // LA Daily News // June 19, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton is scheduled to conduct three $2,700-per-person fundraisers on Los Angeles' Westside today to benefit her campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination.

The series of fundraisers will begin with a 12:30 p.m. luncheon at the Beverly Hills home of Westfield Corp. co-CEO Peter Lowy and his wife Janine.

Organizers said "a couple dozen people" plan to conduct a protest outside the home over Clinton's refusal to definitively oppose the Trans-Pacific Partnership. Opponents of the trade agreement say it will serve to export millions of high-paying jobs to low-wage countries, reduce wages for 90 percent of American workers, lower food safety and environmental standards, and increase human rights abuses.

The Obama administration says the partnership will boost economic growth by increasing American exports, support the creation and retention of American jobs, and promote innovation.

In an interview Thursday with Nevada radio host Jon Ralston, Clinton said, "I was willing to wait until I could see what's in it before I took a decision, like when I was a senator."

The luncheon will be followed by a 5 p.m. event at the home of HBO executive Michael Lombardo and husband Sonny Ward; and a 7 p.m. event at the home of actor Tobey Maguire and his wife Jennifer Meyer. The ticket price is the maximum individual contribution for a candidate seeking his or her party's presidential nomination.

The 67-year-old Clinton, who is seeking to be the nation's first female president, also conducted a fundraiser Thursday at the Balboa Bay Club in Newport Beach, with tickets priced from $1,000 to $2,700.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's stump speech, which she is expected to deliver at the fundraisers, discusses her commitment "to being a champion for everyday Americans" and outlines "the four fights that are the focus of her campaign -- building the economy of tomorrow, not yesterday; strengthening families and communities; fixing our dysfunctional political system; protecting our country from threats," an aide said.

The visit to the Southland is Clinton's second since declaring her candidacy on April 12. She also conducted three fundraisers on the Westside on May 7.

Ex-charity exec who helped expose $500G Clinton Foundation donation faces legal threats // Fox News // Adam Shaw – June 19, 2015

A former charity executive who helped expose a questionable $500,000 donation to the Clinton Foundation is now being threatened by her old bosses with a lawsuit seeking tens of thousands of dollars, FoxNews.com has learned.

Sue Veres Royal, former executive director at the Happy Hearts Fund, was initially quoted in a May 29 New York Times article that said the charity lured Bill Clinton to a 2014 gala only after offering a $500,000 donation to The Clinton Foundation. His office previously had turned down the charity's invitations, but this time he accepted; the accompanying donation amounted to almost a quarter of the gala's net proceeds.

Veres Royal, who spoke to FoxNews.com about the fallout from that report, is now embroiled in a legal battle with the charity. She filed a formal complaint June 4 with the New York attorney general's Charities Bureau, as the charity itself threatened her with legal action for allegedly breaking her confidentiality agreement.

The Times report gave several behind-the-scenes details, including that founder Petra Nemcova explicitly told Veres Royal to offer the $500,000 "honorarium."

The Happy Hearts Fund's legal team fired off a cease-and-desist order to Veres Royal the same day the Times report was published. The charity claimed she had breached a confidentiality agreement and gave "numerous falsehoods, inaccuracies and disparaging statements" about the organization to the Times. The letter demanded she no longer speak to the media or else they would seek damages.

A Happy Hearts Fund spokesman said they are unable to discuss the situation concerning Veres Royal as they, too, are bound by a confidentiality agreement, but defended the 2014 award to Clinton.

"Because we know the strong impact of working together and because the Happy Hearts Fund and the Clinton Foundation have a shared goal of providing meaningful help to Haiti, we proposed a joint educational project with the Clinton Foundation. Any suggestion that this joint project is some kind of 'honorarium' or 'fee' is unequivocally false," the spokesman told FoxNews.com in a statement. According to the group, such partnerships have allowed the charity to build 113 schools since 2006 in nine different countries, with more opening this month.

However, Veres Royal said she was appalled not only by the 2014 Clinton donation but by details she had not known before the Times report was published -- most notably that the $500,000, which was supposed to go to causes in the ravaged country of Haiti, still had not been earmarked for any particular project by The Clinton Foundation.

"It's disgusting to me that this organization is being used in this way," Veres Royal said. "I have been to Haiti three times. I've seen how desperate the need is, and it's disgusting to me that people are trying to do good while they're sitting on half-a-million dollars. I think that's a disservice to those people who have donated the money, and to the people of Haiti."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The threat of legal action comes as the Happy Hearts Fund tries to limit the damage already caused to the organization's reputation after the revelations. Veres Royal said two conservative-leaning board members already have resigned after finding out about the exorbitant donation which, to Veres Royal's knowledge, was never voted on by the board.

Veres Royal responded to the Happy Hearts Fund legal demand by claiming she was not in breach of her confidentiality agreement. She says she was not the source of the report, but was merely quoted on what she called a matter of public interest. It was at that point she then filed the formal complaint about HHF's actions with the New York attorney general.

In the complaint, Veres Royal alleges the gala was used to shore up the rocky political fortunes of Haitian President Michel Martelly, a close ally and friend of Prime Minister Laurent Lamothe, who was then dating Nemcova, a Czech model.

Martelly was at that time dealing with a number of corruption allegations, specifically over the location of education funds, Veres Royal said.

The complaint claims that Nemcova, who was an ambassador at-large for Haiti, "specifically instructed Veres Royal to 'find a reason'" to honor Martelly and then pushed to get Clinton's staff to agree for Martelly to be honored as well. Consequently, she claims, a "totally concocted" award -- for "Leadership in Education" -- was also presented to Martelly at the Clinton gala.

Bill and Hillary Clinton -- now a Democratic presidential candidate -- have been heavily involved in the reconstruction of Haiti after the 2010 earthquake, though their role in the country's recovery has come under scrutiny amid accusations of running a pay-to-play operation with Haitian reconstruction.

The Clinton Foundation did not respond to FoxNews.com's request for comment.

Veres Royal's complaint also alleges improper financial oversight and gross misrepresentation to the public about fundraising.

After she filed the complaint, HHF sent an email, seen by FoxNews.com, arguing again that Veres Royal was breaching a confidentiality agreement, and that HHF was entitled to over $30,000 in payments Veres Royal received as part of the agreement, as well as unspecified "injunctive relief and monetary damages."

Despite being under fire, and not having an attorney of her own, Veres Royal says she is going to keep pursuing her complaint, and will not back down under the threat of legal action:

"Although it's been nerve-wracking to me, I feel it's my ethical responsibility to do so."

Hillary Clinton Doesn't Need the Media...Yet // National Journal // S.V. Date – June 19, 2015

Two months since she officially became a presidential candidate again, a favorite topic of reporters covering Hillary Clinton has been: how reporters are covering Hillary Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton doesn't engage with the journalists covering her, the complaint goes. She doesn't take enough of their questions. She hasn't been accommodating about her day-to-day schedule. She isn't forthcoming about the private email server she used as secretary of State or about the fundraising at the Clinton Foundation.

All of which is true—and none of which is likely to change any time soon.

Because while these political reporters' goal is to provide their audiences as much information about Clinton as possible, Clinton has a different goal: to win. And while those two goals may at some point coincide, now is not one of those times.

Today, more than 200 days before the first ballots are cast for the Democratic nomination, one Clinton objective is to first build teams of organizers and volunteers in the early voting states and then in the likely battleground states in the general election. Another is to ramp up the fundraising grind in $2,700-chunks. Neither makes for compelling news coverage, which is why the national media instead focus on the emails and the foundation and the attacks they've drawn from Republicans—or, alternatively, on the campaign's general disinclination to engage with the media at all.

While some polling suggests Clinton's image has suffered because of the foundation fundraising questions, it's not at all clear what effect her campaign's treatment of the media is having or will ever have.

Gallup Poll's Frank Newport said only 24 percent of the public has confidence in newspapers, while 21 percent trust TV news. "That's pretty not good," he said. "She's not harming an institution that Americans have a lot of confidence in right now."

"My instincts are that voters don't particularly care," said Peter Brown, assistant director of Quinnipiac University Poll. "Journalists are not exactly held in great admiration by the public."

What's more, he said, Clinton's long history in national politics means that those most likely to vote in Democratic primaries are the least likely to be put off by her strategy. "If they're going to be for Hillary, they're going to be for Hillary," Brown said.

Clinton holds large leads over her Democratic rivals in most polls and is likely to show substantially better fundraising when the first reports are filed next month. And the eight years she spent as first lady, another eight years in the Senate, including two on the 2008 presidential campaign trail, and then four as secretary of State relieve her of the necessity of treating every press query as an opportunity for free publicity.

In any case, Clinton's treatment of the political press is hardly unprecedented, said Kathleen Hall Jamieson, a communications professor at the University of Pennsylvania's Annenberg Public Policy Center.

"Front-runners routinely minimize their contact with reporters early in the campaign season without serious penalty," she said. "Experienced reporters grouse about the behavior but know enough about history to expect it."

The Clinton campaign says it understands the various complaints and is considering changes to some of its policies. At a panel sponsored by Politico on the eve of Clinton's kickoff speech in New York City last weekend, campaign manager Robby Mook said he does expect Clinton to engage more with the media but said there were still eight months until Iowa and 18 months to November 2016. "We've got to pace this thing," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Days later, Clinton held an impromptu press conference in Concord, New Hampshire, where she took questions from reporters covering her visit. Of course, that availability also served the purpose of generating competing news in the same hour that former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush announced his entry into the Republican presidential race.

Bush and his aides are quick to note that he takes numerous media questions on any given day, even dozens—just as he did during his two terms as Florida governor.

Ari Fleischer, longtime spokesman for Jeb Bush's brother, former President George W. Bush, said Clinton takes a heavy-handed approach with the media at her own peril.

"One day, something significant will go wrong, and if you mistreat the press and ignore the press, the press will make whatever goes wrong into a bigger explosion than it otherwise would have been," he said. "Payback is inevitable."

George W. Bush and his campaign staff treated journalists better than Democrat Al Gore and his staff did, Fleischer said. And when it came out that Gore had claimed to have visited parts of wildfire-ravaged Texas when he had not, reporters were ready to portray it as a reflection of Gore's honesty and tendency to exaggerate, rather than merely misremembering a detail, Fleischer said.

Eight years later, in contrast, reporters gave presidential candidate Barack Obama a pass on misstatements, like saying there were 57 states, rather than questioning his intelligence, because they liked him and his campaign, Fleischer said.

"It may not matter at this early stage," he said about the current Clinton campaign, "but it will matter eventually."

Of course, not all media is getting equally shut out. Like many past and current campaigns of both parties, the Clinton campaign is providing local outlets in the early voting states upgraded access. On the same day she gave dozens of national reporters about 20 minutes to ask questions, Clinton afforded 10 minutes to a single newspaper: the Concord Monitor, with a circulation of less than 20,000.

It squeezed in six questions in its allotted time—not a single one concerned email servers or the Clinton Foundation.

The Great 2016 Foreign Policy Gamble // National Journal // Josh Kraushaar – June 18, 2015

When it comes to the politics of national security, Republicans and Democrats are worlds apart. Not only do they differ on the threat posed by Islamic terrorism and the appropriate tactics to defeat it, but they don't even agree—at least publicly—on how significant an issue it will be in the presidential election.

Hillary Clinton barely touched on foreign affairs in her lengthy campaign relaunch last week, while her advisers are confidently proclaiming that 2016 won't be a national security election. Meanwhile, nearly every Republican presidential candidate emphasizes the emerging threats abroad in their stump speeches. The approach mirrors where the party's supporters are: Republicans ranked fighting terrorism as more important than the economy in January's Pew Research Center polling. Slightly more Democrats rated income inequality and wage equity as more significant issues than "the situation with Islamic militants," which ranked only sixth among top priorities in a fall 2014 Gallup survey.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This disconnect between the two parties' strategies on the subject is remarkable. Even when partisans deeply disagree on policy prescriptions, there's often a general consensus when it comes to political tactics. But on national security, Republicans are convinced that Hillary Clinton will have trouble answering for the Obama administration's persistent weaknesses on the issue, while Democratic strategists believe that voters are much more focused on bread-and-butter economic issues, and those most alarmed about the rise of ISIS would be voting Republican anyways.

In her sparse comments referencing terrorism in New York last weekend, Clinton focused on backing legislation that guarantees health care coverage for 9/11 victims, and optimistically outlined the ways the Obama administration used "smart power" to challenge foreign enemies. The GOP presidential candidates' speeches regularly warn audiences about growing threats from abroad. New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, for one, gave an entire speech in New Hampshire about national security last week, to an audience normally focused on fiscal issues.

"It's a much more important issue for the Republican base than the Democratic base. That may give the Republicans a distorted picture of the general election," Democratic pollster Mark Mellman said. "But there's also no question that there's momentum behind national security and terrorism issues. If present trends continue, the issue for 2016 is going to be whether people think this next president can keep the world in order."

There's a lot of risk for both sides in their reading of the environment. Clinton is downplaying her record as secretary of State because it's not the political asset she expected it to be. Like Mitt Romney's tortured relationship with his Massachusetts health care reforms during the 2012 campaign, she doesn't want to have to answer for the controversies that have emerged since she left office. She'll be criticized for several high-profile blunders that occurred under her tenure—including post-Qadaffi Libya becoming an outpost of global mayhem, the administration's ill-timed "reset" in relations with an emboldened Russia, and the failed security of the American diplomatic facilities in Benghazi.

Clinton advisers maintain that she starts the campaign with a significant advantage because voters already view her as tough and experienced. As Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta told The Washington Post: "She doesn't need to go to England to prove she knows the difference between the queen and the prime minister." But to believe her experience will automatically translate into voters approving of her judgment is an awfully cocky assumption to make, especially given the opposition material Republicans already have to use against her.

Republicans, meanwhile, recognize that it's a lot easier to sound a muscular tone on foreign policy than to advance specific policies requiring American military engagement in the Middle East. Even some of the more hawkish Republican candidates, such as Marco Rubio and Jeb Bush, have avoided calling for more American troops to fight the Islamic State. Many haven't gone much further than President Obama in calling for training other countries' fighters to join the fight against ISIS. They know that while there's intense dissatisfaction over the passive manner Obama has handled foreign policy, there's still widespread resistance for another American military incursion in the Middle East.

"Here's the dilemma: People agree with the policies Obama supports, but they dislike the results. There's a general sense that the world is not under control," Mellman said.

The burden for Clinton is that she'll need to offer a more plausible defense for the decisions she made as secretary of State. She can't simply say she "stood up to Putin," when evidence shows that the Obama administration was pursuing better relations with the Russians. It won't pass the plausibility test. For Republicans, they'll need to nominate someone who's credible in speaking about foreign policy. There's a reason why several Republican governors, without much national security experience, have been going to school—literally—to bulk up on their knowledge. Clinton's experience argument on foreign policy would play better against an untested governor like Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker than a Rubio or Bush.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrats generally believe that, absent a large-scale war involving American military casualties, the public won't change their votes over foreign policy. Republicans think Obama's approval ratings are so weak on the subject are enough for nearly any of Clinton's challengers to exploit the party's weaknesses. Both are wrongheaded.

The reality is there's not much optimism that the national security outlook will get noticeably better by the next presidential election; Obama's advisers, in calling the fight against ISIS a long war, have acknowledged as much. There's little doubt that the next president will be inheriting a chaotic environment abroad. If voters care a lot about those worrisome trends, Republicans will start out with an advantage. But if it's politics as usual, Clinton's strategy of playing to her base will look prescient.

EMILY's List Already Raising Big Bucks for Hillary Clinton // HuffPo // Paul Blumenthal – June 19, 2015

Hillary Clinton is already seeing a windfall in contributions from EMILY's List, a group dedicated to electing pro-choice Democratic women that endorsed her campaign in April.

EMILY's List donors donated more than $200,000 to Clinton during the first month and a half of her campaign, according to Federal Election Commission filings. That is nearly half of the $550,689 the group raised during the entirety of Clinton's first presidential bid in 2008, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

The donations to Clinton's 2016 campaign were split close to evenly between contributions of $1,000 or more, which totaled $111,400, and those of $500 or less, which added up to $84,356. The larger contributions included donations from EMILY's List President Stephanie Schriock, EMILY's List founder Ellen Malcolm, longtime Democratic donors Nancy and Reinier Beeuwkes, philanthropist Anne Hess and Democratic Party strategist Mary Beth Cahill.

Following a string of tough losses in the 2014 election and amid the continued rollback of abortion rights at the state level, EMILY's List is putting increased weight behind its efforts to put the first woman in the White House.

"Our network of over 3 million members are fired up about 2016. We are ready to elect the first woman president -- and more Democratic women up-and-down the ballot, from coast-to-coast," EMILY's List Executive Director Jessica O'Connell said in a statement.

Since the Supreme Court's 2010 decision in Citizens United opened the door to unlimited independent spending by corporations, unions and, ultimately, individuals, EMILY's List has ramped up its independent spending. In the 2014 cycle, the group reported more than $8 million in federal election spending to the FEC.

The organization plans to spend even more than that to boost women candidates in the 2016 cycle. EMILY's List says it anticipates that it will benefit Clinton indirectly by supporting candidates further down the ballot in battleground states like Nevada, where Catherine Cortez Masto is seeking to fill the open seat being vacated by Sen. Harry Reid (D), and New Hampshire, where Gov. Maggie Hassan (D) may run for Senate.

Schriock has longstanding ties to the former secretary of state. Before Clinton named Robby Mook as her campaign manager, Schriock was under consideration for the post.

Schriock was also briefly served on the board of Priorities USA Action, the pro-Clinton super PAC, but stepped down in order to be able to work more closely with the campaign through EMILY's List. EMILY's List Political Director Denise Feriozzi, who is in charge of the group's presidential campaign spending, replaced Schriock on the super PAC's board.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Ready for Hillary super PAC -- now simply called Ready PAC -- has ceased most operations since Clinton announced her candidacy. The PAC is expected to transfer its social media followers over to EMILY's List ahead of the election. This would include Ready PAC's 2.2 million Facebook and 145,000 Twitter followers.

Hillary Clinton's Wall Street Address // HuffPo // Bill Moyers and Michael Winship – June 19, 2015

"Perfect! Perfect!" exclaimed a woman looking around at the Four Freedoms Park on New York City's Roosevelt Island as a large crowd waited for Hillary Clinton to announce her presidential candidacy last weekend.

And so it was. Secretary Clinton had chosen an ideal setting to link her destiny to the founding father of the modern Democratic Party, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, the political giant whose famous proclamation in 1941 of the Four Freedoms -- freedom of speech and worship, freedom from fear and want -- defined the essence of American ideals after a devastating economic disaster and as we prepared to enter a great world war.

"Perfect! Perfect!" Except for one thing -- something the exultant spectator packed in the crowd at ground level might not have been able to see. As the camera pushed in toward the horizon behind Clinton, there it was, beyond the island and across the water: the skyline of Wall Street, the embodiment of financial might and its moguls and barons -- "the malefactors of great wealth," as his cousin Teddy called them -- that FDR took on in his fight to save democracy from unbridled greed, and capitalism from itself.

As Clinton spoke -- "Prosperity can't be just for CEOs and hedge fund managers" and "Democracy can't be just for billionaires and corporations," -- you could imagine the juxtaposition to have been deliberate, staged by her managers to superimpose her rhetorical defiance of plutocracy against its glass and steel castles off in the distance. No doubt she had thrown around herself this cloak of populism because it is the current fashion -- a superb and timely one -- among many Democrats, especially progressives battling the oxymoronic Wall Street Democrats who in the past thirty years hijacked FDR's party and severed it from its working class roots.

So it was refreshing to see her sally forth to do battle with the hyenas of Wall Street (as one noted hedge fund manager candidly described his ilk) proclaiming that:

The financial industry and many multinational corporations have created huge wealth for a few by focusing too much on short-term profit and too little on long-term value, too much on complex trading schemes and stock buybacks, too little on investments in new businesses, jobs, and fair compensation.

Her loyalists were presenting her to us as the reincarnation of the young woman she was in the '70s and '80s, the student who wrote her senior thesis on the organizer Saul Alinsky, interned at a fearless and controversial civil rights law firm, worked as an attorney for the Children's Defense Fund, investigated the treatment of migrant workers and chaired the board of the Legal Services Corporation.

Yet, you could also wonder if they had been unaware of another possible reading of the metaphor presented by the sight of Roosevelt Island against the skyline of Wall Street -- something her handlers didn't intend: A mockery of the words she was speaking at that very minute.

She is, after all, a favorite of the giant banks, the CEOs and hedge funds she now was castigating. Between 2009 and 2014, Clinton's list of top twenty donors starts out with Citigroup and includes JPMorgan Chase, Morgan Stanley and Goldman Sachs, whose chief Lloyd Blankfein has invested in Clinton's son-in-law's boutique hedge fund. These donors are, as the website Truthout's William Rivers Pitt notes, "The ones who gamed the system by buying politicians like her and then proceeded to burn the economy down to dust and ash while making a financial killing in the process."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

They're also among the deep-pocket outfits that paid for speeches and appearances by Hillary or Bill Clinton to the tune of more of more than $125 million since they left the White House in 2001. It could hardly escape some in that crowd on Roosevelt Island, catching a glimpse of the towers of power and might across the river: Can we really expect someone so deeply tethered to the financial and business class -- who moves so often and so easily among its swells -- to fight hard to check their predatory appetites, dismantle their control of Congress, and stand up for the working people who are their prey?

Consider the two Canadian banks with financial ties to the Keystone XL pipeline that fully or partially paid for eight speeches by Hillary Clinton. Or her $3.2 million in lecture fees from the tech sector. Or the more then $2.5 million in paid speeches for companies and groups lobbying for fast-track trade. According to TIME magazine and the Center for Responsive Politics, in 2014:

Almost half of the money from Hillary Clinton's speaking engagements came from corporations and advocacy groups that were lobbying Congress at the same time... In all, the corporations and trade groups that Clinton spoke to in 2014 spent $72.5 million lobbying Congress that same year.

Then look at David Sirota's recent reporting for the International Business Times, especially the revelation that while Hillary Clinton was Secretary of State, her department:

Approved $165 billion worth of commercial arms sales to 20 nations whose governments have given money to the Clinton Foundation, according to an IBTimes analysis of State Department and foundation data... nearly double the value of American arms sales made to the those countries and approved by the State Department during the same period of President George W. Bush's second term.

Those nations include Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Algeria, the United Arab Emirates, Oman and Qatar, each of which "gained State Department clearance to buy caches of American-made weapons even as the department singled them out for a range of alleged ills, from corruption to restrictions on civil liberties to violent crackdowns against political opponents."

Further, American defense contractors like Boeing and Lockheed who sold those arms and their delivery systems also shelled out heavily to the $2 billion Clinton Foundation and the Clinton family. According to Sirota:

In all, governments and corporations involved in the arms deals approved by Clinton's State Department have delivered between $54 million and $141 million to the Clinton Foundation as well as hundreds of thousands of dollars in payments to the Clinton family, according to foundation and State Department records.

The Clinton Foundation publishes only a rough range of individual contributors' donations, making a more precise accounting impossible.

The Washington Post reports that among the approximately 200,000 contributors there have also been donations from many other countries and corporations, overseas and domestic business leaders, the odious Blackwater Training Center, and even Rupert Murdoch of celebrity phone hacking fame.

Meredith McGehee, policy director of the nonpartisan Campaign Legal Center, told David Sirota: "The word was out to these groups that one of the best ways to gain access and influence with the Clintons was to give to this foundation."

We pause here to note: All of these donations were apparently legal, and as others have written, at least we know who was doling out the cash, in contrast to those anonymous sources secretly channeling millions in "dark money" to the chosen candidates of the super rich. In The Atlantic, Lawrence Lessig, campaign finance reform activist and director of Harvard's Safra Center for Ethics put it well:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The question is not whether Hillary Clinton is a criminal. Of course she is not. The question is whether she can carry the mantle of a reformer. Can she really stand above the cesspool that is Washington -- filled not with criminals but with decent people inside a corrupted system trying to do what they think is good -- and say, this system must change.

And does she really see the change that's needed, when for the last 15 years, she has apparently lived a life that seems all but oblivious to exactly Washington's problem.

We see "exactly Washington's problem" in how, during the 1990s, Bill Clinton became the willing agent of Wall Street's push to deregulate, a collaboration that enriched the bankers but eventually cost millions of Americans their homes, jobs, and pensions.

Thanks to documents that came to light last year (one even has a hand-written note attached that reads: "Please eat this paper after you have read this."), we understand more clearly how a small coterie of insiders maneuvered to get President Clinton to support repeal of the New Deal-era Glass-Steagall Act that had long protected depositors from being victimized by bank speculators gambling with their savings. Repeal led to a wave of Wall Street mergers.

As you can read in stories by Dan Roberts in The Guardian and Pam and Russ Martens online, the ringleader of the effort was Secretary of the Treasury Robert Rubin, who breathlessly persuaded the president to sign the repeal and soon left office to join Citigroup, the bank that turned out to be the primary beneficiary of the deal. When it overreached and collapsed, Citigroup received the largest taxpayer bailout in the history of U.S. finance. Rubin, meanwhile, earned $126 million from the bank over ten years.

According to The New York Times, Rubin "remains a crucial kingmaker in Democratic policy circles" and, as an adviser to the Clintons, "will play an essential role in Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaign for president..."

Hillary Clinton, as a young Methodist growing up in Park Ridge, Illinois, was weaned on the social ethics of John Wesley, a founder of Methodism and a courageous champion of the poor and needy; we have her word for it and the witness of others. "Do all the good you can," the Methodist saying goes, "in all the places you can, at all the times you can, to all the people you can, as long as ever you can."

But over time, Hillary Clinton achieved superstar status among Washington's acculturated class -- that swollen colony of permanent denizens of our capital who may have come from the hinterlands but can hardly resist the seductive ways of a new and different culture in which the prevailing mindset is: It's important to do good but more important to do well.

Lawrence Lessig believes she is an unlikely reformer - "which is precisely why she might be a particularly effective one." But her way of life has marinated for a long time now in the culture of wealth, influence, and power -- and a way of thinking engrained deeply in our political ethos, one in which one's own power in democracy is more important than democracy itself.

It will take a conversion worthy of John Wesley to wrest free of that mindset, but God forbid we should have to live with another White House eclipsed by the skyline of Wall Street.

Sidney Blumenthal's Benghazi Testimony Focuses More on Domestic Politics Than The Attack // HuffPo // Sam Levine and Sam Stein – June 18, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The 2012 attacks on the U.S. consulate in Benghazi, Libya, have been investigated by congressional Republicans for years. Increasingly, however, they've resembled a vehicle for probing the actions of one player in that tragedy: then-Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, now a Democratic presidential candidate.

The most recent evidence of a narrowed, singular focus came this week, when Republicans on the House Select Committee on Benghazi called a longtime Clinton confidant, Sidney Blumenthal, to testify in private.

Blumenthal has Benghazi ties himself. He provided informal consultation to Clinton while she was at the State Department and apparently had business interests in Libya at the time.

But according to sources familiar with his testimony, including one who was in the room, committee members placed far more attention on Blumenthal's domestic political role for Clinton and how he will help her presidential ambitions than in understanding the nature of the attack that killed four U.S. officials, including the U.S. ambassador to Libya, Chris Stevens.

Those sources told The Huffington Post that it was several hours into Blumenthal's deposition before Republicans actually asked about the attacks. Blumenthal's congressional inquisitors posed roughly three times as many questions on his associations with the Clinton Foundation -- the charitable organization tied to the former first family for which he was a paid consultant -- as well as his work for Democratic-campaign institutions such as Media Matters and Correct the Record, than on the Benghazi attacks.

Requests for comment to the committee's chair, Rep Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.) were not returned. But the recollections of those sources mirror a Politico report on Wednesday, which asserted that Republicans spent much of Tuesday's nearly nine-hour deposition asking Blumenthal about his political and philanthropic work. Blumenthal has publicly said that the deposition was political and that he knows nothing about the attacks.

“My testimony has shed no light on the events of Benghazi, nor could it, because I have no firsthand knowledge of what happened,” Blumenthal told reporters after his deposition. “It seems obvious that my appearance before this committee was for one reason and one reason only, and that reason is politics.”

Republicans have defended these lines of inquiry on grounds that they need to further understand the role Blumenthal was playing in the Clinton universe in order to assess the advice he gave her about Libyan intelligence while she was secretary of state. According to the sources familiar with Blumenthal's testimony, many of the questions posed about his work at Media Matters focused on whether he authored, edited, or provided materials for that organization to use in defending Clinton's role during the Benghazi attack.

Despite it all, the source in the room called the deposition civil, and said "nobody yelled or screamed."

Blumenthal sent Clinton at least 25 memos in 2011 and 2012 that contained intelligence about Libya. Clinton forwarded several of the memos to top State Department aides for review, but she and her colleagues expressed skepticism that the memos contained accurate information -- and they sometimes didn't. Blumenthal did not write the memos himself, both he and Gowdy have said.

The extensive questioning of Blumenthal's political association will undoubtedly further fuel Democratic criticism of Gowdy and his committee. Those critics say that the committee, charged with understanding all of the "policies, activities and decisions" that led to the attack on the U.S. compound, has become a not-so-subtle vehicle for badgering Clinton as she begins her campaign. And they point to the lethargic pace of the investigation as evidence that the election, not Benghazi, is at the forefront of its concern.

Despite pledges from Gowdy otherwise, the committee appears unlikely to release its final report until 2016.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Voters Generally Support Clinton Voting Push // Public Policy Polling // - June 20, 2015

Americans strongly support the premise that it would be a good thing for the country if everyone voted- 67% share that view, compared to 19% who think that it would be a bad thing. There is bipartisan agreement on that point with majorities of Democrats (86/6), independents (60/21), and Republicans (52/34) all saying they believe it would be good.

There's more division on a specific proposal Hillary Clinton has made toward that end- automatic voter registration. 48% of voters support that to 38% who are opposed. Democrats (72/17) are strongly in favor of it while Republicans (28/59) are mostly opposed.

-As the Supreme Court decision looms the once unpopular Affordable Care Act now has Americans at least pretty evenly divided. 42% say they support it to 43% who opposed. When we last asked the question nationally last winter, there was only 39% support and 48% of voters who were opposed. Obamacare may still not exactly be popular, but it's not the big albatross it might have been for Democrats in the past either.

-2 of the big recent policy debates in Washington have Americans largely saying 'meh.' 53% of voters have no opinion on the Trans Pacific Partnership. Among those who do have one 18% are supportive and 29% are opposed. The 18% support is the same we found a month ago, the 29% opposition has ticked up a little bit from 25% in May. Democrats (23/24) are pretty closely divided on it while both Republicans (15/35) and independents (15/29) are mostly opposed to the extent they even have a take. It's a similar story when it comes to attitudes toward the USA Freedom Act. 61% have no opinion about that but it's more popular with voters who do have one- 26% support it to 14% who are opposed. That one meets with support across party lines from Decembers (32/11), Republicans (23/14), and independents (21/17) alike.

-Last week's gun news was the legality of bringing your gun into the airport- only 23% of voters nationally think you should be allowed to do that, compared to 64% who are opposed. Democrats (12/81), independents (25/57), and Republicans (34/50) are all firmly against guns in airports. This is one issue where the elected officials who decided to allow it are way out of line with how their constituents feel about the issue.

-Much is made of Barack Obama being unpopular- 45% of voters approve of the job he's doing to 50% who disapprove. But his numbers are positively stratospheric compared to where the leaders of Congress and the body itself stand with the public. John Boehner has only a 22% approval rating with 62% of voters disapproving of him, and Mitch McConnell is even less popular with just a 16% approval rating and 61% of voters disapproving of him. It's a given that Boehner and McConnell are disliked by Democrats but what's really striking is the extent to which even voters in their party don't like them. Boehner has a 31/50 approval rating with Republican voters, and McConnell's is 24/50.

Congress itself has a 12/77 approval rating. That does at least make it more popular than some of the things we polled on though. Chris Brown has a 10/52 favorability rating and Justin Bieber is even more unpopular at 10/67. And Congress does outpoll ISIS, which comes in at a 5/81 favorability rating.

-We tested a bunch of prominent performing artists that we had also polled on in 2013 to see how their numbers had changed since then. The most popular folks we looked at were Taylor Swift and Justin Timberlake, each of whom came in at 54/15. In 2013 Swift was at 53/27 and Timberlake was at 52/24 so their negatives have dropped while their favorability numbers have basically stayed in place.

Only two of the people we polled have seen their numbers shift significantly in the last couple years. Lady Gaga has become a good deal more popular, going from a 29/50 favorability rating to 42/32. Justin Bieber, already unpopular, has headed even further in the wrong direction going from 20/54 to 10/67.

Hillary Clinton: Donald Trump's speech drives Charleston-like violence // Breitbart // Ben Shapiro – June

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

19, 2015

Speaking with host John Ralston, she explained, “Public discourse is sometimes hotter and more negative than it should be, which can, in my opinion, trigger someone who is less than stable.” She continued, “I think we have to speak out against it. Like, for example, a recent entry into the Republican presidential campaign said some very inflammatory things about Mexicans. Everybody should stand up and say that’s not acceptable.”

Presumably, Hillary was referencing Trump’s comments during his announcement speech in which he said Mexico was sending people across the border: “They’re not sending their best. They’re not sending you. They’re not sending you. They’re sending people that have lots of problems, and they’re bringing those problems with us. They’re bringing drugs. They’re bringing crime. They’re rapists. And some, I assume, are good people.”

Dylann Roof murdered nine people at a historically black church. There are no reports he was a fan of Donald Trump, or that Roof shot six black women and three black men after being inspired by Trump’s rhetoric about Hispanic illegal immigrants.

But facts have no bearing on such nonsensical arguments. This hatred for the First Amendment – the European notion that freedom of speech must be curtailed in order to avoid triggering the unstable or evil – has become a hallmark of the left. Whether the left blames Pamela Geller for the violence of radical Muslims who try to murder people for drawing cartoons of Mohammed, blames Sarah Palin for Jared Loughner’s shooting of Gabrielle Giffords, or mistakenly blames the Tea Party for James Holmes, right wing speech has become their bugaboo.

Of course, the same does not hold true for the left, according to the left. When Mayor Bill De Blasio shut down New York police use of stop and frisk, sending crime skyrocketing, then followed up that botchery by blaming racist cops for the death of Eric Garner while invoking his biracial son (he said he and his wife “have had to talk to Dante for years about the dangers that he may face” from police) – and when two NYPD officers were then murdered in cold blood — the NYPD turned their backs on him. The left promptly blamed the NYPD for the rift.

When Baltimore Mayor Stephanie Rawlings-Blake said on national television, “We also gave those who wished to destroy space to do that” with regard to rioters, the left said she had been taken out of context. When the president of the United States spoke in the aftermath of the Ferguson verdict and railed that “there are still problems and communities of color aren’t just making these problems up… there are issues in which the law too often feels as if it is being applied in discriminatory fashion,” and when violent riots broke out, the left insisted that the president had forwarded race relations.

As for Hillary Clinton herself, the former Secretary of State is no stranger to inflammatory rhetoric. In her campaign relaunch announcement, she accused Republicans of wanting to “take away health insurance from more than 16 million Americans… sham[ing] and blam[ing] women… put[ing] immigrants who work hard and pay taxes at risk of deportation… turn[ing] their backs on gay people who love each other.” She has accused Republicans of attempting to stop black people from voting. She has insisted that religious people must be forced to abandon their religious beliefs on social issues. When she was in the Senate, Clinton screamed from the floor regarding the Bush Administration’s intelligence before 9/11, “What did Bush know and when did he know it?”

But naturally, that’s just politics. It always is, when leftists are participating in it. When right-wingers engage in First Amendment-protected speech, however, they’d best watch themselves: you never know when the next evil maniac is around the corner. Perhaps the only safe course would be to curtail the First Amendment to prevent such rhetoric. After all, if only we can save one life, is that so high a price to pay?

Hillary Clinton alludes to Donald Trump’s racist rhetoric as fuel for hateful acts like the Charleston shooting // NY Daily News // Cameron Joseph – June 19, 2015

The type of “inflammatory” rhetoric Donald Trump uses can "trigger people who are less than stable to do something" like the Charleston shootings, Hillary Clinton said Friday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The people who do this kind of dastardly horrible act are very small percentage, but unfortunately the public discourse is sometimes hotter and more negative than it should be, which can, in my opinion, trigger people who are less than stable to do something like what we've seen," Clinton said during an interview with journalist Jon Ralston in Las Vegas, referring to the murders of nine black churchgoers earlier this week.

Donald Trump, who canceled a campaign event in South Carolina in the wake of the massacre, fired back.

Clinton then took aim at Trump, who during his presidential announcement speech earlier this week said many of the immigrants who come here illegally from Mexico are “rapists” who are “bringing drugs” and “bringing crime.”

“For example, a recent entry into the Republican presidential campaign said some very inflammatory things about Mexicans,” Clinton said, refusing to name the bellicose businessman. “Everybody should stand up and say that's not acceptable. You know, you don't talk like that on talk radio.”

Trump, who canceled a campaign event in South Carolina in the wake of the massacre, fired back.

“It’s pretty pathetic that Hillary just blamed me for the horrendous attack that took place in South Carolina,” he said in an instagram video. “This is why politicians are just no good.”

How Hillary Clinton will raise gobs of cash from Wall Street while trashing the industry in public //
Business Insider // Linette Lopez – June 19, 2015

Here's how a politician would normally get money from Wall Street to finance their campaign.

Stop by the office and visit the CEO, like Marco Rubio did with Blackstone founder Steve Schwarzman.

Throw some public events for younger donors and then have a private dinner with the heavy hitters at night to collect the big checks, like Jeb Bush did with Goldman Sachs.

Do something that billionaire hedge fund manager Carl Icahn has pointed out President Obama hasn't been able to do: Make nice with the Hamptons crowd.

Hillary Clinton is not likely to do these things.

If Clinton wants to keep her base happy and be a champion against income inequality and for the middle class, she can't be seen hobnobbing with Wall Street's elite.

So how does a candidate in Clinton's position still get Wall Street's elite money?

Very, very quietly, and through back channels.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That's what we learned from speaking to a number of bundlers, donors, and political insiders.

Dinners with Wall Street will be private and small. And, likely, you will not see Clinton visiting any banks, hedge funds or private equity firms.

There will be a number of industry leaders collecting checks for her quietly too, like Marc Lasry, the billionaire founder of Avenue Capital. He sent out emails to friends in an attempt to raise $270,000 within the first week of Clinton's campaign.

That kind of stuff works. The reality of political bundling is that donations are given not because of some PR stunt or because of some swanky party.

Donors give money to campaigns when the right people ask them for that money.

Lasry, for one, is on that list of "right people." He runs a huge hedge fund and people want to be able to do business with him. Lots of those people will donate to whichever candidate Lasry wants them to, just to stay on his good side.

Meanwhile, Clinton will go out to the world with her populist, anti-Wall Street rhetoric.

Every once in a while, this will upset some of her donors. That sensitivity has already become apparent in the campaign. In an interview with CNN, billionaire Leon Cooperman complained that Clinton "hangs out with these people in Martha's Vineyard and in the Hamptons and the very first thing she does is criticize hedge funds."

This was in response to Clinton pointing out that "the top-25 hedge fund managers making more than all of America's kindergarten teachers combined. And often paying a lower tax rate."

She added, "So you have to wonder: 'When does my hard work pay off? When does my family get ahead? When?'"

See? Sensitive.

Another way insiders expect Clinton to raise cash from Wall Street is through Wall Street's lawyers. Lawyers tend to lean more liberal than their Wall Street clients do, and Clinton can rally their support so that they can approach clients who might be able to sign a check or two.

The approach will work if only because, as everyone knows, Wall Street owes its lawyers a debt of gratitude or two.

The question is, then, will the Clintons still summer in the Hamptons?

How Hillary Clinton thanked a pizza place that's been feeding her campaign // Business Insider // Hunter Walker – June 19, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Monty Q's, a pizzeria located near Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign headquarters in Brooklyn, New York, has become a favored source of food for her staff. Clinton checked out Monty Q's for herself on May 14. Afterwards, she sent the restaurant a note thanking them for a "warm welcome to the neighborhood."

"My campaign staff has been raving about Monty Q's for weeks now so I just had to stop by for lunch — and they were right. The salad was delicious," Clinton wrote. "Thank you for your friendly and courteous service and for keeping our staff and volunteers well-fed."

Clinton's letter, which was dated May 20, is now framed and hanging in the pizzeria along with a picture she took with the staff.

A Clinton staffer told Business Insider the restaurant's offerings, which include more than standard pizzeria fare, have definitely become quite popular with the campaign team.

"The made-to-order salad and pasta stations are only topped by the chocolate chip cookies - a definite fan favorite," the staffer said.

Check out Clinton's letter to Monty Q's and her picture with the staff below.

Hillary Clinton Talks First Term To H'wood Donors At Tobey Maguire's House // Deadline // Dominic Patten – June 20, 2015

The former Secretary of State told a sold-out fundraiser of more than 200 Tinseltown supporters tonight that she isn't running for Bill Clinton or Barack Obama's third terms but her own first term. Hillary Clinton's remarks were made in the backyard of Tobey Maguire and his wife Jennifer Meyer's Brentwood home on Friday. Long time supporters Leonardo DiCaprio, Pitch Perfect 2 director and Hunger Games star Elizabeth Banks and Homeland EP Howard Gordon were among the well-heeled crowd nibbling on a low-key spread of hors d'oevres and sipping wine and soft drinks.

The once and potentially future White House resident also talked about growing the economy for the middle class and expanding opportunities for the LGBT community if she becomes America's first female Commander-in-Chief. The threat of ISIS, clean energy and reaching across the aisle to pass legislation with the likes of now GOP candidate Sen. Lindsey Graham were among the other topics Clinton touched on in what one attendee described as "a stump speech." In contrast to President Obama's remarks at his own set of DNC L.A. fundraisers on Thursday, Clinton did not mention the fatal shootings in Charleston, S.C. that occurred earlier this week.

Meyer, hostess and daughter of NBCUniversal Vice Chairman Ron Meyer, introduced Clinton on Friday night. Jennifer Meyer told the gathering about how the 42nd President of the United States told her in 2004 that no one in America was more qualified to be President than his wife. Expected to raise more than $500,000 for her 2016 Presidential bid, the 7 PM $2,700 a ticket event was Clinton's third fundraiser of the day. With a $1 million total haul, today's visit to the Hollywood ATM was the ex-New York Senator's second set of L.A. donorfests in less than 2 months.

Earlier Friday, Clinton was feted at another $2,700 per ticket fundraiser at the home of HBO's president of programming Michael Lombardo and his partner Sonny Ward. Before that 5 PM event, the candidate attended a donor lunch at the BevHills home of Westfield co-CEO Peter Lowy and his wife Janine. That event was also $2,700 a ticket, which is the maximum an individual can contribute during the primary season.

No word yet on when Hillary will be back in L.A. but, as with Obama this week, expect frequent fundraisers over the next year and a half and beyond if she wins. Also, other Democratic contenders like former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley are coming to town soon with cup in hand. Can Independent Sen. Bernie Sanders be far behind?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton Woos Young Hollywood Democrats at Fundraisers in L.A. // Hollywood Reporter // Tina Daunt – June 19, 2015

By the time Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton leaves Los Angeles Saturday, she hopes to have added well over $1 million to her campaign war chest and to have cemented her family's famous Hollywood ties to a new generation of entertainment industry donors.

The lynchpin of her two-day swing through Southern California is Friday evening's gathering at the home of Spider-Man star Tobey Maguire and his wife, Jennifer Meyer Maguire. All 250 places at that event are sold out at $2,700 apiece. Attendees are expected to include Leonardo DiCaprio, Elizabeth Banks, singer Sia Furler, ID PR founder Kelly Bush and an array of other "young" Hollywood types, one insider told The Hollywood Reporter. The event, which was organized by Greg Propper and Mark Daley of social advocacy firm Propper Daley, is slated to raise more than $500,000.

California, and Hollywood in particular, always have been Clinton country. When Bill Clinton first sought the Democratic presidential nomination, he raised funds and campaigned relentlessly in the state and ultimately defeated California's favorite son, the once and future governor Jerry Brown, in the primary. In 2008, Hillary Clinton bested Barack Obama in California's Democratic primary.

Friday's schedule demonstrated just how wide the Clinton's entertainment industry reach remains. Earlier in the day, she was the star attraction at a $2,700-per-person event hosted by Westfield Corp. co-CEO Peter Lowy and his wife, Janine. That was followed by a $2,700-per-person conversation with the former First Lady and Secretary of State at the home of HBO president of programming Michael Lombardo and his husband, Sonny Ward.

On Thursday, Clinton was in Newport Beach to scoop up presidential campaign cash. Supporters at Balboa Bay Club paid between $1,000 and $50,000 to mingle with the Democratic front runner.

Clinton will continue her California tour with a Saturday visit to San Francisco, where she'll address the U.S. Conference of Mayors.

Harassment Complaints Tripled at State Department Under Clinton, Kerry // Free Beacon // Joe Schoffstall – June 19, 2015

Harassment complaints nearly tripled at the State Department under the watch of Hillary Clinton and John Kerry, according to a State Department watchdog report released Thursday.

The Washington Times reports that harassment complaints hit 88 formal claims during Clinton's third year at State in 2011. This number jumped to 248 formal claims just three years later in 2014 with Kerry serving as secretary. Hundreds more informal harassment complaints were also filed during this time.

Last year, more than one-third, or 38 percent of complaints filed by employees, dealt with sex discrimination or reprisals. An additional 43 percent of complaints were made up of alleged harassment dealing with unfair hiring or promotions.

Despite the spike in harassment claims at the State Department, there is no mandatory training program in place dealing with the issue.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"A significant increase in reported harassment inquiries in the Department of State over the past few fiscal years supports the need for mandatory harassment training," the department's inspector general said.

Due to the department's non-existent mandatory harassment training programs, one of the biggest recommendations includes periodic training for every employee at the State Department.

"The Office of Civil Rights, in coordination with the Bureau of Human Resources and the Foreign Service Institute, should mandate periodic harassment training for all Department employees," the report stated.

Clinton to Fundraise at L.A. House of Tax Evading Clinton Foundation Donor // Free Beacon // Brent Scher – June 19, 2015

Hillary Clinton will attend a $2,700-a-plate luncheon on Friday at the Beverly Hills home of a man who was investigated by the Senate for hiding $68 million in assets in an offshore tax haven.

Peter Lowy, who was born in Australia but is a U.S. citizen, is chief executive officer of the Westfield Group, one of the world's largest owners of shopping malls. The company was founded by his father, Frank Lowy, and is controlled by the Lowy family.

The family came under fire in 2008 when a report from then-Sens. Carl Levin (D., Mich.) and Norm Coleman (R., Minn.) alleged that the Lowys were hiding $68 million in a Lichtenstein tax haven called the LGT Group.

The relationship between the Lowys and the LGT Group began in 1997 when the family started a Lichtenstein foundation worth $54 million. It grew to $68 million by 2001 when the foundation was dissolved.

The information came during an investigation by the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations into LGT Group and others that were being used as tax shelters.

"LGT was aware that Mr. Lowy and his sons were hiding assets in the new foundation," according to the report.

Lawyers for Lowy maintained that he did nothing against the law and that "businesses all over the world use a variety of tax structures to legitimately protect their assets." He said all the money was given to charity.

Lowy, however, refused to cooperate with the Senate investigation. He invoked his 5th Amendment right against self-incrimination during a hearing held by the committee.

"Senator, I'm sorry, I mean no disrespect. But on the advice of my counsel I assert my rights under the 5th Amendment of the United States Constitution not to answer any questions," said Lowy.

His lack of cooperation did not end there. Levin said the Lowy family refused to hand over documentation of the charitable donations to his subcommittee.

Lowy was also accused during the hearing by Coleman of taking "a red-eye flight to Australia" to avoid a subpoena.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

An investigation into the Lowy finances carried out by the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) led to further efforts in Bermuda to hide assets that should have been taxed by the United States.

The Friday fundraiser for Hillary Clinton is not the beginning of the Lowy relationship with the Clinton family. The earliest recorded instance came in 1995, when Bill Clinton's presidential campaign received donations from multiple Lowy family members.

Both Lowy and his wife Janine Lowy also made the maximum allowed contribution to Hillary Clinton's 2008 presidential campaign. They also both donated to Clinton's 2006 Senate campaign. The couple's political giving to federal candidates totals over $1 million and remains active.

Lowy has also given between $50,001 and $100,000 to the Clinton Foundation, and made donations as recently as last year. His company, the Westfield Corporation, has also made Clinton Foundation donations in the same range.

The Clinton campaign did not respond to a request for comment on the Friday event.

Hillary Clinton's 24-hour fundraising jaunt in Hollywood expected to net $1 million // Washington Times // Jennifer Harper – June 19, 2015

Hillary Clinton made her grand public debut before American voters only a week ago in New York City, then rushed off for some quick grassroots stops in Iowa and New Hampshire. And at week's end came the big stop in California, land of Hollywood fundraising. Mrs. Clinton is expected to do exceptionally well.

"By the time Democratic front-runner leaves Los Angeles Saturday, she hopes to have added well over $1 million to her campaign war chest and to have cemented her family's famous Hollywood ties to a new generation of entertainment industry donors," says The Hollywood Reporter, an industry source which tracks the stars and the business.

On Friday night, Mrs. Cinton appeared at the home of Tobey Maguire, he of "Spiderman" fame, for an elite gathering of 250 which included Leonardo DiCaprio, Elizabeth Banks, and singer Sia Furler. The event will raise $500,000.

Mrs. Clinton appeared in two more fundraisers in the Beverly Hills area and Newport Beach, bringing the total haul up to a cool $1 million, the Hollywood Reporter said, basing the figure on an unnamed source.

But wait, there's more. On Saturday, it's on to San Francisco for a fourth event - a swank brunch in the Mission District, with admission prices rising as high as $50,000. It is of note that President Obama was also on the West Coast at the same time - also raising money in Los Angeles and San Francisco, this primarily for the Democratic National Committee. Mr. Obama is scheduled to play golf in Palm Springs for the rest of the weekend - his fifth visit to the area's links in two years. This one came with a little local warning.

"President Barack Obama's weekend visit will close roads near the Palm Springs airport from Friday afternoon until Monday morning. According to a notice from Palm Springs police, both Kirk Douglas Way and Airport Center Drive will be closed from 1 p.m. Friday until 7 a.m. Monday," noted a terse dispatch form The Desert Sun, a local paper.

In the meantime, talk that Mrs. Clinton could raise $1 billion for her White House campaign may not be pure conjecture. When the weekend is over, she will have completed her 26th fundraiser for the year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton stressing support for immigration reform // AZ Central // Dan Nowicki – June 19, 2015

As the 2016 Republican presidential field toughens its tone on border security and enforcement, Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton has drawn a sharp distinction on immigration by embracing comprehensive reforms such as a pathway to citizenship for undocumented workers already in the United States.

Speaking Thursday before the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials, Clinton, a former secretary of State, reiterated promises she made during a May 5 roundtable in North Las Vegas.

That she would fight for comprehensive immigration reform that includes "a real path to citizenship" for the more than 11 million undocumented immigrants who have settled in the United States.

That she would oppose any move to deport the young immigrants known as "dreamers" or to undo President Barack Obama's executive actions that are shielding millions of immigrants from enforcement action.

And that if Congress continues to balk at acting on immigration reform, "as president I will do everything possible under the law to go even further than what President Obama has attempted to achieve," she said.

"There are so many people with deep ties and contributions to our communities, like many parents of dreamers, who deserve a chance to stay, and I will fight for them, too," Clinton said to applause from a standing-room-only crowd inside the Aria Resort & Casino. "But I don't have to wait to become president to take a stand, right here and right now, against divisive rhetoric that demonizes immigrants and their families. It's wrong and no one should stand for it."

The contrast between Clinton and the Republican White House prospects grew sharper this week with the entry into the race of celebrity real-estate developer Donald Trump, who announced his candidacy with a speech bashing Mexican immigrants as "rapists" and vowing to build a border wall at Mexico's expense.

"They're bringing drugs. They're bringing crime. They're rapists. And some, I assume, are good people," Trump said of immigrants from Mexico.

While Trump is viewed by many political handicappers as a novelty candidate, others said his anti-immigrant rant could tarnish the Republican brand with Latino voters, a fast-growing demographic that is increasingly influential in key swing states such as Nevada, Colorado, Florida, New Mexico and Virginia.

Despite warnings from national GOP leaders after the loss of 2012 nominee Mitt Romney to Obama, in which Romney was shellacked among Latino voters, most of the Republican presidential contenders continue to stake out hard-line positions on immigration and border security.

Trump's comments were a noisy distraction from the official entry into the race of former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, a more moderate GOP presidential candidate who supports immigration reform. But even Bush didn't appear inclined to take up the issue during his Monday announcement until he was interrupted by pro-citizenship hecklers.

"By the way, just so that our friends know, the next president of the United States will pass meaningful immigration reform so that that will be solved, not by executive order," Bush said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Later in the week, Bush called for immigration reform while campaigning in Iowa, which hosts the first presidential caucuses.

U.S. Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., another GOP 2016 candidate, also sparred this week with immigration activists who interrupted a speech he was giving in Washington, D.C.

Ben Carson, a conservative retired neurosurgeon seeking the Republican nomination, was the only GOP hopeful to make an appearance at the NALEO conference. His remarks on Wednesday largely avoided immigration and instead highlighted the economy and the need for global U.S. leadership. He did say national-security concerns dictate the need to seal the borders.

"What we should do, I believe, is provide them a way that they don't have to hide in the shadows," Carson said of the millions of undocumented immigrants already in the country. "Give them an opportunity to become guest workers. They have to register. They have to enroll in a back-tax program. And if they want to become citizens, they have to get in the line with everybody else and do what's necessary."

Clinton spent less than five minutes of her 30-minute speech to the NALEO conference focusing explicitly on immigration policy. She also discussed other issues that resonate with Latino voters, including early-childhood development, preschool, jobs, education and voting rights. She also addressed the mass shooting Wednesday in Charleston, S.C., which killed nine people at a historic Black church.

Clinton's efforts to secure the Latino vote are fueled, in part, by anxiety among some Democrats that Obama's winning coalition might not be as motivated to turn out to the polls if Obama is no longer on the ticket.

"Because this is what this community wants and needs to hear, it's what it's going to take to energize that community to actually show up in this election," said state Sen. Martin Quezada, D-Phoenix, who attended the NALEO conference. "If we don't, I think she's going to be in trouble. It's going to be a tough race anyway, so she needs this community to turn out next year and this is one way to really motivate them to do that."

One political scientist said that while the Republicans must finesse immigration-related issues so as not to alienate anti-"amnesty" conservatives who are influential in the GOP primary, Clinton's pro-reform stance appeals not only to Democratic primary voters but also to less partisan general-election voters.

Clinton so far has a few opponents in the Democratic race, including U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders, I-Vt., who is expected to address the NALEO conference on Friday.

"A Democrat on an issue like this can run for the broad center from the beginning and doesn't have to worry that she'll pay a big price for that in the primaries, whereas on the Republican side, even nominal immigration moderates like Jeb Bush have to say they're against the executive action," said Louis DeSipio, a professor of political science and Chicano/Latino studies at the University of California-Irvine.

Meanwhile, the Republican National Committee suggested Clinton's efforts to appeal to Latinos is merely cynical politics.

"Latinos deserve to know that Hillary Clinton is looking out for her own political ambition instead of their interests," Reince Priebus, the RNC chairman, said Thursday in a written statement. "As she has proven time and again, Hillary Clinton will say anything to get elected — making big promises she won't and can't keep, just like President Obama."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Still, Clinton's all-out endorsement of immigration reform so early in the presidential campaign has immigrant-rights activists applauding.

"I don't doubt whether she is deeply committed to it, but what I respect is that she understands the power of our movement, the importance of the Latino vote, and therefore she feels like it's in her interest to say what she's saying," said Frank Sharry, the executive director of America's Voice, a liberal national group that advocates for comprehensive immigration reform. "To me, it's a movement victory that she's saying what she's saying. And for me, it's slow-motion political suicide for the Republicans to be saying what they're saying, with a few notable exceptions."

Even so, Clinton's expansive pro-immigration agenda is a recent development for her and a sharp break from the policies of her husband, former President Bill Clinton, who served two terms in the White House from 1993 to 2001.

As a U.S. senator from New York, Clinton voted for the border-fence-authorizing Secure Fence Act of 2006, although she distanced herself from it as early as her 2008 presidential race. Also during the 2008 campaign, when she lost the Democratic nomination to Obama, Clinton came out against issuing driver's licenses to undocumented immigrants, a position she reversed this year.

"Hillary seemed tone-deaf and rusty when she was on her book tour (for her 2014 memoir 'Hard Choices') and she was asked a couple of questions about immigration, and both times she fumbled it," Sharry said. "But now, as a candidate, she has really leaned into it, taken ownership of the issue and made it clear that she's going to draw sharp distinctions with whoever the Republican nominee is, including if it's Jeb Bush."

Her husband's legacy could follow her as the campaign rolls on.

Bill Hing, a University of San Francisco law professor and immigration-policy expert, said that from the standpoint of immigrant-rights advocates, Bill Clinton "has one of the worst immigration records" of any president in modern history.

Under his administration, the United States started the "big militarization of the border" through Operation Gatekeeper, which was aimed at stopping illegal immigration along the U.S.-Mexico border south of San Diego by deploying more Border Patrol agents, and installing fencing, ground sensors, lights and other technology, Hing said.

Clinton also signed the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, a sweeping bill passed by the Republican-controlled Congress that was aimed at cracking down on undocumented immigrants through a wide range of punishments. Those included barring undocumented immigrants from returning to the United States for up to 10 years, and expanding the list of crimes for which legal immigrants could be stripped of their status and deported.

However, Hing doubts Bill Clinton's old positions on border security and immigration enforcement will hurt Hillary Clinton with Latinos.

"Latino voters are giving her a pass because the Republicans have been so intransigent on immigration reform," Hing said, pointing out that in recent years conservative Republicans have consistently foiled attempts by moderate Republicans and Democrats to pass immigration reform.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Doris Meissner, former commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization System during the Clinton administration, said it's unfair to tie Bill Clinton's record to Hillary Clinton.

The border-security and immigration-enforcement measures launched under Bill Clinton's administration were badly needed, Meissner said. But what distinguishes Hillary Clinton from her Republican rivals is that she believes it is time to move beyond border security and immigration enforcement, she said.

"She's talking about now what needs to be done in addition and that is very different from what all the Republicans are saying," Meissner said. "They are just saying more of the same and they are in a time warp. ... We just don't have the same issues at the border."

Where Does Clinton Foundation Money Go? // FactCheck.Org // Robert Farley – June 19, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Carly Fiorina says that “so little” of the charitable donations to the Clinton Foundation “actually go to charitable works” — a figure CARLY for America later put at about 6 percent of its annual revenues — but Fiorina is simply wrong.

Fiorina and others are referring only to the amount donated by the Clinton Foundation to outside charities, ignoring the fact that most of the Clinton Foundation’s charitable work is performed in-house. One independent philanthropy watchdog did an analysis of Clinton Foundation funding and concluded that about 89 percent of its funding went to charity.

Simply put, despite its name, the Clinton Foundation is not a private foundation — which typically acts as a pass-through for private donations to other charitable organizations. Rather, it is a public charity. It conducts most of its charitable activities directly.

Fiorina Attacks

Fiorina has been shadowing Hillary Clinton on the campaign trail in order to contrast herself with her Democratic rival. In a Fox News interview, Fiorina was asked about a New York Times story about Sen. Marco Rubio’s finances, and Fiorina responded that she wished the New York Times would do more to investigate the Clintons’ finances, and particularly “what they’ve been doing with their donors’ money to the Clinton Global Initiative.”

Fiorina, June 10: I mean, honestly, the question, I think, now for the Clintons is, ‘What else don’t we know? What don’t we know about your donors? What don’t we know about the conflicts of interest that those donors represent when Mrs. Clinton is serving as Secretary of State?’ We are now finding out that so little of those charitable donations actually go to charitable works.

Asked for backup, the CARLY for America super PAC noted that the Clinton Foundation’s latest IRS Form 990 shows total revenue of nearly $149 million in 2013, and total charitable grant disbursements of nearly $9 million (see page 10). That comes to roughly 6 percent of the budget going to grants. And besides those grants, the super PAC said, “there really isn’t anything that can be categorized as charitable.”

That just isn’t so. The Clinton Foundation does most of its charitable work itself.

Katherina Rosqueta, the founding executive director of the Center for High Impact Philanthropy at the University of Pennsylvania, described the Clinton Foundation as an “operating foundation.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“There is an important distinction between an operating foundation vs. a non-operating foundation,” Rosqueta told us via email. “An operating foundation implements programs so money it raises is not designed to be used exclusively for grant-making purposes. When most people hear ‘foundation’, they think exclusively of a grant-making entity. In either case, the key is to understand how well the foundation uses money — whether to implement programs or to grant out to nonprofits — [to achieve] the intended social impact (e.g., improving education, creating livelihoods, improving health, etc.).”

Craig Minassian, chief communications officer for the Clinton Foundation, said the Clinton Foundation is “an implementer.”

“We operate programs on the ground, around the world, that are making a difference on issues ranging from poverty and global health to climate change and women’s and girls’ participation,” Minassian told us via email. “Many large foundations actually provide grants to the Clinton Foundation so that our staff can implement the work.”

Asked for some examples of the work it performs itself, the Clinton Foundation listed these:

Clinton Development Initiative staff in Africa train rural farmers and help them get access to seeds, equipment and markets for their crops.

Clinton Climate Initiative staff help governments in Africa and the Caribbean region with reforestation efforts, and in island nations to help develop renewable energy projects.

Staff at the Clinton Health Access Initiative, an independent, affiliated entity, work in dozens of nations to lower the cost of HIV/AIDS medicine, scale up pediatric AIDS treatment and promote treatment of diarrhea through life-saving Zinc/ORS treatment.

Clinton Health Matters staff work with local governments and businesses in the United States to develop wellness and physical activity plans.

To bolster its case, CARLY for America noted that the Clinton Foundation spent 12 percent of its revenue on travel and conferences and 20 percent of its revenue on salaries. That’s true. But the Form 990 specifically breaks out those travel, conference and salary expenses that are used for “program service expenses” versus those that are used for management or fundraising purposes.

For example, nearly 77 percent of the $8.4 million spent on travel in 2013 went toward program services; 3.4 percent went to “management and general expenses”; and about 20 percent went to fundraising.

As for conferences, nearly 98 percent of money spent was tabbed as a programming expense. And when it comes to salaries — which includes pension plan contributions, benefits and payroll taxes — about 73 percent went to program service expenses.

“I am not the expert on what portion of the Clinton Foundation activities are truly charitable,” Vince Stehle, executive director of Media Impact Funders and a board member of the Center for Effective Philanthropy told us via email. “But I can say that it is not appropriate to simply calculate that based on what portion goes out in grants. Certainly all types of foundations are able to engage in direct charitable activities in any event. But as I understand it, the Clinton Foundation is a public charity, despite the name. Many charities call themselves foundations, which can be confusing, as they might seem like private foundations.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The organization carries out programs,” Stehle said. “I am not intimately familiar with those programs, but assuming they are genuine, those would be considered charitable activities.”

Charity Evaluators

Fiorina isn’t the only one making this charge about the Clinton Foundation. Fox Business Network’s Gerri Willis, for example, also claimed only 6 percent of the Clinton Foundation’s 2013 revenue “went to help people.” Willis claimed that charity experts have looked into whether the Clinton Foundation “wisely spen(t) charitable dollars” and weighed in with a “resounding no.”

“Charity Navigator … [has] placed the Clinton Foundation on a watch list,” Willis said. “They think there are problems with this nonprofit. They don’t like the way it runs itself. They say the money is not spent wisely.”

She said Charity Navigator concluded the Clinton Foundation “does not meet their criteria as an organization that does charitable work.”

But that’s not what Charity Navigator said.

Here’s what the Charity Navigator site actually states:

Charity Navigator: We had previously evaluated this organization, but have since determined that this charity’s atypical business model can not be accurately captured in our current rating methodology. Our removal of The Clinton Foundation from our site is neither a condemnation nor an endorsement of this charity. We reserve the right to reinstate a rating for The Clinton Foundation as soon as we identify a rating methodology that appropriately captures its business model.

What does it mean that this organization isn’t rated?

It simply means that the organization doesn’t meet our criteria. A lack of a rating does not indicate a positive or negative assessment by Charity Navigator.

We spoke by phone with Sandra Minuitti at Charity Navigator, and she told us Charity Navigator decided not to rate the Clinton Foundation because the foundation spun off some entities (chiefly the Health Access Initiative) and then later brought some, like the Clinton Global Initiative, back into the fold. Charity Navigator looks at a charity’s performance over time, she said, and those spin-offs could result in a skewed picture using its analysis model. If the foundation maintains its current structure for several years, she said, Charity Navigator will be able to rate it again.

The decision to withhold a rating had nothing to do with concerns about the Clinton Foundation’s charitable work. Further, Minuitti said citing only the 6 percent of the budget spent on grants as the sum total spent on charity by the foundation — as Willis and Fiorina did — is inaccurate.

She referred us to page 10 of the 2013 990 form for the Clinton Foundation. When considering the amount spent on “charitable work,” she said, one would look not just at the amount in grants given to other charities, but all of the expenses in Column B for program services. That comes to 80.6 percent of spending. (The higher 89 percent figure we cited earlier comes from a CharityWatch analysis of the Clinton Foundation and its affiliates.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“That’s the standard way” to measure a charity’s performance, Minuitti said. “You have to look at the entirety of that column.”

Minuitti said it is also inaccurate to assume all money spent on travel and salaries does not go toward charity. Depending on the nature of the charity, she said, travel and salary could certainly be considered expenses related to charity.

It’s true, as Willis said, that Charity Navigator put the Clinton Foundation on its “watch list,” but not because of concerns about insufficient funds going toward charity. Mainly, it was put on the watch list due to questions raised in the media about foreign donations to the foundation and the potential for quid pro quo when Hillary Clinton was secretary of state. The site also linked to a story about the abrupt resignation earlier this year of the foundation’s CEO. (Go here to see a full list of articles that led to the decision by Charity Navigator to place the foundation on its watch list.)

According to the Charity Navigator site, it “takes no position” on the allegations raised in the media reports, nor does it “seek to confirm or verify the accuracy of allegations made or the merits of issues raised.” Minuitti said the watch list was more like “news to know” for potential donors.

None of the articles cited by Charity Navigator has anything to do with a low percentage of funding going to charitable work.

Another philanthropy watchdog, CharityWatch, a project of the American Institute of Philanthropy, gave the Clinton Foundation an “A” rating.

Daniel Borochoff, president and founder of CharityWatch, told us by phone that its analysis of the finances of the Clinton Foundation and its affiliates found that about 89 percent of the foundation budget is spent on programming (or “charity”), higher than the 75 percent considered the industry standard.

By only looking at the amount the Clinton Foundation doled out in grants, Fiorina “is showing her lack of understanding of charitable organizations,” Borochoff said. “She’s thinking of the Clinton Foundation as a private foundation.” Those kinds of foundations are typically supported by money from a few people, and the money is then distributed to various charities. The Clinton Foundation, however, is a public charity, he said. It mostly does its own charitable work. It has over 2,000 employees worldwide.

“What she’s doing is looking at how many grants they write to other groups,” Borochoff said. “If you are going to look at it that way, you may as well criticize every other operating charity on the planet.”

In order to get a fuller picture of the Clinton Foundation’s operations, he said, people need to look at the foundation’s consolidated audit, which includes the financial data on separate affiliates like the Clinton Health Access Initiative.

“Otherwise,” he said, “you are looking at just a piece of the pie.”

Considering all of the organizations affiliated with the Clinton Foundation, he said, CharityWatch concluded about 89 percent of its budget is spent on programs. That’s the amount it spent on charity in 2013, he said.

We looked at the consolidated financial statements (see page 4) and calculated that in 2013, 88.3 percent of spending was designated as going toward program services — $196.6 million out of $222.6 million in reported expenses.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We can't vouch for the effectiveness of the programming expenses listed in the report, but it is clear that the claim that the Clinton Foundation only steers 6 percent of its donations to charity is wrong, and amounts to a misunderstanding of how public charities work.

A note from Jorge Ramos // Fusion // Jorge Ramos – June 19, 2015

As journalists the most important thing we have is our credibility and integrity. We maintain that, in part, through transparency with our audience, our colleagues and our critics. That is why I am disclosing that my daughter, Paola, has accepted a position working with Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign.

As a father, I am very proud that she has decided to actively participate in our democratic process. I hope that more young people get involved, regardless of political parties or ideological preferences. Our democracy and our future depend on that.

I completely support and respect Paola's decision. In our family we have always cherished tolerance, dialogue and active participation in what you believe.

Like many reporters who have parents, siblings or other family members that are active in politics, this will not change how I approach my duty as a journalist. I will continue to report with complete independence and ask the tough questions, the same way I have done for the last 30 years.

Judicial Watch Statement in Reponse to Federal Court Reopening Lawsuit Seeking Information on Top Clinton Aide Huma Abedin // Digital Journal // June 19, 2015

Judicial Watch President Tom Fitton made the following statement regarding today's decision by U.S. District Court Judge Emmet G. Sullivan to reopen a Judicial Watch Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) lawsuit that sought records about Huma Abedin, the former deputy chief of staff to Secretary of State Hillary Clinton (Judicial Watch v. U.S. Department of State (No. 1:13-cv-01363)).

Hillary Clinton's massive email cover-up is unraveling. We welcome Judge Sullivan's decision to reopen this lawsuit. Hillary Clinton and the Obama administration concealed records and lied to obstruct federal courts and Judicial Watch from finding out about the secret emails.

The court battle to get to the truth about Huma Abedin's "special government employee" (SGE) privileges at State is underway. The reopening of this case brings Judicial Watch one step closer to forcing the State Department to ensure that the government records in Hillary Clinton's "secret" email system are properly preserved, protected and recovered as federal law requires. Ms. Abedin is part of the Clinton cash raising operation and was even involved in the Benghazi scandal, so this lawsuit could not be more timely.

This is the second Judicial Watch FOIA lawsuit that has been reopened because of Hillary Clinton's hidden email records. Judicial Watch is aware of no prior instances of Freedom of Information lawsuits being reopened by federal courts.

Judge Sullivan ruled that the "changed circumstances" of the discovery that Hillary Clinton and members of her State Department staff used secret email accounts to conduct government business warranted "reopening" the lawsuit.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In asking Judge Sullivan to reopen the lawsuit, Judicial Watch cited a federal court rule (Rule 60(b)(3)) that allows a party to reopen a case due to "fraud (whether previously called intrinsic or extrinsic), misrepresentation, or misconduct by an opposing party:"

The State Department had an obligation under the Federal Records Act to properly preserve, maintain, and make available for retrieval records of its official functions. In fact, it is the obligation of the head of every federal agency to do so. Secretary Clinton plainly violated her own legal obligations. Doing so was misconduct.

The State Department originally agreed with Judicial Watch's request but later changed its mind and asked the court to reopen the lawsuit because of "newly discovered evidence." In today's ruling, Judge Sullivan simply reopened the case, rather than "spilling ink" on whether Hillary Clinton and the State Department committed fraud, misrepresentation or misconduct.

Huma Abedin left the State Department in February 2013, and in May 2013, Politico reported that, since June 2012, she had been double-dipping, working as a consultant to outside clients while continuing as a top adviser at State. Abedin's outside clients included Teneo, a strategic consulting firm co-founded by former Bill Clinton counselor Doug Band. According to Fox News, Abedin earned $355,000 as a consultant to Teneo, in addition to her $135,000 SGE compensation.

Teneo describes its activities as providing "the leaders of the world's most respected companies, nonprofit institutions and governments with a full suite of advisory solutions." [Emphasis added] Outside of the U.S., it maintains offices in Dubai, London, Dublin, Hong Kong, Brussels, Washington, and Beijing. Teneo was also the subject of various investigative reports, including by the New York Times, which raise questions about its relationship with the Clinton Foundation.

In February 2014, the State Department assured Judicial Watch that it had searched the Office of the Executive Secretary, which would have included the offices of the Secretary of State and top staff. Relying upon the State Department's misrepresentation that the agency conducted a reasonable search, Judicial Watch agreed to dismiss its lawsuit on March 14, 2014.

I'm A Republican Woman & I'm Voting For Hillary // Refinery 29 // Asma Hasan – June 19, 2015

Since I was 18 years old, Hillary Clinton has punctuated my life. As I grew up, she's been a compass for me — a woman I looked to as a model of female leadership and strength. I often listen to my inner Hillary Clinton as she urges me, in a gracious but all-knowing tone, to be a strong woman who picks her fights wisely.

That's why I hope to vote for her for president — even though I'm a lifelong Republican.

I started at Wellesley College in the fall of 1993 — the same year Clinton, our most famous graduate, became First Lady. My fellow first-years and I (at Wellesley, we do not call them "freshmen") watched her be vilified in the press — for working, for playing too large a role, just for being. Dozens of major magazine articles that first year compared her to Lady MacBeth (who, as you'll remember, nagged her husband until he killed himself).

But, in a way, that vilification was a great gift to us. Everyone goes off to college thinking they will change the world, but my classmates and I may have felt it more than most — a real sense we'd make a contribution on our own terms. If people criticized us in the process, like they did Hillary, that criticism became a badge of honor. Criticism, it seemed, was a sign of success, not its antithesis.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Watching Hillary, I also learned how important it is to support your fellow women, even if you disagree with them. Too many men, then and now, would rather stick together than promote a woman.

It was in college that I learned from my advisor (incidentally, he was also Hillary's advisor) never to apologize for being "bossy." I learned not to turn down more work or a new experience because, if I did, there would be a man who would take it for himself, even if he was less qualified than I. To be a woman growing into herself, in the time of Hillary, has been a powerful experience — one that probably would have been very different if Hillary had never existed.

I was still an undergrad when Hillary gave her amazing speech at the U.N. Conference on Women, where she stated the (obvious, but until then unrecognized) aphorism that women's rights are human rights, and human rights are women's rights. It was such a simple sentiment, it may have changed the world.

Now, 20 years later, I've graduated, set up a law practice, and settled into a more conservative set of political views. And yes, through that lens, the past decades of Hillary Clinton's public life give me doubt.

I questioned how, as Hillary's husband was leaving the Oval Office, she carefully selected a state in which to run for Senate. I felt like she was a reverse carpetbagger — a woman born in Illinois, first lady of Arkansas, then of Washington, cherry-picking New York simply because it was a northern state she had the best chance of winning. This reeked of the elitist privilege that I, as a feminist, seek to untangle.

During the 2008 election primaries, I was irritated at some of Hillary's backhanded insults against Obama, her sly allusions to racism and Islamophobia. And yes, more recently, I was shocked to learn that she had both maintained her own email server as Secretary of State and also deleted what are essentially government records. We're both attorneys, and if there's one thing a lawyer knows, it's the importance of document retention. Why then, would she do something so bizarre if she didn't have something to hide? It seems sloppy at best and incriminating at worst.

While I try not to wonder why she stayed with Bill despite his obvious chicanery (since it's impossible to know what goes on in someone else's marriage), I do wish she'd address the issue in an honest way. If only to clearly establish there is a real love there that stretches beyond his misdeeds — not just the mere opportunism from being part of a political power couple.

Are these foibles, gaffes, and, perhaps illegalities enough for me to say I can't vote for her? While I would love to be an idealist, no, they're not.

It's too important to have a woman president.

Haven't men done these sorts of things for centuries? Made decisions for women and the populace at large from smoky back rooms? Promoted their fellow undeserving men over hard-working women? Stolen or destroyed records? Fixed elections (all over the world)? How can I be a feminist who stands for the improvement and promotion of women and not support Hillary's machinations? Isn't this what it will take to accomplish some measure of female success in what is still a male-dominated society?

I'd put my chips on Hillary as the woman who could shut down the roadblocks, whether via a more gracious approach or by simply dismissing them as she did in her GIF-worthy Benghazi testimony. Watching her sit in front of a panel of mostly men as they tried, time after time, to latch onto her, was inspiring. She was masterful in her bottled disdain, and many of us — Republican me included — could identify.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Strange as it may seem, I'm still a Republican. The GOP is in accord with my feminist spirit — believing in individualism, judging one on one's own merits, and not feeding my hard-won gains back into a system that benefits mainly men. I know this line of argument, culminating in a vote for HRC, won't win me any arguments among Republicans, but I don't need to. Other groups can speak up for themselves, and we can see where we all end up.

These Women Probably Don't Fit the Bill: Fans Suggest Hillary, Beyoncé and Taylor for #TheNew10 // People // Tierney Mcafee – June 19, 2015

Hillary Clinton might become the first woman president in U.S. history, but she probably won't become the first woman to appear on a U.S. bank note in more than a century.

Ever since the U.S. Treasury Department announced Wednesday that a woman will grace the face of the new $10 note in 2020, fans have been taking to Twitter to suggest candidates who fit the bill.

The last woman to be featured on U.S. paper currency was Martha Washington, who was on the $1 Silver Certificate between 1891 and 1896.

Now historical figures including Harriet Tubman, Eleanor Roosevelt and Rosa Parks have become frontrunners for #TheNew10 on social media and in a poll conducted by the group Women on 20s. But it seems that for every Harriet vote, there's a Hillary vote; for every Parks, a Beyoncé; for every Roosevelt, a Taylor Swift.

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

DECLARED

O'MALLEY

An Angry O'Malley Calls for an Assault Weapons Ban // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 19, 2015

Using an off-color word to describe his anger, Martin O'Malley, a Democratic candidate for president, called for a new national assault weapons ban and other gun control measures in an email sent to supporters after the shooting deaths at a South Carolina church this week.

Mr. O'Malley is the only candidate so far to call for reinstating the assault weapons ban, a politically charged topic.

Mr. O'Malley repeatedly used a word that is sometimes invoked to accentuate anger, and appeared to take an oblique swipe at his leading party rival, Hillary Rodham Clinton. Instead of "jumping to act," he said, people are choosing to "sit back and wait for the appropriate moment to say what we're all thinking: that this is not the America we want to be living in."

He chastised Congress for failing to pass stronger gun control laws in early 2013 after the deaths of nearly two dozen children at a school Newtown, Conn., and highlighted his record as the governor of Maryland passing laws "that banned high-magazine weapons, increased licensing standards and required fingerprinting for handgun purchasers."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It’s time we called this what it is: a national crisis,” he wrote in his email. “I proudly hold an ‘F’ rating from the N.R.A., and when I worked to pass gun control in Maryland, the N.R.A. threatened me with legal action, but I never backed down.”

The gun control bill that died in Congress more than two years ago was a blow to President Obama, and began a longer-term drop in his popularity.

Martin O’Malley: ‘I’m pissed’ at lack of action on gun control // WaPo // John Wagner – June 19, 2015

Democratic presidential hopeful Martin O'Malley sent a tartly worded e-mail to supporters Friday saying he is "pissed" by congressional inaction on gun control and asking them to stand with him in an effort to toughen laws after this week's massacre at a Charleston, S.C., church.

"It's time we called this what it is: a national crisis," O'Malley said in the e-mail, which carried the subject header "I'm pissed" and included links to a Web page to provide contact information to his campaign. He used the word "pissed" four more times in the e-mail.

O'Malley's choice of words -- more common among teenagers than presidential candidates -- seemed a gambit to attract attention to a campaign mired in the low single digits in early-state polls. But a spokeswoman said the tone was a true reflection of how the former Maryland governor, who has used salty language on other recent occasions, feels about the issue.

In the e-mail, O'Malley pointed to his record as governor, which included passage in 2013 of a wide-ranging gun-safety bill. On the national level, he is calling for an assault weapons ban, stricter background checks and efforts to prevent "straw purchases" of guns, such as fingerprinting requirements, which Maryland implemented.

O'Malley's proposals are more specific than anything his Democratic rivals, including former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton and Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), have suggested in recent days. In the past, Clinton has supported banning assault weapons and other measures favored by gun-control advocates. Sanders has a mixed record that includes voting against the landmark Brady bill that required background checks and a waiting period before buying a firearm.

"I'm pissed that after working hard in the state of Maryland to pass real gun control — laws that banned high-magazine weapons, increased licensing standards, and required fingerprinting for handgun purchasers — Congress continues to drop the ball," O'Malley wrote.

He also knocked Republicans running for president, saying none of them have been "even close to being right on this issue."

O'Malley's e-mail followed an appearance earlier Friday on MSNBC's "Morning Joe," in which he said -- in less colorful terms -- that the shootings this week should be a call to action on gun control and mental health issues.

In late April, O'Malley raised eyebrows when during an interview on National Public Radio, he referred to a Republican economic argument as "patently bulls---." Afterward, he sent an email to supporters with the subject header, "Yeah, I said it." O'Malley used the same epithet in a conversation with reporters during a recent trip to the early nominating state of New Hampshire.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Martin O'Malley not worried about retribution for Hillary Clinton attacks // Politico // Nick Gass – June 19, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley says he is not worried about retribution from fellow Democrats in going after Hillary Clinton.

"No, I do not," the former Maryland governor said Friday in response to a question on MSNBC's "Morning Joe" pertaining to Wall Street Journal columnist Peggy Noonan's latest column.

"The Democrats have an enforcement mechanism to keep all their candidates in line. Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley know without being told that the party will kill them if they tear apart the assumed nominee," she wrote in the op-ed published Thursday. "Their careers will be over if they go at her personally."

O'Malley's reply: "Well my career ended when I was elevated to the rank of citizen about three months ago, so I don't have a career to kill. He added, "I'm the only candidate in this race with 15 years of executive experience as the mayor of a very great but a very challenged city and as a governor."

O'Malley's Two-Word Response to Charleston Shooting: 'I'm Pissed' // Bloomberg // Sydney McNeal – June 19, 2015

In the aftermath of Thursday's shooting in Charleston, everyone from President Obama to those campaigning to succeed him expressed shock, sorrow, and frustration about the tragedy, and also the government's inability to end gun violence.

On Friday, Martin O'Malley, who is trailing Hillary Clinton and Senator Bernie Sanders in the race for the Democratic nomination, went even further in an impassioned e-mail to supporters with the subject line, "I'm pissed."

I'm pissed that we're actually asking ourselves the horrific question of, what will it take? How many senseless acts of violence in our streets or tragedies in our communities will it take to get our nation to stop caving to special interests like the NRA when people are dying?

I'm pissed that after working hard in the state of Maryland to pass real gun control—laws that banned high-magazine weapons, increased licensing standards, and required fingerprinting for handgun purchasers—Congress continues to drop the ball.

He did not mention the nine victims, their families, or the African Methodist Episcopal church community in the message, though he did express condolences on Twitter on Thursday.

As governor of Maryland, he passed legislation that banned assault weapons and high-capacity magazines, toughening some of the most restrictive gun laws in the nation.

O'Malley: 'I'm pissed' about gun climate // CNN // Theodore Schleifer – June 19, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley is "pissed" about the nation's unwillingness to pass gun control, he told supporters in an email Friday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley, who is looking to galvanize the left in order to mount a credible primary challenge to frontrunner Hillary Clinton, looked to build his email list with an "I'm pissed" subject line and boasted about his poor grades from the gun-rights lobby.

"I proudly hold an F rating from the (National Rifle Association), and when I worked to pass gun control in Maryland, the NRA threatened me with legal action, but I never backed down," O'Malley said in the email. "What we did in Maryland should be the first step of what we do as a nation."

The former Maryland governor called for a national assault weapons ban, stricter background checks and fingerprint requirements that could reduce straw-buying.

After the Sandy Hook elementary school shooting in Newtown, Connecticut in late 2012, President Barack Obama spent the first months of his second term pushing for a package of gun-control legislation, but Republicans, backed by the NRA, successfully thwarted those bills on Capitol Hill. Few Democrats or gun-control advocates are hopeful that much will change after a white gunman killed nine black churchgoers in Charleston, South Carolina this week.

"I'm pissed that we're actually asking ourselves the horrific question of, what will it take? How many senseless acts of violence in our streets or tragedies in our communities will it take to get our nation to stop caving to special interests like the NRA when people are dying?" O'Malley asked supporters.

Martin O'Malley is 'Pissed About Gun Control // TIME // Sam Frizell – June 19, 2015

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley told supporters in the wake of this week's South Carolina shooting that he's "pissed" Congress is not passing more stringent gun control measures.

"I'm pissed that after an unthinkable tragedy like the one in South Carolina yesterday, instead of jumping to act, we sit back and wait for the appropriate moment to say what we're all thinking: that this is not the America we want to be living in," the Democratic presidential candidate said in an email.

Nine people were shot dead in a historically black church in Charleston on Wednesday. A 21-year-old white man, Dylann Roof, has been charged for the crime.

O'Malley passed broad gun control measures as governor that included banning weapons, limiting handgun magazines to 10 rounds, and requiring gun owners to provide their fingerprints as part of their weapons licenses.

The presidential candidate is now advocating nationally for a national assault weapons ban, stricter background checks, and fingerprint requirements. "I proudly hold an F rating from the NRA," O'Malley said.

Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton on Thursday also called for new actions to curb gun violence. "How many people do we need to see cut down before we act?" she said, but didn't lay out specific proposals.

On Friday morning, O'Malley spoke on MSNBC's Morning Joe program and advocated coupling mental health programs with stricter gun control.

O'Malley says he won't be deterred from criticizing Clinton // Baltimore Sun // Michael Dresser – June 19, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former Gov. Martin O"Malley said Friday that he won't be deterred from vigorously criticizing front-runner Hillary Clinton in his race for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination.

O'Malley, appearing on MSNBC's Morning Joe program, told co-host Mika Brzezinski that he isn't concerned about damage to his career or retaliation by party leaders if he criticizes Clinton too harshly.

"My career ended when I was elevated to the rank of citizen about three months ago," he said." I don't have a career to kill."

O'Malley, who actually left office five months ago, was responding to a question about former White House speech writer Peggy Noonan's contention in the Wall Street Journal that Clinton's Democratic challengers were pulling their punches in their campaigns because of a concern they could become pariahs in their party if they go after the presumptive nominee on a personal level or criticize her ethical practices.

Noonan, who worked for President Ronald Reagan, predicted Clinton would "glide" to the nomination "dinged but not damaged."

O'Malley said he was encouraged by a poll showing that 59 percent of New Hampshire Democrats want to have an alternative to Clinton in the nation's first primary.

While the former Maryland governor said he would have no compunction about attacking Clinton, he did not level personal criticism of her Friday. His most pointed remark came as he sought to contrast his position with Clinton's on President Obama's proposed Asian trade deal, which the former secretary of state recently criticized.

"I was opposed to it not after it failed but before it," O'Malley said.

In the wake of the slaying of nine people at a Charleston, S.C., church Wednesday, MSNBC's Joe Scarborough asked O'Malley about how to prevent such incidents. Scarborough said the law O'Malley pushed through the Maryland General Assembly after the Newtown, Conn., school massacre would not have prevented the accused Charleston shooter from obtaining his gun, reportedly a gift from his father.

O'Malley said the nation's laws must deal with both gun control and mental health, adding that the Maryland law he signed addressed both issues.

"It's a matter of doing both, and not either/or," he said.

O'Mallley said the "vast majority" of Americans would favor background checks for handgun purchasers. But the former governor acknowledged the difficulty of preventing such shootings.

"How do you make sense of giving a gun to a troubled young man?" he said.

The former governor followed up his TV appearance with an email from his campaign with the subject line "I'm pissed." In it, he wrote about the the things that anger him about the Charleston shooting and pointed to his record of support for gun control.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I'm pissed that after working hard in the state of Maryland to pass real gun control -- laws that banned high-magazine weapons, increased licensing standards, and required fingerprinting for handgun purchasers — Congress continues to drop the ball," he said.

O'Malley spelled out steps he would support as president: a national assault rifle ban, stricter background checks and a fingerprinting requirement for gun purchases -- all provisions of the Maryland law.

He said it was time for the United State to stop "caving" to the National Rifle Association.

Asked on MSNBC about the racial aspect of the Charleston shootings, in which the victims were black and the accused killer is white, O'Malley said the nation has to face up to its history.

"We do it by acknowledging the racial legacy we share as Americans," he said.

O'Malley, who has been working to differentiate himself from Clinton as she has moved to the left, cast himself as a critic of the financial industry, with which Bill and Hillary Clinton have had close ties.

"Wealth and power has become very, very concentrated in our country,' he said, adding that Americans are looking for "new leadership."

Martin O'Malley Launches Major Post-Charleston Gun Control Push With "I'm Pissed" // Buzzfeed // Evan McMorris-Santoro – June 19, 2015

Martin O'Malley launched a major push for gun control tied to the Charleston shooting Friday, his campaign's latest attempt to use his record as Maryland governor to drive up support for his presidential campaign.

In what has become a trademark for O'Malley, he announced his new gun control focus in a brusque manner. "I'm pissed," reads the subject line from a gun-control focused email O'Malley's campaign sent to supporters Friday. (O'Malley sent a similar list-building email after he called Republican economic plans "bullshit" on NPR in April.)

"I'm pissed" comes with a series of policy prescriptions O'Malley promises to make a centerpiece of his campaign moving forward. The plan is modeled on policies O'Malley signed into law as Maryland governor that drew the ire of the NRA and its allies and praise from gun control supporters. O'Malley is proposing a national assault-weapons ban, tightening background checks, and efforts to end so-called "straw purchasing," where firearms will be purchased legally on behalf of someone unable to legally purchase them.

O'Malley's gun policy agenda is similar to ones Democrats and President Obama hoped to pass after the 2012 elementary school shooting in Newtown, Connecticut. In the presidential field, it puts him in a more unique position: Bernie Sanders, the senator from Vermont and according to polling second place candidate in the Democratic nomination race, voted for an assault-weapons ban and expanded background checks in 2013, but has not expressly called for a ban since announcing his presidential candidacy.

Gun-rights advocates ultimately defeated the 2013 effort, leaving Obama, he said Thursday in his remarks after Charleston, with little recourse policy-wise.

The former Maryland governor appeared to take issue with Obama's read on the situation in D.C. — namely, that nothing can be done about new gun laws while Congress is divided the way it is — on MSNBC's "Morning Joe" Friday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I think you have to advocate for it in Congress,” O’Malley said. “I think when incidents like this happen, we shouldn’t say, ‘well, it’s just America. That’s just the way it is.’”

Hillary Clinton, the former secretary of state and Democratic frontrunner, spoke about Charleston Thursday but did not issue support for an assault-weapons ban or other specific policy proposals.

O’Malley’s running towards his gun-control record in his new presidential campaign push. His email to supporters boasts about his “F rating from the NRA.” A senior O’Malley aide told BuzzFeed News the supporter email was “the beginning of what will be a major push” and said voters “will be hearing a lot more from him on this.”

The former mayor of Baltimore will find a friendly audience for a gun-control message when O’Malley addresses the U.S. Conference of Mayors Sunday, his next scheduled public appearance. Mayors have often been among the most vocal proponents of gun-control legislation, and have stepped up their calls for it after mass shootings in the past.

SANDERS

Bernie Sanders hits the Las Vegas strip, takes aim at billionaire Sheldon Adelson // WaPo // Philip Rucker – June 19, 2015

Directly across the Las Vegas Strip from the Venetian, the lavish hotel and casino built by wealthy political donor Sheldon Adelson, Democratic presidential candidate Sen. Bernie Sanders rallied more than 700 supporters here Friday to join his revolution against the billionaire class whose greed he says is crushing the United States.

“Today we live in the wealthiest nation in the history of the world, but the vast majority of the American people do not know that, do not feel that, because almost all of that wealth today rests in the hands of a tiny few," Sanders said. "What we are saying to the billionaire class is, 'Your greed, which is destroying this country, has got to end.'"

Sanders, an independent senator from Vermont who describes himself as a socialist but caucuses with Democrats, took direct aim at Adelson, who together with his wife, Miriam, spent roughly $100 million to help elect Mitt Romney and other Republicans in 2012.

"People like Sheldon Adelson -- you know who he is! -- and the Koch brothers are now spending unbelievable sums of money," Sanders said. When he argued that such political spending had created an "oligarchy" and wrecked "the foundations of American democracy," the crowd stood on its feet and chanted, "Bernie! Bernie! Bernie!"

Sanders received a raucous reception here Friday, with repeated standing ovations and loud cheers. The hour was early, especially by Las Vegas standards -- 9 a.m. -- but hundreds of people, young and old, streamed in, sipping coffee and munching on muffins and breakfast cake.

The Sanders campaign received so many responses from locals wanting to see him that they relocated his town hall meeting from the University of Nevada Las Vegas to a venue that could accommodate hundreds more -- the ballroom at Treasure Island, a hotel and casino on the Las Vegas Strip.

On Saturday, Sanders is scheduled to hold an event in Denver, where campaign officials said they already have received about 7,000 RSVPs. If they all show up, it would be perhaps the largest rally any candidate in either party has staged thus far in the 2016 campaign cycle.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders argued that the reception he saw here in Las Vegas and in other recent stops, from Iowa to Minnesota to New Hampshire, shows that his message is resonating with progressive activists.

“This campaign is about you, your kids, our parents, our grandparents," he said. "It is about having the courage to do something which is pretty hard, and that is to say very loudly and clearly that enough is enough, that this government, our country belongs to all of us and not just a handful of billionaires."

Climate change is a core theme of Sanders's pitch to voters, but he added a new line to his stump speech, referring to Pope Francis's call to action, issued Thursday from the Vatican, that the burning of fossil fuels and human activity contribute to climate change.

"As Pope Francis reminded us yesterday, climate change is real; climate change is caused by human activity; climate change is already having devastating impact in America and around the world," Sanders said. He argued that it is an "international embarrassment" that some U.S. senators from the Republican Party continue to deny climate change science.

Bernie Sanders and immigration? It’s complicated // Politico // Seung Min Kim – June 19, 2015

Running as a presidential hopeful in 2016, Bernie Sanders has touted his support for immigration reform and the need to find a solution to a problem that has long vexed Washington.

But in 2007, Sanders was part of the charge from the left to kill an immigration overhaul bill.

Back then, the Vermont independent warned that the immigration bill — a product from then-Sen. Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) — would drive down wages for lower-income workers, an argument that’s been used by hard-liner reform opponents. He paired with conservative Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) on a restrictive immigration amendment. And Sanders backed provisions characterized as poison pills to unravel the bill, while voting to block the final measure in June 2007.

Sanders’ history on immigration that year is complicated. But his overall record has come under renewed attention after criticism that the senator was being too quiet on the issue during his long-shot campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination.

He plans to address immigration when he appears before a conference of Latino officials on Friday in Las Vegas.

Sanders, more comfortable speaking in the language of income inequality and economic populism, has largely skipped over immigration while campaigning — a silence that prompted Rep. Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.) to muse in a television interview last week: “I don’t know if he likes immigrants because he doesn’t seem to talk about immigrants.”

“He’s running for the nomination of my party, and my party has made pretty clear that immigration is a top-tier issue,” Gutierrez said, explaining why he pushed Sanders on the topic. Still, Gutierrez added: “I have no reason to doubt his authenticity and sincerity.”

For all his rhetoric in 2007, Sanders didn’t oppose a pathway to citizenship or efforts to boost border security. That chapter in Sanders’ immigration record reflects less on his support for the issue and more on his alliance to labor — and key unions also opposed the 2007 legislation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Sanders was basically one of our only allies … especially for low-skilled workers” in 2007, said Ana Avendano, a former top immigration official at the AFL-CIO. “He adamantly put his foot down and said these kinds of programs [allow] employers to bring in more and more vulnerable workers.”

For some overhaul supporters, Sanders’ stance was a blow in 2007.

“I wasn’t happy when he voted against the bill and I wasn’t happy we lost. It hurt,” said Frank Sharry, a longtime veteran of Washington’s immigration battles. “In retrospect, we realized that the only way we can proceed is that progressive forces are united behind the bill, and then you negotiate from strength with the business community and conservatives on employment and business immigration.”

Fast forwarding to today, Sanders’ immigration stance is still notable, though more for how muted it has been compared to his competitors’ views. Democratic rivals Hillary Clinton and Martin O’Malley have aggressively tackled the issue. Clinton has pledged to go further than President Barack Obama has on shielding immigrants here illegally from deportations, while O’Malley vowed to take on reform within the first 100 days as chief executive.

After Gutierrez’s comments last week, Sanders inserted new remarks in his stump speech in Des Moines, calling for a “rational immigration process” that differed from the “Republican alternatives of self-deportation or some other draconian non-solution.”

In a brief interview, Sanders said Gutierrez’s criticism didn’t influence his decision to include immigration in his stump speech. The senator also said he would speak on the issue during his Friday Las Vegas event.

“We’ll have a very strong statement on the need for comprehensive immigration reform,” Sanders said, previewing his remarks at the gathering of the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials. “It’s an issue that I’ve been involved in.”

The son of Polish immigrants, Sanders has a record on immigration that’s broadly praised by advocates.

In December 2010, Sanders voted for the Dream Act — legislation that would have legalized immigrants brought to the United States illegally as children. It passed the Democratic-led House, but blocked in the Senate. Sanders voted with all Senate Democrats to support the so-called Gang of Eight bill in 2013.

And last year, when Sanders began flirting with a presidential run, he pressed Obama on taking executive action for millions of undocumented immigrants at a time when moderate Senate Democrats up for reelection fretted over the White House acting on its own on deportations.

But in 2007, Sanders was far from a reliable vote for immigration reform in the Senate.

The problem for Sanders was a guest-worker program that some immigration advocates and Democratic lawmakers begrudgingly accepted as part of a comprehensive deal — but was abhorred by labor unions and their allies on Capitol Hill.

“What concerns me are provisions in the bill that would bring low-wage workers into this country in order to depress the already declining wages of American workers,” Sanders said in May 2007. “With poverty increasing and the middle-class shrinking, we must not force American workers into even more economic distress.”

The guest-worker program proposed in the 2007 bill would bring in foreign workers for two years at a time, but force them to leave the United States for a year in between each renewal. It also offered few protections for those workers, labor advocates said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In early June of that year, Sanders proposed an amendment with Grassley that would ban companies that have laid off workers en masse from being approved for new worker visas.

Then-Sen. Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.) pitched an amendment to end that guest-worker program after five years, which passed by one vote and has since been called a poison pill that helped scuttle the bill. Sanders voted in favor of Dorgan's amendment, as did Clinton.

"Sanders was very active in trying to reduce the guest-worker parts of the '07 bill," said Roy Beck, the executive director of Numbers USA, a group that calls for stricter immigration laws. "It was remarkable that Sanders went along with that in 2013."

The 2007 measure splintered both parties in the Senate — as a coalition of conservative Republicans, union-friendly liberals and centrist Democrats banded together to block the legislation and effectively killed immigration reform under President George W. Bush.

Other labor-backed Senate Democrats, such as Sherrod Brown of Ohio, Debbie Stabenow of Michigan and Tom Harkin of Iowa, sided with Sanders. But Clinton voted to advance it, as did then-Sens. Barack Obama of Illinois and Joe Biden of Delaware.

In contrast to the failed 2007 push, labor and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in 2013 struck an agreement for lower-skilled immigrant workers — a landmark deal that was key to the Senate proposing and passing its comprehensive bill in June that year.

But even though he ultimately voted for it, Sanders wasn't too keen on guest-worker plan in 2013, either.

The new program, Sanders argued, would "allow large corporations to import hundreds of thousands of blue-collar and white-collar workers from overseas." And for good measure, Sanders also ripped a section in the sweeping bill that would have bolstered the number of high-skilled immigrant workers into the country — a less contentious provision.

Sanders ultimately secured a sweetener in the final days of the 2013 immigration battle: a $1.5 billion youth jobs program that, on its face, appeared to have little to do with immigration.

It would dole out that money to states to help 16- to 24-year-olds in the United States become employed, which Sanders proclaimed would help more than 400,000 young people. He argued that his youth jobs program was necessary to offset the immigrants coming here to do jobs that Sanders said the young Americans would otherwise do.

"Like any piece of complicated legislation, there are aspects of this bill which I strongly support and others I disagree with," Sanders after he voted to pass the 2013 bill. "One of the areas I have serious concerns about and want to see improved as the bill progresses is the huge increase in guest-worker programs. At a time when unemployment remains extremely high, these programs bring hundreds of thousands of skilled and unskilled workers into our economy making it harder for U.S. citizens to find jobs."

That wasn't too far off from Sanders in 2007 — except that back then, he voted against the bill.

"At a time when the middle class is shrinking, poverty is increasing and millions of Americans are working longer hours for lower wages it makes no sense to me to have an immigration bill which, over a period of years, would bring millions of 'guest workers' into this country who are prepared to work for lower wages than American workers," Sanders said after that year's bill died. "We need to increase wages in this country, not lower them."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders gains with blunt talk of rich vs. poor // AP // June 19, 2015

Bernie Sanders likes to call it "practicing democracy." He doesn't take the stage to a blaring soundtrack. He doesn't have a teleprompter or a phalanx of Secret Service agents surrounding him. But when his Brooklyn accent booms out at a campaign stop in rural Iowa, heads nod along in approval.

"What I'm doing in this campaign is trying to tell the people the truth — but a truth which is not heard a whole lot in Washington or discussed a lot in the media," Sanders said recently at a picnic in Iowa's Warren County, south of Des Moines.

"So let me lay it out on the table for you," he said. "You're living in a country today which has more wealth and income inequality than any major industrialized nation on earth."

In a race for the Democratic presidential nomination with Hillary Rodham Clinton, the blunt talk about the economy and the gap between the rich and poor is working for Sanders. The independent senator from Vermont is an unconventional messenger at a time when many politicians test-drive what they want to say in polls and with focus groups.

Sanders is drawing sizable crowds in the early voting states. He's also gaining against Clinton in very early polls, particularly in New Hampshire, a factor that impresses the political class even though opinion surveys at this point are limited in predicting who will win.

Clinton remains the race's overwhelming favorite, but there's no question that the 73-year-old self-described democratic socialist, whose disheveled white hair might remind some of Doc Brown from "Back to the Future," isn't just a novelty.

"This is a unique individual," said Iowa Democratic state Rep. Scott Ourth, who introduced Sanders last weekend at the picnic in Indianola. "This guy has only one standard. If it's right for people, he's going to fight for it. If it's bad for people, he's going to take a stand against it."

Drawing unexpectedly large crowds, the campaign has moved a town meeting planned in Las Vegas on Friday into a more spacious venue.

About 5,000 people are expected at a rally Saturday at the University of Denver.

"The challenge for us, really, is that at this point the crowds are way ahead of us," said Sanders campaign manager Jeff Weaver.

Sanders is running with a relentless focus on policy. He rarely talks about his family, other than mentioning his four children and 7 grandchildren when explaining the importance of confronting climate change. In Minneapolis he was joined on stage by his wife, Jane, and noted they had just celebrated their 27th wedding anniversary.

He's promoting a massive government-led jobs program to fix roads and bridges. He wants a $15-an-hour minimum wage, and higher taxes on the wealthy and Wall Street. He advocates for a single-payer health care system, an expansion of Social Security benefits and debt-free college.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He's combative, too.

Sanders often points to some European and Scandinavian countries that provide subsidized or free education, universal health care and generous family leave policies as models for the U.S.

While speaking to graduate students recently, Sanders asked a student from Finland whether his country is "crazy" to pay for his education. Then he grilled the students about U.S. policy on paid sick leave for new parents.

"C'mon guys, you're in graduate school!" he barked. "What are you teaching these guys? Do you know anything?"

One woman yelled, "None," meaning no national policy on such leave. Nodding, Sanders instructed the students that people in Finland get paid leave after they have children.

"Ahhh. Now I want to get everybody very nervous," Sanders said sarcastically. "This is called European socialism! Terrible, horrible, right? Because none of you want to be able to go to college and graduate school tuition-free.

"None of you, when you have kids, want the opportunity to bond with your kids. Terrible! European socialism!"

His speeches often reflect such a black-and-white view of the world. He rarely mentions that tax rates in such countries are far higher than in the U.S.

It's a style that couldn't be more different than Clinton's.

Hours before the first major rally of her campaign, Clinton released a Spotify playlist of songs, featuring music by Katy Perry, Kelly Clarkson and Sara Bareilles. One of her campaign Twitter feeds showed a green silhouette of her head wearing trendy headphones.

Clinton has been traveling with Secret Service agents since her husband's presidency in the 1990s.

Sanders shows up at rallies and events with a small contingent of aides. In Indianola, he carried a folded piece of paper scrawled with notes while he spoke.

Other presidential candidates in Iowa and New Hampshire will linger long after their speeches, trying to shake every hand and make a personal connection with a potential voter. Sanders doesn't make a lot of small talk. After receiving a standing ovation in Indianola, he was stopped repeatedly for photos and handshakes — which he obliged — but he kept moving.

"Very quickly, very quickly," he said to one man requesting a photograph.

For all of that, the woman he's challenging is perhaps the most dominant front-runner within the party in a generation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Clinton is going to be a safer bet," said John MacBride, a 24-year-old Sanders supporter who drove from Kansas City to see him speak. "A lot of my peers think she's a safer bet. But they like what he says better."

Bernie Sanders Faces Awkward Issues for His Liberal Allies: Immigration and Guns // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein – June 19, 2015

Senator Bernie Sanders is positioning himself as the furthest-left mainstream presidential candidate, but on Friday he ended up confronting two of the issues where he's most at odds with liberals: immigration and guns.

Speaking to a gathering of Latino government officials, Sanders touted his support for a comprehensive overhaul of immigration laws, saying he backs a path to full citizenship for the undocumented as well as efforts to improve working conditions for immigrants.

"It is not acceptable to me and I think a growing majority of the American people that millions of folks in this country are working extremely hard but they are living in the shadows and that has got to end," Sanders told the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials convention, drawing a substantially smaller crowd than another hopeful for the Democratic presidential nomination, Hillary Clinton, did a day earlier.

Sanders talked up his support of the 2013 Senate immigration bill, which included a measure linking new immigration laws to heightened border security. On Friday, though, he said he opposes "tying immigration reform to the building of a border fence."

Addressing the Immigration Issue

Sanders' speech marked his first extended discussion of immigration, an issue that his campaign has downplayed. It was missing from his announcement speech in May, drawing the criticism of liberal commentators and at least one outspoken immigrant rights advocate. It was also missing during last week's visit to Marshalltown, an Iowa town with a sizable Latino population, when he faced sharp questions from an immigration advocate.

"I don't know if he likes immigrants, because he doesn't seem to talk about immigrants. But sooner or later he'll tell us. I hope he likes immigrants. I haven't heard him say anything. He's been kind of quiet and silent," Illinois Rep. Luis Gutiérrez said last week in an interview with Larry King.

Gutiérrez is a Clinton supporter but told King that he's also satisfied with former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley's position on the immigration.

During last summer's border crisis, Clinton supported the Obama administration's general approach, saying that children who had arrived in the United States "should be sent back as soon as it can be determined who responsible adults in their families are." The country, she said, needs to "send a clear message: just because your child gets across the border doesn't mean your child gets to stay."

O'Malley, though, bucked his party's leader and said that the United States is not a "country that should turn children away and send them back to certain death." Sensing Clinton's vulnerability a year later, Sanders offered a critique. "It was wrong for some to suggest turning away the unaccompanied Central American children along the border," he said.

Avoiding Gun Talk

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Earlier Friday, speaking to a crowd of more than 700 that had gathered for a town hall discussion in a ballroom at the Treasure Island casino after RSVPs outpaced plans for a smaller space at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas, Sanders avoided talk of guns during his stump speech, even when discussing Wednesday's mass shooting at a church in Charleston, S.C.

When started taking questions, though, one audience member went for it, saying that she sees a need for tougher gun laws.

Sanders framed his response with his backstory, telling the woman: "I come from a state that has zero gun control and it also has a very low crime rate." Even so, Vermonters "are more than aware that we have guns in the hands of people who should not have those guns. There are weapons out there that have nothing to do with hunting but are designed to kill people and kill them quickly. So those are issues that must be dealt with."

Sanders first got to Congress in 1990 after beating Republican Rep. Peter Smith, who had voiced support for an assault weapons ban, drawing the ire of the NRA, which ended up campaigning against him, though not directly for Sanders. Once Sanders got to the House, he opposed the Brady Bill, in what one article at the time called an "especially incongruous" position.

But Sanders' explanation then and in the quarter-century since has been that he takes his stance on behalf of all Vermonters, many of whom see guns as essential to rural life.

Asked after his town hall by a reporter on how those issues could be dealt with, Sanders avoided getting specific.

"I think rural America needs to understand what urban America fears. Urban America needs to understand the culture of rural America," he said.

Pressed on what he would do as president, he said only: "I will talk about guns at some length but not right now."

Clinton, Sanders, Paul top Facebook chatter in key early presidential states // McClatchy // David Lightman – June 19, 2015

Hillary Clinton's winning big in the "Facebook poll" in New Hamsphire and South Carolina, but Bernie Sanders is right behind. And among Republicans, Rand Paul is on top.

Those are the results of Facebook "interactions," which include likes, posts, comments and shares, over the past month. The data cover May 13 to June 13.

No one knows, of course, how much influence Facebook and social media will have, but at the moment, Clinton, the Democratic front-runner, is clearly the most talked-about candidate. Her 289,000 Iowa interactions are far ahead of runnerup Sanders, the senator from Vermont, who had 153,000. Paul, a senator from Kentucky, had 98,000.

Sanders came closer in New Hampshire, which shares a long border with Vermont. He had 123,000 interactions to Clinton's 145,000. But he fell way back in South Carolina, where Clinton topped him, 460,000 to 116,000. Clinton held her first major rally Saturday, the last day the data was collected. Sanders held his first big presidential event May 26.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson, who has been trying to appeal to the Republicans' evangelical base, did well in that state, finishing a close second to Paul.

Here are South Carolina data. The first number is unique people. The second is interactions:

Hillary Clinton 104,000 460,000

Rand Paul 34,000 132,000

Ben Carson 24,000 120,000

Bernie Sanders 24,000 116,000

Lindsey Graham 43,000 100,000

Ted Cruz 25,000 94,000

Jeb Bush 32,000 80,000

Mike Huckabee 29,000 80,000

Rick Perry 33,000 71,000

Marco Rubio 18,000 48,000

Scott Walker 14,000 39,000

Rick Santorum14,000 28,000

Carly Fiorina 10,000 25,000

Chris Christie 13,000 24,000

Donald Trump 12,000 20,000

Bobby Jindal 8,000 15,000

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Martin O Malley 2,000 5,000

George Pataki 2,000 2,000

John Kasich 1,000 2,000

Bernie Sanders Calls for Broader End to Deportations // TIME // Philip Elliot – June 19, 2015

Prosecutors in the Colorado theater shooting trial rested Friday, concluding their argument that James Holmes methodically planned and executed the 2012 massacre in a case that relied heavily — over defense objections — on victims' recollections of the carnage he inflicted inside the darkened cinema.

Over the past eight weeks, prosecutors weaved experts' testimony with survivors' personal stories to try to convince jurors that Holmes was sane when he opened fire on a midnight showing of the Batman film The Dark Knight Rises. The former neuroscience student killed 12 people and wounded 70.

For its last witness, the prosecution called a survivor whose story was among the most heart-wrenching. Ashley Moser was paralyzed and suffered a miscarriage in the shooting, and her 6-year-old daughter, Veronica, was killed.

Moser came to the witness stand in a motorized wheelchair. She described hearing what she thought were kids setting off fireworks in the theater, and wanting to leave. She reached for her daughter's hand, but it slipped away.

The soft-spoken Moser used a tissue to wipe away tears as she described the attack. She said it started with an explosion and something spewing gas behind her, then bright flashes at the front of the room. Moser said she assumed someone was setting off fireworks as a prank, and she stood up to take her daughter's hand and leave.

"Did her hand reach back?" prosecutor George Brauchler asked.

"It just slipped through my hand," she replied.

Moser said she felt a pain in her chest and fell on top of her daughter, but couldn't move.

"I heard the movie still playing and people crying and screaming," Moser said, vaguely recalling being carried out of the theater. She learned later that her daughter was dead.

As Moser testified from her wheelchair, Holmes stared straight ahead, slightly swiveling in his chair.

The prosecution rested after displaying Veronica's kindergarten graduation picture. The gallery was packed, and several victims and their relatives hugged and thanked prosecutors once the jury was dismissed for the day.

Holmes' lawyers will now begin calling their own psychiatrists and presenting other evidence to argue Holmes was in the grips of a psychotic episode at the time of the shootings and should be found not guilty by reason of insanity. They plan to begin their case Thursday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The defense says Holmes' mental illness distorted his sense of right and wrong, a key factor the jury must consider in determining if he was sane. Holmes' attorneys say he should be committed to the state mental hospital.

Prosecutors are seeking the death penalty.

Holmes abandoned a prestigious graduate program at the University of Colorado-Denver before he opened fire at the suburban Denver movie theater where more than 400 people were watching the midnight premier.

Prosecutors showed jurors nearly 21 hours of Holmes' videotaped interviews with a state-appointed psychiatrist who concluded Holmes was seriously mentally ill but legally sane at the time of the shooting.

On the video, Holmes said he felt nothing as he took aim at fleeing moviegoers. Halting and awkward, he blurted out that he feared being stopped from committing what he acknowledged was a crime.

Prosecutors also took jurors on a video tour of the theater, the camera moving past bodies wedged between rows of seats or sprawled throughout aisles amid spent ammunition, spilled popcorn and blood. The footage, taken by an investigator, zoomed in on bullet fragments, bloody stairs and shoes left behind in the panic to escape.

Prosecutors introduced a brown spiral notebook Holmes kept titled "Of Life," in which he scrawled a self-diagnosis of his "broken mind" and described an "obsession to kill" since childhood.

Holmes made lists of weapons he planned to buy and included detailed drawings of the theater complex, complete with pros and cons of attacking different auditoriums and police response times.

Dr. Lynne Fenton, the university psychiatrist who treated Holmes before the attack, testified she did not have enough evidence to have him detained but was so concerned after he confessed his homicidal thoughts that she violated his health care privacy to call his mother.

Trial began April 27 after three months of jury selection that produced 12 jurors and 12 alternates. Five of those jurors have been dismissed — three amid concern they were exposed to news of the proceedings, one after her brother-in-law was wounded in a Denver ATM robbery, and one because she recognized a witness. That left 19 jurors, including seven alternates.

Where Bernie Sanders disappoints liberals // CNN // Dan Merica – June 19, 2015

Bernie Sanders has a growing immigration problem.

The Vermont independent senator is an outspoken liberal champion on social issues, jobs and foreign policy. He is known for his boisterous speeches on the Senate floor, his blunt style and his penchant for getting under the skin of his opponents.

But when the newly minted presidential candidate takes the stage at the National Association of Latino Elected Officials meeting in Las Vegas on Friday, he will stand before many Latino lawmakers that feel he hasn't been nearly liberal enough on the issue of immigration.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It is not his priority," Arturo Vargas, the executive director of NALEO, said on Thursday. "I think that is one of the challenges his campaign is going to have to confront."

Sanders does have a record on immigration. He backed the 2013 immigration reform law, he has worked extensively on migrant worker rights and has spoken out, at times, about how lower wages impact immigrant families more than most.

But he helped kill a 2007 immigration push and until recently, the issue was not something Sanders addressed in his presidential stump speech. When he kicked off his campaign earlier this year on the shores of Lake Champlain in Burlington, Vermont, his 3,509 word speech did not mention immigration.

"He absolutely needs to get up to speed," Debra Guerrero, a member of the San Antonio Independent School District and NALEO attendee. "If he wants to serve as our leader ... he needs to be aware of what the future holds and immigration is a part of that."

Omar Narvaez, a NALEO member and a Dallas County Schools Board of Trustee, said "it could be a bit of a problem, especially for those of us who come from southern states or states that border Mexico."

"If you are going to run for president, you have to have some plan or thought process that you can delver for us," he said.

The Latinos gathered Las Vegas feel that Sanders has not brought the same forcefulness he usually does to liberal causes when talking about immigration. Many attribute this to the fact he is from Vermont, a state that has fewer than 10,000 undocumented immigrants, according to Pew Research.

Sanders' lack of outspokenness on immigration has caught the attention of some of his colleagues on Capitol Hill, too.

"I don't know if he likes immigrants because he doesn't seem to talk about immigrants," Rep. Luis Gutiérrez, D-Illinois told Larry King earlier this month. "But sooner or later, he'll tell us. I hope he likes immigrants. I haven't heard him say anything. He's been kind of quiet and silent."

Sanders will address the audience at NALEO on Friday and his campaign aides said this week that he will outline, in detail, his views.

In a statement to CNN, Sanders noted that, as the "son of an immigrant," he believes it is "time to bring our neighbors out of the shadows."

Sanders pushed back against the idea that he isn't outspoken enough on immigration by noting his record of voting for immigration reform and workers' rights.

"The Republican majority in both the House and the Senate needs to let us debate and pass real immigration reform," Sanders told CNN.

Polls show Sanders struggling with minority voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A CNN/ORC poll released earlier this month found that 5% of non-white voters supported Sanders for president, compared to 10% of overall voters who support the independent senator.

By comparison, Hillary Clinton -- the Democratic frontrunner who won a majority of Latino voters in her 2008 primary vote against then Sen. Barack Obama -- enjoyed 62% support from non-white voters.

Vargas, the executive director of NALEO, said it wasn't too late for Sanders, however.

"Immigration is an extremely important issue, it is not the only issues," he said. "You have people here who are running school districts. What is his policy on public education? You have people here running cities. What is policy on infrastructure? And what is his policy on public safety?

"I wouldn't say he has a clean slate. But he certainly is an unknown factor and I think tomorrow is an opportunity for him to define himself," Vargas said.

Bernie Sanders wants to talk about guns. But not right now. // CNN // Dan Merica – June 19, 2015

Bernie Sanders says he wants to talk -- at length -- about guns.

Just not now.

Two days after a white man walked into a historically black church in Charleston, South Carolina, and killed nine people, the Vermont senator and presidential candidate took a cautious approach on gun control Friday when speaking with reporters after an event in Las Vegas.

"I think the people of Vermont understand that guns in Vermont are different than guns in Chicago or guns in Los Angeles," Sanders said, telling the assembled journalists that he thinks "it is wrong" when people are "in some cases suicidal and in some cases homicidal" are "still being able to purchase guns."

Sanders, saying his home state of Vermont has "zero gun control," acknowledged that different parts of the country have different outlooks on guns.

"I think we need to have as serious conversation about that," Sanders said. "I think rural America needs to understand what urban America feels. Urban America needs to understand the culture of rural America. But I think together we have got to go forward to make certain that people who should not be having these weapons do not have them."

When CNN tried to follow up with Sanders about how he would handle guns differently than President Barack Obama, the independent senator rejected the question.

"I will talk about guns at some length," he said, "but not right now."

Sanders' caution smacks in the face of his usual persona: Blunt, brash and proudly liberal. Before his chat with reporters, Sanders delivered his proudly liberal stump speech to an energized audience at The Treasure Island Hotel and Casino in Las Vegas. He framed his campaign as one where the lower and middle class were fighting against the wealthy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Brothers and sisters, this is a tough fight," he said, just before a woman shouted, "but we are going to win!"

"We are going to win," Sanders responded with a slight smile.

The senator started his rally with a moment of silence for the people killed in Charleston, a tragedy he said was a remind that "racism, sadly, remains alive and well in this country and that we have much too much violence."

As his campaign aides watched closely, Sanders also addressed guns during his remarks, again contrasting his background in Vermont with urban America.

"There are weapons out there that have nothing to do with hunting and are designed to kill people and kill them quickly," Sanders said. "And this is an issue that must be dealt with."

In the eyes of gun control activists, Sanders has a mixed and moderate background on the issue, something that contrasts with his more liberal persona.

Sanders voted against the Brady Handgun Violence Prevention Act in 1993, a law that imposed a five-day waiting period for gun purchases and mandated background checks, and voted for allowing guns on Amtrak. For much of his career, Sanders has followed the lead of his constituents -- who mostly back gun rights for hunters -- by keeping a generally states' rights view of gun laws.

But Sanders has also backed stricter gun laws. He voted for the 1994 assault weapons ban, and after the shootings in Newtown, Connecticut in 2012, Sanders backed Obama's failed push for more background checks and another assault weapons ban.

Even after the 2013 push, though, Sanders questioned whether the legislation he supported would even work.

"If you passed the strongest gun control legislation tomorrow, I don't think it will have a profound effect on the tragedies we have seen," he told Seven Days, an independent paper in Vermont.

Sanders' reluctance to address specifics on gun control contrasts with his foremost progressive challenger, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who outlined specific policy proposals Friday in an email to supporters entitled, "I'm pissed."

O'Malley backed a national assault weapons ban, stricter background checks and "efforts to reduce straw-buying, like fingerprint requirements."

"How many senseless acts of violence in our streets or tragedies in our communities will it take to get our nation to stop caving to special interests like the NRA when people are dying?" he asked.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Elizabeth Warren's rallying cry is simple: If we fight for our values, we will win. And the question she's asked supporters is this: Are you ready to fight?

It was that fearless, fighting spirit that inspired us to start Ready for Warren more than a year ago to draft Elizabeth Warren to run for president. We believe the movement to draft Warren fundamentally changed the terms of the 2016 debate, and these days, just about every Democrat running for president seems to sound a lot like Warren. Few people have ever played as large a role in a Democratic presidential primary without even entering the race.

But having demonstrated how much support Elizabeth Warren has, we've spent the past few weeks listening to our grassroots supporters and the progressive community about what they want to do next. And one thing we heard time and again is that they're ready to play a big role in 2016, fighting alongside Warren on issues like trade, student debt, and reining in Wall Street.

They are also ready to back "Warren Wing" candidates who embody Warren's fearless brand of progressive populism. And although it isn't just about the presidency, 56% of supporters have urged us to back Bernie Sanders as the candidate currently running for president who best embodies the values that Warren champions.

That's why on Friday, Ready for Warren is launching a new grassroots initiative called Ready to Fight -- and Ready to Fight is endorsing Bernie Sanders as its candidate for president.

Why?

Because while Warren is the champion who inspired this movement, the draft effort was never just about her -- it's about her message and the values she represents. Bernie Sanders has caught fire in a way that's reminiscent of the draft Warren movement itself -- from the Internet to town halls in Iowa, Sanders has captured the imagination and support of people looking for a real progressive challenger in the 2016 Democratic primary.

One reason we're witnessing such a surge of support for politicians like Sanders and Warren is that they have given voice to Americans' deeply-felt frustration that the game is rigged against working people and stacked in favor of corporations and the very wealthy. For example, Robert Reich, citing a Pew report, notes that "the percentage of Americans who believe most people who want to get ahead can do so through hard work has plummeted 14 points since 2000."

While it's harder and harder for working people to get ahead or even get by, their voices are being drowned out by corporate influence and a flood of money in politics -- some $3.7 billion in last year's election cycle alone.

Indeed, a 2014 Princeton study of more than 1,800 policy initiatives concluded that, over the past two decades, the United States has transformed from a representative democracy to a country where the elites hold power and shape policy, regardless of the will of the majority of voters. We've seen this imbalance play out with the outsize influence of corporations in the fight over the Trans-Pacific Trade Partnership. About 500 corporate trade "advisers" have access and input into the details of the trade deal, while the text has been kept secret from representatives from labor and environmental groups, as well as the media and voters.

As the gap in priorities between policy makers in D.C. and people across America widens, the voices of progressive populists like Warren and Sanders are growing louder and louder. But to be successful, they need the power of the people behind them -- people who are willing to stand up and fight.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The launch of Ready to Fight doesn't mean the movement to draft Warren is over. Organizations don't create movements, and they can't end them. There is still a real and widespread desire to see Elizabeth Warren run for president, and Ready for Warren is continuing to organize in order to make the case to Warren, and the country, that she should be a candidate in the 2016 race. We're a long way from Iowa, and no one knows what the future holds.

But this effort has always been a bottom-up movement. It's an expression of a deep and broadly felt desire for leaders who are willing to stand up to powerful interests and fight for working families. The Warren Wing is on the rise -- you can see it in everything from the fight against TPP to the growing momentum around Bernie Sanders, and in the way Hillary Clinton and even Republican candidates are echoing Warren's themes on income inequality.

We're ready to fight -- standing with Elizabeth Warren and Bernie Sanders to make sure the values we share are represented in next year's presidential election.

Sanders has favored a lighter touch on gun control than Clinton, O'Malley // Boston Globe // Anne Linksey and Tracy Jan – June 19, 2015

Senator Bernie Sanders has built his insurgent presidential campaign by trying to outshine Hillary Clinton on populist economic issues. But political reaction to the racially motivated mass murder in a Charleston, S.C., church this week highlighted an area where he's out of sync with most liberals: gun control.

Sanders, from Vermont, a rural state where support of guns and hunting is part of the political culture, has amassed a mixed record on proposed gun restrictions in his years as a congressman and senator.

The self-avowed Democratic socialist once earned a C- rating from the National Rifle Association — not a high mark for a Republican contender, but one that sets him apart as practically gun friendly among the 2016 Democrats vying for the nomination.

The issue isn't one that Sanders typically discusses on the stump, unless a question comes up. But after Wednesday's church shooting, gun control back has bounced back to the national agenda. Interest in Sanders and his positions also has spiked as he has attracted large numbers of people to his events who are eager to listen to the most prominent liberal alternative in the field to Clinton.

Clinton's response to the Charleston shootings was in line with her past views. She said the country must "face hard truths about race, violence, guns, and division." Martin O'Malley, the former Maryland governor and another Democrat in the presidential race, said the slayings should "call all of us to action" on gun control. President Obama, too, speaking from the White House on Thursday, decried the multiple mass shootings that have occurred since he assumed office, while lamenting the opposition to stricter rules on Capitol Hill.

Sanders made no mention at all of firearms or gun regulations in the wake of the attacks at Charleston's Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church. Instead, he focused on the alleged motive for the attack, calling it a "tragic reminder of the ugly stain of racism that still taints our nation." A 21-year-old man was charged Friday in the murders of the worshippers, who were all African-American. Sanders also canceled a planned trip to South Carolina over the weekend.

On Friday afternoon, in response to questions from the media and an attendee at a town hall meeting in Las Vegas, Sanders said additional gun control should be considered but noted there are deep differences between rural and urban areas on the issue, according to Michael Briggs, a Sanders spokesman.

Sanders, 73, doesn't own a gun, added Briggs, and he shot a weapon once — as a Boy Scout.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders' views more closely reflect a general pro-gun attitude in Vermont, said Ed Cutler, the president of Gun Owners of Vermont.

"Even the liberals have guns up here," Cutler said.

He added that he has met with Sanders several times, and the senator has shown little interest in gun related legislation. In one instance, Sanders even refused to touch an empty magazine that Cutler hand-crafted to demonstrate how easy they are to make.

"Firearms is not his issue," Cutler said. "He doesn't know a whole lot about them."

Sanders has voted against the landmark Brady bill that required background checks and a waiting period before purchasing a firearm. He supported legislation allowing guns to be transported on Amtrak trains. He voted for a a measure to protect gun manufacturers from lawsuits in cases of shootings.

At other times, Sanders has supported gun control measures, including voting for an assault weapons ban and supporting President Obama's gun control package in the aftermath of the Sandy Hook Elementary School shooting that left 20 children and six adults dead.

The National Rifle Association awarded Sanders an F rating in 2002 when he ran for reelection in the House of Representatives. The grade changed to a D+ in 2004; a C- in 2006 when he ran for the Senate, and most recently earned a D- when he ran in 2012.

In contrast, Clinton and O'Malley have both earned consistently failing grades from the organization. The NRA hasn't issued any ratings yet for 2016.

In the past, Clinton has supported banning assault weapons, expanding background checks, and banning high-capacity magazines. During a "town hall" style meeting last year that was broadcast on CNN, she delighted gun control advocates by saying: "We cannot let a minority of people, and that's what it is, it is a minority of people, hold a view point that terrorizes the majority of people."

O'Malley oversaw sweeping new gun control legislation in Maryland after the Sandy Hook massacre, a package that prompted one gun manufacturer to leave the state. On Friday O'Malley e-mailed supporters under the subject line "I'm pissed," and called for an assault weapons ban, stricter background checks, and measures to prevent so-called straw purchases of weapons where a person without a criminal record purchases a weapon on behalf someone with one.

The Republican presidential field, predictably, generally opposes gun control measures. In response to the Charleston killings, Republicans shunned the subject of gun control while denouncing the attacks in a church and highlighting the deep religious faith of the victims.

Gun rights lobbyists have identified former Florida governor Jeb Bush as one of the most conservative in the GOP side, pointing to his A+ rating from the NRA and now-famous "stand your ground" law in 2005 that expanded the rights of people to use deadly force when threatened in their homes or in a public place. Bush also signed bills that expanded protections for gun owners carrying concealed firearms, including out-of-state visitors.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While running for governor in 1998, however, he backed a Florida law mandating background checks for firearms purchased at gun shows.

The NRA lobbied against a bill to close a loophole that allows gun buyers to avoid background checks following the Sandy Hook Elementary School shootings. Senators Marco Rubio, Rand Paul, and Ted Cruz -- who are all running for president -- opposed the measure, which failed.

Rubio, a Florida Republican who says he has a concealed weapons permit but does not carry a gun, also voted against banning high-capacity magazines. He's proposed rolling back laws in the District of Columbia that prohibit guns.

Following the Sandy Hook shootings, Rubio said he was open to bills that would limit access to guns for criminals and the mentally ill. While running for US Senate, he said he supported background checks and waiting periods.

Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker, who also has an A+ endorsement from the National Rifle Association, has in recent months voiced support for a version of Florida's "stand your ground" law.

In a March appearance in Charleston, Walker highlighted his gun record at a Republican luncheon. As governor, he signed a law, which he called the "castle doctrine," that provides protections for gun owners who shoot home intruders. He's also signed legislation allowing permit holders to carry concealed firearms, including into public buildings including the Wisconsin State Capitol.

Ready for Warren Sets Up Outlet for Members to Back Bernie Sanders // National Journal // Eric Garcia – June 19, 2015

Ready for Warren is no longer exclusively ready for Warren. The organization is keeping its efforts to draft Elizabeth Warren in place, but for those supporters who are giving up and want to shift gears and back another candidate, they have launched a project backing Sen. Bernie Sanders' presidential bid.

In an email to supporters, the group's organizers said they were launching an initiative called Ready to Fight, and that when members were asked about 2016, 56 percent supported Sanders, leading the organization to give the Vermont Democrat its support.

An op-ed for CNN by Ready for Warren campaign manager Erica Sagrans and cofounder Charles Lenchner explained the decision to back Sanders.

"Sanders has captured the imagination and support of people looking for a real progressive challenger in the 2016 Democratic primary," they wrote.

But in an email to supporters, Ready for Warren insisted that the movement to draft Warren effort was not over yet.

"Ready for Warren will continue to be a place for everyone who wants to organize to make the case to Warren, and the country, that she should run," the email said.

By hosting these two organizations, Ready for Warren likely is trying to settle the predicament of how to keep momentum for their draft effort while maintaining the energy of people in the tent who are ready to channel their efforts toward an actual candidate's campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Warren has repeatedly rebuffed pushes to jump in the race from Ready for Warren and Run Warren Run, which suspended its efforts last week and instead said it would focus on helping Warren in her fight for progressive causes.

The boosters who held onto a potential Warren candidacy for so long, though, aren't all just going to bounce to Bernie Sanders. Saba Hafeez, who helped drop off signatures to Warren's office to ask her to run for president, and was a campus organizer at the University of Iowa for the effort, said last week that she had seen former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley speak in Iowa City and was planning on seeing Hillary Clinton speak in Sioux City.

"I haven't decided what I'm doing next, but I would love to work in another campaign," Hafeez said.

Warren supporters are trying to show the campaigns that they are a valuable constituency in the Democratic Party, but it is unclear how much of an influence or help that Warren's backers would be to Sanders, or if their movement to him would have any effect on Clinton's front-runner campaign.

Sanders denounces 'billionaire class' outside GOP donor's Vegas casino // The Hill // Jonathan Easley – June 19, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) rallied hundreds of supporters against "the billionaire class" at a campaign stop Friday in Las Vegas across the strip from a luxury hotel and casino built by GOP megadonor Sheldon Adelson.

"Today we live in the wealthiest nation in the history of the world," said Sanders, a candidate for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, according to The Washington Post. "But the vast majority of the American people do not know that, do not feel that, because almost all of that wealth today rests in the hands of a tiny few."

"What we are saying to the billionaire class is, 'Your greed, which is destroying this country, has got to end,' " Sanders said.

Sanders called out Adelson by name.

"People like Sheldon Adelson ... and the Koch brothers are now spending unbelievable sums of money [to influence the political process]," Sanders said, according to the Post. Charles and David Koch are billionaires who also support conservative causes and candidates.

While Sanders took advantage of the proximity to Adelson's casino, the location of the rally didn't appear to be intentional.

He had reserved a room at the University of Nevada Las Vegas but had to move to a bigger location at the Treasure Island hotel and casino near the Venetian to accommodate a bigger-than-expected crowd.

Adelson's net worth is estimated to be near $30 billion. He donated some of the largest sums to conservative causes in the 2012 election cycle, spending about $100 million.

That year, he almost single-handedly kept former Speaker Newt Gingrich's (R-Ga.) campaign afloat by showering an affiliated super-PAC with tens of millions of dollars.

GOP candidates in the 2016 race have been lining up to seek his support.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ready for Warren endorses Sanders // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – June 19, 2015

Two top officials with Ready for Warren, the group that attempted to nudge Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) into a presidential bid, are throwing their support behind Sen. Bernie Sanders, who appears to be Hillary Clinton's progressive foil.

"While Warren is the champion who inspired this movement, the draft effort was never just about her — it's about her message and the values she represents," Erica Sagrans and Charles Lenchner write in an opinion piece on CNN released Friday morning.

"Bernie Sanders has caught fire in a way that's reminiscent of the draft Warren movement itself — from the Internet to town halls in Iowa, Sanders has captured the imagination and support of people looking for a real progressive challenger in the 2016 Democratic primary."

Sagrans is the campaign manager for the group, which has now rebranded itself as Ready to Fight. Lenchner is the group's co-founder.

Sanders has emerged as Clinton's leading opponent from the left. While he still trails Clinton by significant margins in most national and statewide polls, he's racking up strong poll numbers in New Hampshire and is drawing large crowds in Iowa.

The two write that 56 percent of the group's supporters have asked it to back Sanders, whom the article frames as the new torchbearer of the "Warren Wing."

"You can see it in everything from the fight against TPP to the growing momentum around Bernie Sanders, and in the way Hillary Clinton and even Republican candidates are echoing Warren's themes on income inequality," the op-ed says.

The Ready for Warren rebrand comes weeks after another group, Run Warren Run, suspended operations after it delivered a petition of 365,000 signatures urging Warren to run.

Bush, Sanders and the long, slow death of the GOP // The Hill // Bernie Quigley – June 19, 2015

I wrote here in late February, making the case that former Gov. Jeb Bush (R-Fla.) has had turnings in life which he responded to positively as a family man: His wife didn't like to cook so he simply took the job of cooking for family and kids. He was raised an Episcopalian and she a Roman Catholic and he converted to Catholicism so as to unite the family. In both cases, he made the selfless decision to do what needed to be done to keep the family whole. These acts and judgments in the family microcosm reflect the most essential nature of an individual, and they show Bush to be a man of substance.

On the other hand, he is not exactly an Alpha Dog. In the whole crew rising to 2016, possibly former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina is most effectively an Alpha Dog. And in the recent conservative oeuvre which weirdly affirms the marginal — bikers, hillbillies, mountain free church preachers, yellers, Phil Robertson and Church Norris — she is also the most urbane. Do conservatives really want to win?

It might also be not unfair to note that Bush appeared to reject out of hand the family path of Sen. Prescott Bush (R-Conn.) and President George H.W. Bush and their tradition of capable public service, perhaps running away from the New England family tradition scorned as "W.A.S.P." (white Anglo-Saxon Protestant) in his college years, even though it was that tradition that provided the backbone of establishment America from President John Adams to the Kennedy period.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Instead, he headed below the border to find the better life and it might be said that he escaped from the "Bush name" and the W.A.S.P. baggage. But isn't this the distinct American character which brings some to want another Bush? Do they not want what H.W. brought to the Oval Office: steady and dependable patrician reliability?

He is, as he says, an "introvert," and as such, he would likely be in time, possibly a very short time, uncomfortable as president. And so would we. (He would be an excellent priest or pope.) My wife and I are introverts. Introverts are librarians and solitary writers with cats who look forward to eating supper in front of the TV, watching "24."

Already, he is getting testy with Neil Cavuto on Fox, one of the most gentle and companionable commentators on TV. I'm not sure that he actually wants to be president, but is getting encouraged to do so by Henry Kissinger and Fred Barnes and that crowd. New York money has been pouring in, thinking him to be the best bet.

It may be a problem this time around that conservatives have convinced themselves that they will be running against Hillary Clinton and it will be a cakewalk, so they can send in young, inexperienced "new" people from the far red margins. Bush would likely win against Hillary and that, as far as I can see, is his only value.

But I am not so sure that Clinton will get the nomination. They failed to anticipate Bernie.

The millennial generation will soon rise to action, and it is beginning to swarm around Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.). His old socialist approach is a radical departure from what we have seen in the last 25 years. One of my millennials emailed home this week to say of Clinton/Bush: "Thanks, but we're tired of your families."

Today, Sanders's approach may be winning the millennials, the group said to be essential to the turn and rise of the century. Sanders is everywhere on their indigenous means of communication, Facebook and Twitter. He may be their Gray Champion. President Obama might have been that figure, but his inexplicable insistence on the imperious Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) ruins everything. And TPP could well be the trigger for the new generation rising.

Generational theorists predict, accurately in my opinion, that the generation that rises to action cohesively today will be the action generation to advance the century, just as the so-called "Greatest Generation" rose to master its world-shaking events in the 1930s and '40s. If they continue to follow Sanders's cue, and that of Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), the La Passionara of this new movement, it could bring a slow and painful death to conservatism as we know it.

Millennials are not slackers or sleepyheads, as they are said to be; they are bright, disciplined and acutely focused. They are — it is — a generation in waiting. And it may well be waiting for Bernie Sanders.

Democrats May Keep Bernie Sanders Off New York Primary Ballot // Gothamist // Emma Whitford – June 18, 2015

Vermont Senator/Indie Rocker Bernie Sanders is an Independent on paper, which means that he's going to have a hard time getting his name on the Democratic presidential primary ballot in New York to compete with Taylor Swift fan Hillary Clinton next year.

Why? Meet Wilson-Pakula, a very obscure state law. The Wilson-Pakula act, which passed in New York State back in 1947, bars any candidate from running for the nomination of a political party that he or she is not officially affiliated with. Unless, that is, he or she manages to get permission from that party's committee leaders.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sadly, Wilson-Pakula helped marginalize some of the political movements that Bernie supports. According to the Washington Post, pre-1947, "communist and socialist candidates had been able to become candidates... after winning support from voters." In other words, back then, average New Yorkers got to make candidacy appointments.

Under current law, permission to cross party lines is, apparently, very rarely granted. It doesn't help that the relevant committee in New York State has a lot of Hillary supporters: From Assembly Chair David Paterson, to Governor Cuomo himself who, as Capital put it, "controls most of the party apparatus."

Undeterred, as of this writing, 4,269 people have signed an online petition to "GET BERNIE SANDERS ON BALLOT IN NEW YORK." From the letter, addressed to Governor Cuomo and David Paterson:

We believe that selecting candidates to represent us is one of the core functions of the people. Thus, we stand in solidarity with Governor Cuomo's call to repeal the Wilson Pakula law. The Wilson Pakula law, which requires a candidate from one party obtain permission from party bosses to run as a candidate from another party, is antiquated and not Democratic.

Indeed, as recently as the spring of 2013, Cuomo proposed an end to Wilson-Pakula, following the arrest of then-Senate majority leader Malcolm Smith, a Democrat, after he tried to bribe Republican leaders to grant him permission to run for mayor on their ticket.

Another wrinkle for all of the New York Sanders groupies out there: While there are no party affiliation requirements in presidential elections, primaries in several states, New York included, require voting along party lines. As one Redditer put it yesterday, "I wonder if all the Bernie fans realize they have to register as democrats to vote for him?"

Inside the mind of Bernie Sanders: unbowed, unchanged, and unafraid of a good fight // Guardian // Paul Lewis – June 19, 2015

The diplomatic overture was dispatched to Hu Yaobang, chairman of the Chinese Communist party, on 29 October 1981. A near-identical letter was sent to the Kremlin, for the attention of Leonid Brezhnev, general secretary of the Communist party of the Soviet Union.

“Like an unconscious and uncontrollable force, our planet appears to be drifting toward self-destruction,” the newly installed socialist leader of somewhere called Burlington wrote. He urged them “in the strongest possible way” to disarm militarily and begin immediate negotiations with other world leaders.

Bernie Sanders, the ardently leftwing mayor of Vermont’s largest city, dispatched similar missives to Downing Street, the Élysée palace and the White House, before releasing a statement declaring: “Burlingtonians cannot calmly sit back and watch our planet be destroyed – with hundreds of millions of people incinerated.”

The correspondence, unearthed by the Guardian, confirms what has long been said of America’s longest-serving independent member of Congress who, at the age of 73, recently launched a bid for the Democratic nomination for president. Bernie Sanders is unafraid of punching above his weight.

Never has that been more the case than now. Six weeks into his campaign, Sanders has gained the kind of momentum few expected from the Vermont senator, establishing himself as the primary obstacle between Hillary Clinton and the Democratic ticket for the White House.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

His national poll rating has more than doubled, to over 10%, in little over a month. His rallies in Iowa and New Hampshire have been attracting crowds larger than any other candidate, Democrat or Republican. Hard copies of his memoir – mostly a dry recitation of a 1996 congressional race – are suddenly selling for more than $250 on Amazon.

The race for the 2016 presidential nomination is in its infancy, and Clinton remains the clear frontrunner by a margin most political analysts believe is all but unassailable. But Sanders is changing the contours of the race: the rise of a hard-left politician, long battling to to be heard from the sidelines, is now the first unexpected twist in the Democratic primary contest.

The Guardian has spoken to close to a dozen of Sanders' closest friends, family, confidants and operatives. They paint a picture of a politician who has spent a lifetime obsessed with the same issues that still drive him today, and is now wrestling with the demands of a 2016 presidential race.

For his part, Sanders suggested in an interview with the Guardian that some of his policies remain a work in progress, but rejected the notion that his surge in popularity should come as a surprise. "I am a United States senator, I did win my last election with 71% of the vote," he said last week. "So it's not just like someone just walked in off the street and suddenly they're Hillary Clinton's main challenger. We've been doing this for a few years."

The unquenchable optimism of an electric young politician

Sanders was born in Brooklyn, New York, in 1941, into a family struggling to get by on the low wage of his father, a Polish immigrant and paint salesman. "That created tensions for our parents, and that was an important part of our life," said the senator's 80-year-old brother, Larry, who now lives in Oxford, England, where he recently stood as a parliamentary candidate for the Green party.

Larry Sanders recalled his brother's first foray into politics, some time in the late 1950s, when he ran for election to be class president at James Madison high school. Sanders lost, but found consolation in defeat. "The student who won ended up adopting Bernie's policy about raising money for Korean orphans," Larry said.

The consensus in Washington is that the best Sanders can hope for is a similar outcome in 2016, using a campaign that will almost certainly end in defeat in order to pull Clinton to the left. The MIT academic Noam Chomsky, who was personally invited by Sanders to give a speech at Burlington city hall in 1985, gave a similar assessment.

"I am glad that he's doing it," Chomsky said, arguing that Sanders' presidential campaign would promote ideas that are rarely part of mainstream political discourse. "But the chances of him winning at the primary, or even at the national level, are virtually nil in our system, which is not a democracy but a plutocracy."

Sanders told the Guardian he was "not as pessimistic as Noam is". "He's right, we live in an increasingly oligarchic form of society, where billionaires are able to buy elections and candidates, and it is very difficult, not just for Bernie Sanders but for any candidate who represents working families," the senator said. "But I think the situation is not totally hopeless, and I think we do have a shot to win this thing."

That unquenchable optimism has always been a part of Sanders' career, and was perhaps forged in the 1970s, the first major chapter of his political life. Working as a youth counsellor and carpenter, Sanders ran in four consecutive US senate and gubernatorial elections, representing Liberty Union, a socialist party born from the anti-Vietnam war protests.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He lost every election he stood in, never winning more than the 6% of votes he secured in a 1976 gubernatorial race. But these early campaigns gave Sanders an opportunity to advance his stridently progressive agenda.

One press release – from a Senate race he contested in 1974 – proposes a radical solution to rising energy prices. “Bernard Sanders, the Liberty Union candidate for the United States Senate, today called for the public takeover of all privately owned electric companies in Vermont,” it stated.

The press release discovered by the Guardian is annotated and could be a draft, and it goes on to describe the policy as a “dollar and cents” proposal rather than a forced appropriation of the means of producing energy. (Electricity in other municipalities in America was, at the time, administered by public bodies.)

But that was never the kind of policy likely to win a statewide election in Vermont in the 1970s, which was still in a process of transitioning from a Republican-leaning state to the liberal haven it has become today.

Around 1976, Sanders left Liberty Union and spent a couple of years as an amateur historian and film-maker, selling educational film strips to schools across New England. His main project was a short documentary about his hero, Eugene Debs, an early 20th-century union leader who was a six-time presidential candidate for the Socialist party. (Sanders remains fascinated with historical figures and, sources close to the senator confirm, on the rare occasions he is not working, the senator spends hours on YouTube watching political documentaries and biopics.)

But that interest in the history of politics has rarely crossed over into theory. Then as now, according to friends, Sanders had a secret disdain for what he believed were doctrinaire academics who failed to ground their ideas in the real world.

Huck Gutman, the senator’s longtime friend – and, until 2012, his chief of staff – recently tried to persuade Sanders to engage with the work of Thomas Piketty, the French economist whose research into wealth inequality has received widespread acclaim. Sanders rolled his eyes and replied: “I got 30 seconds.”

Given his aversion to intellectuals, it is ironic that two of the senator’s best friends are leftwing academics at the University of Vermont.

One is Gutman, 71, an English professor. The other is Richard Sugarman, 70, who teaches Jewish philosophy and existentialism. Two Sundays ago, the trio was on a picnic bench in Burlington’s Ethan Allen park, reflecting on the hectic turn of events.

The previous day Sanders had been in Keene, New Hampshire. Like every other event the senator has attended since announcing his campaign, the town hall was packed.

Sanders spoke for an hour, railing against growing economic inequality, the corporate media, millionaires and billionaires, global warming, Barack Obama’s Pacific trade deal and the Iraq war. The Vermont senator promised equal pay for women, tuition-free colleges and universities, an equitable tax system, the right to healthcare for all, an expansion of social security for the elderly, and tough action against Wall Street banks.

Those lucky enough to have a seat spent much of the hour on their feet, in wave after wave of standing ovation, as Sanders laid out his platform in his trademark Brooklyn twang; sober, exasperated, always impassioned.

“The best president in the history of the world – somebody courageous, smart, bold – that person will not be able to address the major crises that we face unless there is a mass political movement, unless there’s a political revolution in this country," Sanders told his approving audience of more than 700 people.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The next day, on the picnic bench, Sanders was upbeat as he regaled his friends with a rundown of the event.

"It was busy in Keene," Sanders told the professors, according to Sugarman's account of the conversation. "You wouldn't believe how many people showed up."

"OK, good. Did they seem sympathetic?" Sugarman asked.

"Yeah, they seemed to get it," Sanders said. "They really seemed to get what was going on."

Not far from the park, Sanders' presidential campaign team was in the process of working out how best to tap into that surge of energy.

Money is pouring into the campaign coffers – in the first 24 hours after his campaign launch, Sanders raised $1.5m. The funds mostly came from small-money donors, but he still raised more than any other presidential candidate who has disclosed their first-day tally.

The donations have allowed the campaign to scale up in New Hampshire and Iowa, where Sanders opened an office this past weekend. The campaign has hired Revolution Messaging, the digital and social media firm that provided groundbreaking support to Barack Obama presidential campaign in 2008.

But the operation remains a fraction of the team hired by Clinton; one senior aide described the process of building a large campaign apparatus as "a very big challenge and one we're still working out". The top operatives on the Sanders team are – with one exception – Vermont old-timers who have been at the senator's side for most of his career.

The senator is anxious about expanding too quickly, and is reluctant to hire the many Washington-based political consultancies that have been knocking on his door. "He has concerns that as you run for president, everybody who is president wants business from you and dollars from you," Gutman said. "Both Richard and I said he should depend on his own good sense."

But winning election in the tiny state of Vermont is not the same as a nationwide presidential race. One of Sanders' campaign operatives, talking on the condition of anonymity, spoke of the moral incentive for a "50-state strategy", spreading resources more equitably across the country. Another acknowledges the difficulty of managing the boon in grassroots support, suggesting that Sanders supporters may need to be left to their own devices and "self-organise, organically".

Even Sanders, a disciplined politician who rarely deviates from his script, can give the impression he is still working out the finer points of the campaign.

Asked how he would transition the country from the Affordable Care Act, toward the universal, single-payer system he prefers for healthcare, Sanders seemed unsure. "That's a good question," he told the Guardian. "I can't give you a definitive answer." He added that he envisaged a system "kind of modelled on what the Canadians are doing".

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Pressed on his taxation policy, Sanders said he would “absolutely” make the income tax system more progressive, but declined to say precisely how much top-rate earners should pay on their income. “I don’t want to develop policy off the top of my head,” he said, pointing to the extensive work he had already done on legislation to close tax loopholes for corporations and tax Wall Street stock transfers. “We will come up with a progressive individual tax rate as well.”

It is hardly uncommon for presidential candidates to avoid taking detailed policy stances early on in their campaigns, although their hand can often be forced by rivals. On the picnic bench with Gutman and Sugarman, the senator discussed one of the more peculiar issues on which he may be asked take a stand: Rhode Island’s governor, Lincoln Chafee, was ridiculed earlier this month when he launched his campaign for the Democratic nomination with a pledge to transition America toward the metric system of measurement.

Both Gutman said Sugarman said they talked to the senator about whether he too should adopt the policy.

“No, absolutely not,” Sugarman said he told the senator. “Fight it. That will be our conservative, traditional, issue. You have got to have a few dialectical issues or you really are going to be a liberal moron.”

Michael Briggs, Sanders’ campaign spokesman, insisted the senator had “no recollection” of any discussion about the metric system.

It was Sugarman who, in 1981, persuaded Sanders to run for mayor of Burlington, the rural city 40 miles from the Canadian border where the pair were roommates.

Running as an independent, Sanders ended up winning the election by just 10 votes, dislodging the incumbent Democratic mayor in a victory that made national news.

Sanders was the only mayor in the entire country who was neither a Democrat nor a Republican, and one of the few self-described socialists to gain public office. Burlington’s political establishment was aghast. “It was like Trotsky had been elected mayor,” Sugarman recalled. “But it wasn’t Trotsky. It was Bernie.”

Sanders was re-elected mayor three times, laying the foundations for the statewide election that made him Vermont’s only congressman in 1990.

It has often been said that Sanders’ eight years in city hall, redeveloping Burlington’s waterfront and spurring a civic initiative to clear snow from the streets, turned him into a pragmatist attuned the needs of everyday people. But that is only half the story.

The University of Vermont’s library has a collection of archived papers from Sanders’ mayoral years. The documents, which include notes scribbled on the yellow legal pads that he still uses today, are contained in 50 boxes that, remarkably, have not been inspected since the senator announced his candidacy for president.

The files confirm how Sanders spent much of his time as would be expected of a small-city mayor, solving a garbage disposal problem, building a bike path and securing a minor league baseball team for Burlington. But they also reveal a concerted effort by Sanders to leverage his modest power base to affect change in places far away from Vermont.

The letters he sent to the Soviet Union, China, the UK and France, urging military disarmament in conjunction with the UN’s international disarmament week, was just one example of dozens of diplomatic initiatives from

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders, who used his perch at city hall to influence issues as diverse as apartheid in South Africa and the US invasion of Grenada.

In July 1981, the UK's prime minister, Margaret Thatcher, was informed that Burlington was "deeply disturbed" by what Sanders said was her government's abuse, humiliation and mistreatment of prisoners in northern Ireland. And when François Mitterrand announced a visit to the US later that year, Sanders wrote to the French president's wife, Danielle, inviting her to his "struggling socialist municipal government" in Vermont to speak on any topic of her choosing.

President Ronald Reagan was the recipient of several Sanders letters relating to international affairs, most of which concerned Nicaragua, where the US was covertly funding a guerrilla war against the leftwing Sandinista government. In 1985, Sanders actually travelled to Nicaragua, for the sixth anniversary of the Sandinista revolution, and met the country's president, Daniel Ortega.

In a letter addressed to the people of Nicaragua, penned in conjunction with that trip, Sanders denounced the activities of the Reagan administration, which he said was under the influence of large corporations. Burlington's mayor assured the Nicaraguan people that Americans "are fair minded people" who had more to offer "than the bombs and economic sabotage".

"In the long run, I am certain that you will win," Sanders wrote, "and that your heroic revolution against the Somoza dictatorship will be maintained and strengthened." Sanders was the highest-ranking American official to visit Nicaragua at that time, and returned to the US intent, it seems, on acting as emissary between the two countries.

In a letter to the White House, Sanders relayed that Ortega was willing to meet with Reagan "at any time or any place" to resolve the conflict. He also sought to enlist the help of the Democratic former president Jimmy Carter, telling him in a letter that he was highly thought of in Nicaragua. Sanders even invited Ortega to Burlington; the Nicaraguan leader politely declined.

The mayor's international expedition was hailed by leftwingers across the country, and cemented Burlington's reputation as a magnet for anti-establishment types. Chomsky was one of a long line of liberal thinkers, musicians and artists who flocked to the mountain city.

Another was Allen Ginsberg, who visited Burlington in February 1986; a handwritten and signed poem composed by the beatnik writer is also contained in Sanders' mayoral archives. (Entitled Burlington Snow, it begins with lines about "Socialist snow on the streets" and "Socialist kids sucking socialist lollipops", and ends: "Isn't this poem socialist? It doesn't belong to me anymore.")

Not everyone in Burlington appreciated the town's transition, under the supervision of a travelling, socialist mayor, into a people's republic. The WMNY-TV station put out an editorial that decried the mayor's "vacation" in Nicaragua as "absolutely shameful".

Sanders told the Guardian that he still stands by the international approach he took in Burlington, which was summed up in the mantra "think globally, act locally". "What you want to do is use your capabilities, whether you're a mayor, governor, senator or president – whatever it is – to make this world a better place," he said. "During my time as mayor, the United States was involved in the support of the contras in Nicaragua, something that I thought was part of the long-term Latin America policy in support of rightwing oligarchies and against the needs of the poor people of the continent."

Burlington's solidarity with the Sandinistas was cemented the year before the mayor's trip, when it formed a sister city relationship with the Nicaraguan coastal town of Puerto Cabezas.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When Sanders was mayor, Burlington formed an alliance with another city – in the Soviet Union. When Sanders traveled to Yaroslavl, 160 miles north-east of Moscow, in 1988, the trip doubled as a honeymoon with his new wife, Jane. Not much survived in terms of paperwork from that trip, although the mayoral archives do contain a tape recording of Sanders interviewing Yaroslavl's mayor on a boat somewhere on the Volga river.

After receiving a rundown of central planning, Soviet-style, from Yaroslavl's mayor, Alexander Riabkov, Sanders notes how the quality of both housing and healthcare in America appeared to be "significantly better" than in the communist state. "However," he added, "the cost of both services is much, much, higher in the United States."

The 'one percent' – 20 years ago

Burlington was by no means the only American city to develop cultural and education exchanges in the Soviet Union as the cold war drew to a close. But Sanders' broader embrace of international politics during his mayoral years was by his own admission unique, standing him apart from local elected officials elsewhere in the country.

He even visited Cuba – a highly unusual journey for any American in the 80s – hoping to meet with Fidel Castro. The encounter did not take place, although he did meet Havana's mayor at the time.

"A number of cities have nice waterfronts, good streets, honest police departments, and even minor league baseball," Sanders wrote in his memoir. "But how many cities of 10,000 have foreign policy? Well, we did."

Today it is rare to find Sanders talk about the plight of people overseas. That, friends say, is perhaps the most significant change he has witnessed in the senator's political career, as he has become less interested in international affairs.

Sanders has gradually taken a less keen interest in foreign policy; his politics have become more parochial, focused on the needs of everyday Americans. Gutman described the senator's evolution as becoming more aligned with the bread-and-butter interests of voters. "The way to succeed in politics is not to be excessively concerned about the people far away," he said.

Foreign policy barely got a mention in his presidential announcement speech in Burlington at the end of April, except for a reference to the senator's opposition to "an endless war in the Middle East". Sugarman said he recently discussed with Sanders the idea of making his campaign's foreign policy "an extension of his economic policy".

On the domestic front, in contrast, Sanders has remained resolute through four decades of political campaigning, sticking to the issues that underpinned his mayoral years. The central thrust of Sanders' message – about economic inequality and the corruption of political power – has never really changed.

Take almost any excerpt from his announcement address, and the thread can be traced back in time, often to a speech or article that is decades old but adopts the very same language.

He was comparing soaring corporate profits and the accumulation of wealth at the top with a decline in real terms wages of average workers in 1974, as a Liberty Union candidate for the US senate. He attacked "giant banks and multimillion-dollar corporations" in his inauguration speech in Burlington in 1981.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders first started speaking about the richest “one percent” – language now synonymous with the Occupy movement, since co-opted by mainstream politicians – as far back as 1996.

Asked on C-Span in 1988 what the socialist mayor of Burlington would like to see from the next president, Sanders replied that the ideal candidate would “recognise that we have an extreme disparity between rich and poor, that elections are bought and sold”. Those issues are the pillars of his bid for the White House in 2016.

Anguish, a choice, and a breakthrough at long last

So committed is Sanders to his beliefs about economic injustice that it almost convinced him not to stand for president.

In the months during which he was contemplating his run for the White House, Sanders reflected on the careers of other progressive politicians, past and present.

Despite a highly successful career defined outside the Democratic party, Sanders never contemplated following Ralph Nader’s example and running for president as an independent. Sanders was adamant he did not want to be a “spoiler”, sapping votes from whoever the Democratic presidential candidate is, in much the same way Nader did to Al Gore in 2000.

Another politician on his mind was Elizabeth Warren, the populist Massachusetts senator who was under intense pressure from the progressive wing of the Democratic party to mount a challenge against Clinton. Sanders’ friends remain divided over whether he would have run if Warren had decided to be a candidate. Sugarman suggested his friend would not have entered the race, saying that had Warren run, she would have saved the Vermont senator “a lot of anguish”.

“People needed to feel as though they had a choice,” Sugarman said, explaining his friend’s thinking. “He felt these issues had to come to the fore.”

Yet even then, there was a third politician Sanders had in mind when he was considering whether to run. “He didn’t want to be Chris Dodd,” Gutman said, referring to the Connecticut senator who came last in the 2008 Democratic primary contest.

Sanders was not worried about what an embarrassing defeat would mean for him personally – his concern, friends say, was the damage such a defeat could inflict on the cause of economic justice in America.

“What he was saying over and over again was that he had a responsibility to the ideas that he represents,” his brother Larry said. “If he went in and he was badly beaten and humiliated, he could take it. But it would be a setback to those ideas, and the people who need those ideas.”

That fear, so far at least, appears to have been unfounded. In just the latest example of his rising standing among Democrats, a Suffolk University poll released on Tuesday showed the Vermont senator receiving 31% of support among New Hampshire primary voters – just 10 points behind Clinton.

It is a stunning endorsement of Sanders, who has been beating the same drum, mostly in vain, for close to half a century. Now, in the twilight of his career – and very possibly at its pinnacle – the reverberations are starting to be heard.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Sadly enough, I suppose, the world has caught up with what I have been saying for many years," the senator told the Guardian, adding that he was, perhaps, "a bit ahead of his time".

"People are now saying, wait a minute, this is absurd, this is unsustainable, this is a rigged economy," Sanders said. "And people are now demanding change."

CHAFEE

Only Lincoln Chafee Knows Which Woman Should Be on the $10 Bill // Bloomberg // Emily Greenhouse – June 19, 2015

It's not exactly up there with immigration, trade, and abortion for controversy: Treasury Secretary Jacob Lew's announcement earlier this week that a redesigned $10 bill will feature a portrait of a woman is one of the few feel-good stories of the summer. The decision was roundly welcomed. And yet the 2016 presidential candidates are having a hard time taking a stand.

Plenty of names have been floated by advocates agitating for the government to put the face of a woman on paper currency. The organization Women on 20s, through a voting process narrowed the final four to abolitionist leader Harriet Tubman, civil-rights icon Rosa Parks, Cherokee Nation chief Wilma Mankiller, and First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt. (Their primary round included Alice Paul, Betty Friedan, Shirley Chisholm, Sojourner Truth, Rachel Carson, Rosa Parks, Barbara Jordan, Margaret Sanger, Patsy Mink, Clara Barton, Harriet Tubman, Frances Perkins, Susan B. Anthony, Eleanor Roosevelt and Elizabeth Cady Stanton. The group's website offered fifteen, and then another seventy, more.)

New Hampshire Senator Jeanne Shaheen, who introduced an official Women on the Twenty Act into Congress, last month said she'd love to see a woman who had actually served in government on the bill, and suggested Frances Perkins, the first woman appointed to the U.S. Cabinet and the longest-serving secretary of labor. But the nation's would-be leaders refused to pick—perhaps because each has his or her own constituency.

Of a considerable slate of assumed and declared presidential hopefuls, only one reached by Bloomberg Politics would name a preference: former Rhode Island Senator Lincoln Chafee, who through a representative selected Rachel Carson, the marine biologist whose landmark book Silent Spring did much to advance the environmental movement.

A spokesperson for former Virginia Senator Jim Webb declined to answer, because the candidate was at his daughter's graduation, but offered the following: "As a very proud Dad of his daughter graduating high school today I'd guess he would put her on the bill."

And that was, more or less, it. A representative for New Jersey Governor Chris Christie replied, "Thanks for reaching out. I won't have a response in time for your deadline, but thank you again for the opportunity." (Bloomberg had not specified a particular deadline.) A spokesperson for Donald Trump expressed thanks for "offering to include us," but said "we will pass on this one." Same from Kentucky Senator Rand Paul's campaign: "We'll pass. Thanks."

Bloomberg did not hear back from representatives for former Florida Governor Jeb Bush, former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee, Senator Ted Cruz, Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker—or even Carly Fiorina, whose campaign has made so much of gender and the importance of boosting women.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What about the woman who seems closest to becoming the first American woman president, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton?

A Clinton spokesperson, after a day-long waiting period, sent the following statement to Bloomberg:

Putting a woman on the $10 bill is a long overdue step toward recognizing the tremendous impact women have had on the history of our country. We're looking forward to seeing which woman is selected by U.S. Department of Treasury – but there's no doubt that they have a long list to choose from.

That's it? The woman hoping to run the country, who has articulated her admiration for Eleanor Roosevelt and Rosa Parks, to name just two, replies: Let's leave it to a man.

Good luck with that, Mr. Lew.

UNDECLARED

WEBB

Jim Webb to speak to Clinton County Democrats // Des Moines Register // Jason Noble – June 19, 2015

Former U.S. Sen. Jim Webb, a potential Democratic presidential candidate, will speak at the Clinton County Democrats' annual Hall of Fame Dinner next Friday in eastern Iowa.

Webb has not formally declared his candidacy, but is exploring a run in 2016 and has visited Iowa several times over the last few months.

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders are officially seeking the Democratic nomination. Clinton is seen as the frontrunner both in Iowa — home of the first-in-the-nation presidential caucuses — and nationally.

The Clinton County Democrats Hall of Fame Dinner is scheduled for 6:30 p.m. on June 26 at Gil's Ballroom in Clinton. Tickets are $30.

OTHER

'Ridin' With Biden' in 2016, but So Far the Vice President's Not Aboard // NYT // Peter Baker – June 19, 2015

On the whiteboard at campaign headquarters in a spartan downtown office are listed the day's tasks. No. 1: "Send out bumper stickers."

Those would be the "I'm Ridin' With Biden" bumper stickers featuring the vice president of the United States in his signature aviator sunglasses behind the wheel of a favorite muscle car with a slightly mischievous grin on his face.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Never mind that Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr. is not for the moment actually running for president. The founders of the Draft Biden 2016 committee refuse to take probably not for an answer. And in this spare office with a shuffleboard table but no televisions, a handful of Democratic activists is trying to build the unlikely nucleus of an unlikely presidency.

Theirs is not exactly a political juggernaut. During a recruiting trip to a Democratic event in South Carolina, some who encountered the Draft Biden movement asked if it was a beer. Mr. Biden has not endorsed the effort, nor called or visited or publicly acknowledged its existence. The closest the team of activists has come to the vice president during this campaign season is the life-size cardboard cutout figure of Mr. Biden in the corner of their office.

But Will Pierce and his band of Bidenistas argue that the vice president is the best Democrat to carry on the legacy of President Obama and they are working overtime to convince him of that. They have collected more than 81,000 petition signatures, sponsored house parties, secured endorsements, made fund-raising calls, issued news releases and, on Saturday, will sponsor a rally in Davenport, Iowa, all in the hope of luring the vice president into the race.

“We’re bringing on more people. We just want to show the vice president the support he has,” said Mr. Pierce, 27, an Army Reserve captain who served in Iraq and started the draft committee this spring. “When and if he gets into the race, he’ll have a foundation. He’ll have some endorsers. He’ll have a grass-roots organization ready to go.”

The draft committee reflects an undercurrent of discontent in the Democratic Party with the idea of former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton gliding to the nomination. The momentum shown by the long-shot candidacy of Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont has encouraged those in the party who want a choice.

“We’re trying to engage Democrats who up until this point have felt disengaged by a coronation,” said Joseph Schweitzer, 26, who serves as the Draft Biden committee’s finance director.

Mr. Biden has not ruled out a campaign, but he has given no indication that he is serious about running either. In recent months, he has been consumed by family crisis as his elder son, Joseph R. Biden III, known as Beau, battled brain cancer and died last month.

Since his son’s death, the vice president has spent most of his time with his family at home in Wilmington, Del., but he has made several forays to Washington in recent days wearing a simple black rosary with a religious medal on his wrist. Some who saw him at the White House said he seemed eager to get back into a work routine.

Some Democrats wonder whether Mr. Biden, 72, who served 36 years in the Senate and ran for president in 1988 and 2008, might emerge from the tragedy recommitted to public service and give another look at a third presidential bid. But several people close to Mr. Biden said they saw no real chance that he would run absent an unforeseen development taking Mrs. Clinton out of the race.

Still, unlike Senator Elizabeth Warren, the Massachusetts Democrat who consistently said she was not running despite a draft effort, Mr. Biden has not definitively said no, instead promising a decision by the end of summer. As long as he is not telling them to stop, the Democratic activists here in Chicago figure the door remains open.

Mr. Pierce said the committee got its start in his living room a few months ago when he sent out an email to 2,000 people arguing for a Biden presidential bid. He then went to the gym to work out.

“I came back and when I saw my email” there were “all these people who said, ‘We want to get involved,’” he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Since then, it’s just taken off.”

Like the others on the committee, Mr. Pierce has no strong ties to Mr. Biden. He did some motorcade advance work for the vice president and his wife. Most of the 10 or so others who work full-time for the committee — about half a dozen are paid — have worked on Democratic campaigns, usually in field work or fund-raising. Ahmed Khan, 31, the communications director, ran unsuccessfully for Chicago alderman and worked for three successive challengers to Mayor Rahm Emanuel.

But none of them served in senior positions with the Obama-Biden team, and only a few have met Mr. Biden in passing once or twice at events. Mr. Biden’s advisers said they learned about the draft committee only when it announced its formation.

The activists hope to collect 500,000 petition signatures by the end of summer and have been raising money, although they will not say how much until the next required reporting period. (“We haven’t found our billionaire yet,” Mr. Schweitzer allowed.) Their focus has been on enlisting supporters from Mr. Biden’s past campaigns.

They showed up one day a couple months ago in the office of Roxanna Moritz, the elected auditor of Scott County, Iowa’s third most populous county, and won her support. “I love the fact that Biden tells it like it is,” she said by telephone from Davenport, the county seat. “I don’t believe you have to be charismatic and do the fluff. I really want to know how that person feels. And while he’s sometimes too blunt, I know it’s coming from his heart and his mind. I like that about him.”

Mr. Biden is way behind Mrs. Clinton in any theoretical matchups and few independent analysts see him as a serious threat. But he does have a reservoir of good will among Democrats. A New York Times/CBS News survey in early May found that 53 percent of registered Democratic voters would consider voting for Mr. Biden versus 85 percent who would consider voting for Mrs. Clinton.

“As soon as he were to hint or even drop a line to anybody that had a say, I think that poll number would go far up and we wouldn’t have a problem about viability or electability,” Mr. Khan said.

Chasing Clinton, Sanders and O’Malley Court Teachers Unions // US News and World Report // Allie Bidwell – June 19, 2015

The nation's two largest teachers unions are in the thick of their 2016 presidential endorsement processes, having met with the three major Democratic candidates who have announced their candidacies.

On Thursday, Sen. Bernie Sanders – an independent from Vermont running for the Democratic nomination – and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley met with Lily Eskelsen Garcia, president of the National Education Association. Both the NEA and the American Federation of Teachers – the nation's largest teachers union after the NEA – now have heard from O'Malley, Sanders and front-runner Hillary Clinton at a time when the party each hopes to represent in the White House is divided over how to improve K-12 education in America.

Hillary Clinton and the Democratic Divide on Education

"We are asking the tough questions that get to the heart of the issues that educators, their students and families are facing every day. They see what is happening in their schools and communities. They know that all students deserve the support, tools and time to learn," Eskelsen Garcia said in a statement. "But are politicians willing to commit to the success of every student regardless of his or her ZIP code? That is the key question that educators will ask over and over again."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So far, all three candidates have focused on framing education as an economic imperative that creates the clearest path to the middle class. They've also put a focus on the needs to reduce standardized testing in schools and empower teachers – desires the unions share – while staying away from more controversial topics such as teacher tenure and evaluation systems, school choice and Common Core.

Sanders is the only candidate so far to focus on problems with No Child Left Behind in his remarks to the unions, according to excerpts provided by the NEA and AFT.

Sanders, who serves on the Senate education committee, said there are few others as opposed as he is to the sweeping education law – which Congress is attempting to update – and to "this absurd effort to force teachers to spend half of their lives teaching kids how to take tests."

"If I have anything to say in the coming months, we would end [No Child Left Behind]," Sanders told Eskelsen Garcia.

NEA President Lily Eskelsen García met with former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley on Thursday as part of the association's recommendation process for the 2016 presidential campaign.

National Education Association President Lily Eskelsen García speaks with former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley on Thursday at the association's headquarters in Washington.

Both candidates also made the overuse of standardized testing a focus of their NEA remarks.

Sanders said it's important to "look at the whole child," and to give teachers more flexibility to work with their students.

"Teaching kids just to take [a] test in my view does not go far enough," Sanders said.

O'Malley, too, said there needs to be a more holistic approach to teaching.

"Increasing the frequency of tests doesn't necessarily increase the quality of education," O'Malley said. "We have to be mindful of the whole child – their development, their nutrition, their health. Learning is about more than that feedback loop of tests and quizzes."

O'Malley used his remarks to focus on his time as governor, saying that during his tenure from 2007 to 2015, Maryland "made public education a priority by partnering with teachers, and by not doing less but by doing more." He also defended the federal government's role in K-12 education, which lawmakers on both sides of the aisle have said needs to be scaled back to some extent.

"No child is a spare American. In Maryland, we came together to forge the consensus to make the investments at the state level to give our children the quality education they deserve," O'Malley said. "There's so much the federal government can do better in education, but we won't do better if we insist on doing less, not more."

Sanders and O'Malley are far behind Clinton in early polling, though Sanders has showed some momentum of late, trailing Clinton by 10 points in a recent Suffolk University poll of New Hampshire.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What Did O'Malley and Sanders Tell the NEA? // Ed Week // Alyson Klein – June 18, 2015

The National Education Association is getting started early on its 2016 presidential endorsement process. The union's president, Lily Eskelsen Garcia, has already met with Hillary Rodham Clinton, the former U.S. Secretary of State, U.S. Senator, and a contender for the Democratic nod.

And Thursday, the union met with two more candidates for the Democratic nomination: Martin O'Malley, the former Maryland governor, and U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, who is technically an Independent, identifies as a socialist, but is running as a Democrat anyway.

Dying to know what did the two leading, Non-Hillary Democratic candidates in the race have to say for themselves on education? Luckily NEA sent around some excerpts.

Under O'Malley, Maryland won a Race to the Top grant, changed its teacher evaluation laws to better incorporate student test data, and it is a leader in one of the two consortia offering tests aligned to Common Core State Standards. But he didn't emphasize those things to the NEA, at least not in the remarks the union sent around.

Instead, he talked about the limitations of testing. And he stuck up for the federal role in K-12, which isn't so popular these days:

"We need to do a better job of listening to the people who are doing the job. I've never believed one could make teachers the enemy and expect to improve student and classroom outcomes.

"The issue of more time in the classroom is related to this holistic approach about how we educate children. Increasing the frequency of tests doesn't necessarily increase the quality of education. We have to be mindful of the whole child—their development, their nutrition, their health. Learning is about more than that feedback loop of tests and quizzes.

"As president I would make education funding an economic issue and continue to spread that understanding that the more a child learns, the more that child will earn and the better for our entire economy. As governor, we made public education a priority by partnering with teachers, and by not doing less but by doing more."

"No child is a spare American. In Maryland, we came together to forge the consensus to make the investments at the state level to give our children the quality education they deserve. There's so much the federal government can do better in education, but we won't do better if we insist on doing less, not more."

Sanders, meanwhile, has been one of the most outspoken Democratic critics of the Obama administration's competitive grants. But, in his remarks, he hit mostly on his distaste for the No Child Left Behind Act, which is on its last legs anyway:

"I am running for president of the United States to start a political revolution. We have the most unequal distribution of wealth and income in the country since 1929. The great middle class has been disappearing. The American dream is disappearing. We have priorities that are absolutely backwards. There are 45 million Americans living in poverty. A teacher at a recent town hall meeting told me that 90 percent of her students are eligible for free and reduced lunch. This is not what America is about.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Our country belongs to all of us, not just billionaires. No president can take care of all the problems facing Americans today alone. We need a movement of working people, of middle-class people, to stand up right now. If we don't, I worry about the future of our children and grandchildren.

"As I sit on the Senate education committee, it's fair to say that there are few people on the committee who are as opposed to No Child Left Behind and as opposed to this absurd effort to force teachers to spend half of their lives teaching kids how to take tests. If I have anything to say in the coming months we would end NCLB.

"If elected president, we are going to look at the whole child. We are going to give teachers the opportunity and freedom to work with kids in any and all ways to improve their lives and to give them the best possible education. Teaching kids just to take tests in my view does not go far enough."

For those keeping score at home, NEA and the American Federation of Teachers have each met with Clinton, Sanders, and O'Malley. The NEA doesn't have any other meetings scheduled just yet, but it's still early in the union's endorsement process.

It's worth noting that when he ran for president back in 2007, Mike Huckabee, the former governor of Arkansas and a GOP candidate again this time, took the NEA's endorsement process seriously, and wound up getting the stamp of approval of the union's New Hampshire affiliate, which turned out to be a mixed blessing for him.

Also, back in the 2008 season, the union didn't elect to endorse in either the GOP or Democratic primaries.

Still, it will be the biggest edu-political surprise of the year if either union endorses anyone but frontrunner Clinton, who is continuing to hit education on the campaign trail.

She told the National Conference of Latino Elected Officials in Las Vegas Thursday about her plan to move toward universal preschool, expand college access, and staff "our primary and secondary schools with K-12 teachers who are second to none in the world, and get the respect they deserve for sparking the love of learning in every child."

GOP

DECLARED

BUSH

Voodoo, Jeb! Style // NYT // Paul Krugman – June 19, 2015

On Monday Jeb Bush — or I guess that's Jeb!, since he seems to have decided to replace his family name with a punctuation mark — finally made his campaign for the White House official, and gave us a first view of his policy goals. First, he says that if elected he would double America's rate of economic growth to 4 percent. Second, he would make it possible for every American to lose as much weight as he or she wants, without any need for dieting or exercise.

O.K., he didn't actually make that second promise. But he might as well have. It would have been just as realistic as promising 4 percent growth, and considerably less irresponsible.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I'll get to Jeb!onomics in a minute, but first let me tell you about a dirty little secret of economics — namely, that we don't know very much about how to raise the long-run rate of economic growth. Economists do know how to promote recovery from temporary slumps, even if politicians usually refuse to take their advice. But once the economy is near full employment, further growth depends on raising output per worker. And while there are things that might help make that happen, the truth is that nobody knows how to conjure up rapid productivity gains.

Why, then, would Mr. Bush imagine that he is privy to secrets that have evaded everyone else?

One answer, which is actually kind of funny, is that he believes that the growth in Florida's economy during his time as governor offers a role model for the nation as a whole. Why is that funny? Because everyone except Mr. Bush knows that, during those years, Florida was booming thanks to the mother of all housing bubbles. When the bubble burst, the state plunged into a deep slump, much worse than that in the nation as a whole. Taking the boom and the slump together, Florida's longer-term economic performance has, if anything, been slightly worse than the national average.

The key to Mr. Bush's record of success, then, was good political timing: He managed to leave office before the unsustainable nature of the boom he now invokes became obvious.

But Mr. Bush's economic promises reflect more than self-aggrandizement. They also reflect his party's habit of boasting about its ability to deliver rapid economic growth, even though there's no evidence at all to justify such boasts. It's as if a bunch of relatively short men made a regular practice of swaggering around, telling everyone they see that they're 6 feet 2 inches tall.

To be more specific, the next time you encounter some conservative going on about growth, you might want to bring up the following list of names and numbers: Bill Clinton, 3.7; Ronald Reagan, 3.4; Barack Obama, 2.1; George H.W. Bush, 2.0; George W. Bush, 1.6. Yes, that's the last five presidents — and the average rate of growth of the U.S. economy during their time in office (so far, in Mr. Obama's case). Obviously, the raw numbers don't tell the whole story, but surely there's nothing in that list to suggest that conservatives possess some kind of miracle cure for economic sluggishness. And, as many have pointed out, if Jeb! knows the secret to 4 percent growth, why didn't he tell his father and brother?

Or consider the experience of Kansas, where Gov. Sam Brownback pushed through radical tax cuts that were supposed to drive rapid economic growth. "We'll see how it works. We'll have a real live experiment," he declared. And the results of the experiment are now in: The promised boom never arrived, big deficits did, and, despite savage cuts to schools and other public services, Kansas eventually had to raise taxes again (with the pain concentrated on lower-income residents).

Why, then, all the boasting about growth? The short answer, surely, is that it's mainly about finding ways to sell tax cuts for the wealthy. Such cuts are unpopular in and of themselves, and even more so if, like the Kansas tax cuts for businesses and the affluent, they must be paid for with higher taxes on working families and/or cuts in popular government programs. Yet low taxes on the rich are an overriding policy priority on the right — and promises of growth miracles let conservatives claim that everyone will benefit from trickle-down, and maybe even that tax cuts will pay for themselves.

There is, of course, a term for basing a national program on this kind of self-serving (and plutocrat-serving) wishful thinking. Way back in 1980, George H.W. Bush, running against Reagan for the presidential nomination, famously called it "voodoo economic policy." And while Reaganolatry is now obligatory in the G.O.P., the truth is that he was right.

So what does it say about the state of the party that Mr. Bush's son — often portrayed as the moderate, reasonable member of the family — has chosen to make himself a high priest of voodoo economics? Nothing good.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jeb Bush Pledges Debate on Gay Marriage After Court Ruling // NYT // Jeremy Peters – June 19, 2015

Jeb Bush told a gathering of religious conservatives on Friday that the debate over same-sex marriage should continue on "irrespective of what the courts say," signaling that he would not consider a Supreme Court decision favorable to gay rights as the last word on the issue.

With the court expected to rule before the end of the month on the question of whether gay and lesbian couples have a constitutional right to marry, one of the looming questions for Mr. Bush and the other Republicans running for president is how aggressively they will respond.

There are many in the Republican Party who have hinted that they would rather the issue simply go away. And while they may prefer the court not invalidate state laws that limit marriage to heterosexual couples, they would welcome a decision that settles the issue once and for all.

In his comments to the Faith and Freedom Coalition's Road to Majority Conference in Washington, Mr. Bush, the former governor of Florida, said he was not content letting the issue fade away.

"It's got to be important over the long haul, irrespective of what the courts say," he said.

He added: "We need to make sure that we protect the right not just of having religious views, but the right of acting on those religious views."

"Conscience should also be respected for people of faith who want to take a stand for traditional marriage," he said.

Mr. Bush, who also stressed in the speech the role that his Catholicism plays in his life as both a private citizen and a public servant, extolled the importance of raising children in families with heterosexual parents.

"In a country like ours we should recognize the power of a man and a woman loving their children with all their heart and soul as a good thing, as something that is positive and helpful for those children to live a successful life," he said.

Mr. Bush has not yet addressed a question that seems likely to divide Republicans if the Supreme Court rules in favor of same-sex couples: Should there be renewed push for a constitutional amendment that limits marriage to one man and one woman?

Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin recently said that he would support such an amendment, as have several of the other Republican presidential candidates who are running as social conservatives, like former Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas, former Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania and Senator Ted Cruz of Texas.

At least two, Senator Marco Rubio of Florida and Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky, do not support such an amendment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jeb Bush's slam against Washington, D.C. // WaPo // Glenn Kessler – June 19, 2015

"This morning I was in Washington, Iowa. Washington, Iowa, is a little different than Washington, D.C. It's pretty, the people there are hard-working, they don't think that they're the masters of people. It's not the most prosperous place in the world, in the United States. Sadly, Washington, D.C., is. I don't know if you know this — Washington, D.C., has the highest per capita income in the United States. Washington, D.C., has average home values of $800,000. Washington, D.C., doesn't have unemployment. Washington, D.C., has federal workers making significantly more than the private sector workers for lifetime jobs. Washington truly believes that it is the master of us, rather than its servant. And the next president of the United States needs to reverse that trend and put it back where it should be which is our servant focused on doing fewer things, but doing them much, much better."

— Former Florida governor Jeb Bush (R), speaking in Pella, Iowa, June 17, 2015

It is a time-honored tradition for politicians to attack Washington, D.C. But they need to get their facts straight when they do so. So how does Bush fare with four of the factoid he tossed out in a speech to voters in Iowa, as he tried to make the case that the District is the 'most prosperous place' in the United States?

The Facts

'Washington, D.C. has the highest per capita income in the United States'

This claim struck us as a little odd, given that a number of metro areas generally are often ranked higher than the Washington, D.C., area. The Bureau of Economic Analysis, a unit of the Commerce Department, says the Washington D.C., metro area ranks 10th, with a per capita personal income of $73,461 in 2013.

By contrast, Midland, Tex. ranks the highest, with income of $129,193, followed by cities such as San Jose, ($100,115), Bridgeport ($93,404), San Francisco (78,844), Seattle ($74,701) and Boston ($74,701). So the D.C. area is certainly near the top — the per capita figure for all 381 metro areas is $52,093 — but not the "highest," as Bush claimed.

The Bush campaign, however, pointed to other BEA data at the state level, which at first glance appears to show the "District of Columbia" with a 2014 per capital income of $76,532, higher than the state of Connecticut, with $62,467. But the District is not a state, and BEA officials note that this table includes the District but does not rank it. Connecticut is ranked as number 1. So it's incorrect for the Bush campaign to claim that this table shows that Washington, D.C., has the highest per capital income in the United States.

The District's per capita income simply should not be measured against other states; it's a city.

'Washington, D.C., has average home values of $800,000'

The key word here is "average." The Bush campaign pointed to a 2014 article quoting the D.C. chief financial officer as saying the average price will hit $813,600 in 2015. But a more recent 2015 forecast shows that the average price was $736,400 in 2014 and is projected to be $771,200 in 2015.

The median price, according to the article, is around $600,000. Zillow pegs the median price at nearly $500,000. (The median is the middle value, with an equal number of data values larger and smaller.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So D.C. house prices are high, but not quite as high as Bush claimed.

'Washington, D.C., doesn't have unemployment'

This is a strange quote when talking about a city with a 7.5 percent unemployment rate (compared to Iowa's 3.8 percent.) A Bush spokesman explained that "the point the Governor is trying to make is that D.C. is a boomtown where many more people are moving to find jobs off of Government largess." He noted from December 2007 (when the Great Recession started) to today, the District has had a 9 percent increase in the number of nonfarm employees, compared to 2 percent for the entire United States, according to the Bureau of labor Statistics.

Okay, so Bush misspoke. We don't try to play gotcha here at The Fact Checker. But if Bush is talking about people with jobs in the federal government, then he's looking at the wrong set of data. The growth of federal jobs in this period was just about 8,000, or 4 percent, the BLS says. The real growth in jobs – about 63,000, or nearly 14 percent – came in private industry.

'Washington, D.C., has federal workers making significantly more than the private sector workers for lifetime jobs'

This is where Bush is on the strongest ground. His campaign cites a 2012 Congressional Budget Office report that estimated that "on average for workers at all levels of education, the cost of hourly benefits was 48 percent higher for federal civilian employees than for private-sector employees with certain similar observable characteristics."

If benefits are included, "overall, the federal government paid 16 percent more in total compensation than it would have if average compensation had been comparable with that in the private sector, after accounting for certain observable characteristics of workers."

Workers with professional degrees tend to earn about 23 percent less than their private-sector counterparts, but they make up only 7 percent of federal workers, CBO said. Workers with bachelor's degrees tended to earn about the same as private sector workers, but workers with no more than a high school degree tended to earn about 21 percent more, on average.

The Pinocchio Test

Bush would have done better if he had not gotten off-track with some of his specifics. The Washington area does have one of the highest per capita income levels, but not the highest. Meanwhile, the District has a relatively high unemployment rate, while the growth in jobs has been in the private sector, not in the federal government. He's right that home prices are high, if not quite $800,000. And the CBO confirms that federal salaries are much higher, on average, compared to private-sector workers.

Overall, Bush earns Two Pinocchios.

Like grandfather, like father, like son: Jeb Bush Jr. joins the campaign fray // WaPo // Ed O'Keefe – June 19, 2015

As his father was on stage here fielding questions from the crowd, Jeb Bush Jr., the third and youngest son of Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush, was playing the role of seat filler.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He sat listening from the bleachers and later hung back quietly as the candidate posed for pictures with admirers. Earlier in the day in another town, he watched from a distance, arms crossed, as his father pitched Iowa Republicans for the first time as an official candidate.

John Ellis Bush Jr. is nicknamed Jebby — though he prefers Jeb — or "2.0," as some campaign aides call him. The 31-year-old serves as a frequent travel companion and active campaign surrogate for his father, with a focus on building support among Hispanic and millennial voters.

It is a role once played by Jeb Bush himself for his father, George H.W. Bush, and for his brother, George W. Bush.

Jeb Bush's oldest son, George P. Bush, the 39-year-old Texas land commissioner, will play a limited role because of his day job. His daughter, Noelle, 37, and his wife, Columba, aren't expected to make many appearances. When asked this week, Jeb Bush suggested that his older brother might not campaign with him, either.

Jeb Bush waits to speak to a crowd of supporters in Pella, Iowa. His son, Jeb Jr., second

But Jeb Jr. has been close to his father for several years. They shared a Miami office suite, where they ran Jeb Bush & Associates, a consulting firm that focused on the health-care, technology, energy and real estate sectors.

After deciding last year to run for president, his father divested his business interests and left his son to run a few projects on his own.

"I basically told him I was all in and happy to do whatever he wanted me to," Jeb Jr. said this week in his first extended interview. He said his father's initial response was: "You should focus on making money and having more grandkids."

Speaking with reporters this week, the candidate pulled Jeb Jr. in close and said: "My advice is to have fun, do it with joy in your heart, don't get too wonky. Use the kind of humor that he's got to take me down a notch or two."

Jeb Jr. has already served as his father's liaison to major GOP fundraising events and has headlined fundraisers for younger donors at Miami nightclubs, Washington restaurants and New York apartments.

"As Dad has said, we're organizing the win and taking every state seriously," he said. "It's a huge effort. That's one thing I've learned so far: how much of a massive effort this takes. Not only to potentially win a primary, but win a general. And also actually to get something done when you get there. It's a huge, long process that takes a massive organization."

Kent Lucken, a Bush supporter and Boston-based banker who is helping the campaign, said he was impressed by the younger Bush's demeanor at a Utah conference hosted last weekend by 2012 GOP presidential candidate Mitt Romney.

Active in Florida politics, Jeb Bush Jr. endorsed Marco Rubio, left, for Florida's open Senate seat in April 2010. (AP/J. Pat Carter) (J Pat Carter/ASSOCIATED PRESS)

"I couldn't get over how he's picked up his father's tone, his respectful manner," he said. "He can speak like his dad. He's been with him side-by-side for seven years doing business deals. Most fathers don't spend seven years with their sons next to them like this."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Bushes are part of a long tradition of large political families helping a sibling or parent become president. Rose Fitzgerald Kennedy and her children met with small groups of female voters as her son, John F. Kennedy, campaigned for president in 1960. Romney's five sons used an RV to tour Iowa's 99 counties in 2008 and fanned out across the country for their father in 2012. Chelsea Clinton didn't play an active role in Bill Clinton's 1992 or 1996 campaigns, but she is expected to help Hillary Rodham Clinton in the coming year.

Jeb Bush's first taste of presidential politics came in 1980, when his father sent him to Puerto Rico to help win the island's first GOP primary. The three other Bush sons, George W., Marvin and Neil, also campaigned for their father that year in Iowa and New Hampshire. The family did it again in 1988 and 1992, and for George W. Bush in 2000 and 2004.

George P. Bush and Jeb Bush Jr. first dabbled in politics through MAVPAC, a committee launched by veterans of George W. Bush's administration to help fund GOP campaigns. Jeb Jr. has been especially active in South Florida: He campaigned for Marco Rubio during his 2010 U.S. Senate campaign and has been mentioned as a possible candidate for several positions. For now, Jeb Jr. said, he's more interested in charitable work with St. Jude's Children's Hospital and helping his father.

Little has bothered him about the media coverage of his father, he said, but he is plagued by "the anxiety of people not knowing his record and who he is as Jeb."

So Jeb Jr. is trying to build out his father's personal history. At fundraisers hosted by Right to Rise USA, the super PAC supporting his father's candidacy, he told younger crowds that his dad is a fan of "Talladega Nights: The Ballad of Ricky Bobby," the 2006 movie starring Will Ferrell, who is also known for his lampooning of George W. Bush. The former governor also likes country music, Al Green and Stevie Wonder, his son said. And with a mother who was born in Mexico, Spanish music often filled the Bush home.

"There was a lot of salsa, a lot of Luis Miguel," Jeb Jr. said, referring to the popular Mexican singer. "A little Cuban influence. But Mom was always big on the Luis Miguel."

"My mom still speaks to me in Spanish," he added. "I made the mistake of responding in English, so my Spanish is kind of intermediate. It should be fluent."

After growing up in Miami, he attended the University of Texas and earned a Latin American Studies degree — just like his father. Jeb Jr. had a brief run-in with the law in 2005, when he was arrested in Austin for public intoxication and resisting arrest.

Now he lives near his parents with his wife, Sandra. She was born in Canada and is of Iraqi descent; they met in London when he was traveling on business. Together they speak to their two young daughters in English, Arabic and Spanish.

In a bilingual interview with ABC News this week, Jeb Bush marveled at how his young granddaughters are learning three languages. "It's a very American mix," he said in Spanish.

Five myths about Jeb Bush // WaPo // Brian E. Crowley – June 19, 2015

The nation has the chance to vote for another Bush now that Jeb has declared his candidacy for president. Though his last name is one of the most famous in the country, much of the conventional wisdom about Bush is wrong, starting with his first name. (It's not actually Jeb.) Here are five other myths about the third child of George and Barbara.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

1. Jeb Bush is a moderate.

“Republican vanilla” was how Henry Olsen put it in National Review. Others have described Bush’s “ ‘very conservative’ problem” (National Journal), the right’s “wary” response to his candidacy (the Boston Globe), and similarities between him and Hillary Clinton (Laura Ingraham, who said they could “run on the same ticket”). At the heart of Bush’s supposedly moderate ideology: his support for Common Core and immigration reform.

While some conservatives disagree over those two issues, almost nothing in Bush’s record as governor suggests he’s a moderate. The notion puzzles Floridians who watched him govern for eight years, during which he pushed to disrupt public schools by establishing vouchers, grading schools and student performance, and creating charter schools. He reduced the size of state government, promoted tax cuts for the wealthy, passed tough-on-crime bills and bragged about helping Florida have more concealed-weapon permits than other states.

When Bush left office, “he was widely, unanimously, unambiguously regarded as the most conservative governor in the United States,” according to Steve Schmidt, who was Sen. John McCain’s senior campaign adviser in the 2008 presidential race. Darryl Paulson, a professor emeritus of government at the University of South Florida, said, “He governed as a conservative, and everyone in the Florida Republican Party considered him a conservative.” Orlando Sentinel columnist Scott Maxwell stated it more bluntly: “a union-busting, school-voucher-promoting, tax-cutting, gun-loving, Terri Schiavo-interfering, hard-core conservative.”

2. George is the dumb one, Jeb is the smart one.

“When we first started doing [George W.] Bush on ‘Saturday Night Live,’ ” former head writer Adam McKay told the New York Times, “the ‘Bush is dumb’ joke was too good.”

While George’s unique way with words launched a thousand late-night jokes, Jeb emerged as the “smart one.” Last year, the Times described the younger Bush’s reputation thusly: “an intellectual in search of new ideas, a serial consulter of outsiders who relishes animated debate and a probing manager who eagerly burrows into the bureaucratic details.”

George the bumbler, Jeb the thinker. Got it. But some who worked in the Bush White House say the perception that Jeb is smarter may have more to do with style than with substance.

George’s persona is often one of swagger and verbal stumbles. However, Keith Hennessey, former director of Bush’s National Economic Council, argues that “President Bush is extremely smart by any traditional standard. He’s highly analytical and was incredibly quick to be able to discern the core question he needed to answer.”

Meanwhile, Jeb the policy wonk has had his share of gaffes. During the 1994 gubernatorial race, an African American woman asked candidate Bush what he would do for blacks in Florida. Bush answered, “Probably nothing.” The remark followed him through the rest of the campaign.

And last month, Jeb flubbed questions about whether he would have authorized the Iraq war, demonstrating that, like his big brother, he, too, can slip when he speaks.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bottom line: George and Jeb are two intelligent men who happen to express themselves differently.

3. Bush is Marco Rubio's mentor.

Last year, National Review asked: "Would a presidential run by his mentor lock Rubio out of the race?" The Times called Rubio the protege of Bush and described the senator's decision to run as a "Shakespearean turn in a 15-year relationship so close, personal and enduring that friends describe the two men as almost family."

Both Rubio and Bush live in Miami-Dade County and are heavily immersed in the Hispanic community. As fellow Republicans, they worked together and were politically close as Rubio climbed the ranks of the state House of Representatives, eventually becoming speaker in November 2006. Bush once gave Rubio a samurai sword. But was Rubio really Bush's protege?

"I wouldn't diminish the relationship or exaggerate it," Rubio told The Washington Post in February.

Bush was not a "mentor in the traditional sense," S.V. Dáte noted in a Politico story that examined the relationship. Dáte also found that Bush's archived e-mails don't suggest a bond with Rubio any more special than with other lawmakers, and the men took very different paths, marked by very different styles, to office. One Florida GOP operative told The Post that Rubio respected Bush but was "not necessarily a protege," and strategist Ana Navarro suggested that a Bush-Rubio matchup "would be less awkward for Jeb and Marco than for a lot of us around them."

Why the false narrative? A battle between mentor and mentee certainly increases the personal drama of the campaign; "Marco Rubio vs. His Mentor" is a much catchier headline than "Marco Rubio vs. other guy who happens to be from Florida."

4. Bush will campaign "joyfully."

Last year, while discussing whether he would run for president, Bush said, "The decision will be based on 'Can I do it joyfully?,' because I think we need to have candidates lift our spirits." He's apparently decided that yes, he can.

His opponents in his three races for governor would have been delighted to see Bush campaign joyfully. At home, he ran tough races. In 1994, he aired a TV ad accusing Democratic Gov. Lawton Chiles of not moving fast enough to execute Larry Mann, the killer of a 10-year-old girl. The spot featured the child's grieving mother, Wendy Nelson. Chiles "says it can't be done; we know that it can," said Cory Tilley, Bush's spokesman at the time.

The ad led the Sun Sentinel to declare in an editorial that Bush was "showing his utter contempt for the truth, for fair play, for his own party's Code of Conduct . . . and for the voters he wants to hire him as governor." (Bush left office in 2007. Mann was executed in 2013.)

In 1998, according to the Los Angeles Times, Bush ads portrayed fiscally conservative Lt. Gov. Buddy MacKay "as having spent his 30-year political career trying to push through tax hikes on everything from senior citizens' income to burglar alarms." In 2002, Bush called Tampa lawyer Bill McBride, who had never held public office, "a tax-and-spend Democrat, political death in tax-allergic Florida, which still resists a state income tax," as Time magazine said.

Nothing about Bush's attack ads was out of the ordinary. And he got hit back just as hard. But it would be a very unusual presidential campaign that did not use negative ads, and the idea that Bush's team will somehow refrain and embrace “joy” instead is unlikely.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

5. He has broad support in Florida.

“Return of the GOP King” was the headline of a January Miami Herald story about the growing Bush campaign machine. Just before Bush formally became a candidate, Florida’s three elected Cabinet officers and 11 of 17 Republicans in the state’s congressional delegation endorsed him. So Bush has Florida sewn up, right?

Not exactly. Despite this establishment support, polls suggest that Bush, who has not been on the ballot in the Sunshine State in 13 years, cannot take Florida for granted. A Mason-Dixon poll from April showed Bush (30 percent) and Rubio (31 percent) essentially tied among Florida Republican voters.

A look at past races suggests that Bush could have a hard time. In 1994, he narrowly lost to Chiles, a reluctant candidate who showed little energy until the end of the campaign. In 1998, MacKay ran a terrible race and, as many Democrats predicted, lost. In 2002, running for a second term, Bush outspent political novice McBride by as much as 4 to 1.

While the latter races offered little resistance, Bush’s toughest test after 1994 was the 2000 presidential campaign. The Bush family had every reason to believe that Jeb would help his brother carry Florida. He did, but only by a very controversial 537 votes.

And much has changed since Bush left the governor’s mansion. One study, as Bloomberg News reported, “found that nearly three-quarters of Florida’s 12.9 million currently registered voters have never even seen Bush’s name on a ballot.”

Jeb Bush Emphasizes Anti-Abortion Record as Florida Governor // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur – June 19, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush drew applause from an evangelical crowd Friday when touting anti-abortion measures he enacted as governor of Florida, including parental notice for minors and a ban on "partial-birth abortion."

"We also put the most vulnerable in society at the front of the line, guided by my faith," Bush said at the Faith & Freedom Coalition meeting in Washington. "And we also put the rights of the unborn in the front of the line."

Bush, whose positions on immigration (he favors a path to legal status for some immigrants in the United States illegally) and education (he favors the national education standards known as the Common Core) have put him out of sync with some of his party's more conservative voters, is placing a heavier emphasis on abortion than some of his rivals for the Republican presidential nomination. He is placing his gubernatorial record front-and-center as he makes his case for the White House.

In 2000, Bush signed measure to ban a late-term abortion procedure. In 2005 he enacted the Parental Notification Act, which mandates that doctors notify parents of a minor at least 48 hours prior to terminating a pregnancy.

"When I became governor I was shocked at the total lack of regulation of abortion clinics, and that parents had no legal role in their minor daughter's abortion decision," he said. "So what we did was we put regulations on abortion clinics. And we narrowed the number of them... I signed into law a partial birth abortion ban." He said he also supported funding for crisis pregnancy centers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Later Friday, Bush named David James, who served as senior adviser to Mitt Romney's 2008 and 2012 presidential campaigns, as political director, according to The Wall Street Journal. He will oversee voter contact, campaign volunteers, efforts to maximize voter turnout, Bush spokesman Tim Miller told the paper.

Jeb Bush Makes Surprise Pick for Political Director // WSJ // David James – June 19, 2015

For the second time in less than two weeks, Jeb Bush is shuffling the top tier of his 2016 campaign staff.

The job of political director – expected to go to Kentucky-based consultant Scott Jennings – will instead be filled by David James, who served as a senior adviser to Mitt Romney's 2008 and 2012 presidential campaigns. He has also worked at the Republican National Committee and helped lead the Pennsylvania Republican Party.

The political director oversees voter contact, campaign volunteers, and other grassroots efforts to maximize Election Day turnout.

Mr. Jennings, who advised Mr. Romney's 2012 campaign and George W. Bush's 2000 and 2004 campaigns, will work with Mr. James and serve as a senior political adviser, according to Tim Miller, a spokesman for Mr. Bush.

The shift in staffing comes just four days after Mr. Bush officially launched his campaign in Miami and 11 days after he decided to name Danny Diaz as his campaign manager. That job was expected to go to Iowa-based consultant David Kochel, who will instead serve as chief strategist.

Some GOP donors are concerned that the staff shakeup reflects Mr. Bush's failure to establish himself as the clear frontrunner in a crowded GOP field despite his fundraising prowess and national profile.

Mr. Miller said, "After a successful announcement where Jeb really laid out how he is uniquely prepared to fix the problems in Washington, we are happy to be building out a political operation with David, Scott and the rest of the team that will spread that message in the primary and caucus states."

Jeb Bush might have a big problem on his hands if he wins the White House // AP // Annie Greene – June 19, 2015

Jeb Bush's deep dive into corporate America, where he served on the boards or as an adviser to more than a dozen companies, could trigger complications for him if he wins the White House.

Companies that paid Bush as a board member or adviser regularly hire lobbyists to press issues in Washington before federal agencies, Congress and the White House. Others have been fined by U.S. agencies, such as the Environmental Protection Agency, or faced inquiries from the Securities and Exchange Commission. Some are expected to conduct business beyond November 2016 that will be directly affected by U.S. government decisions.

That nexus raises thorny questions for Bush if he wins the Republican nomination and the presidency: How would he respond when one of the companies that paid him seeks favorable treatment or undergoes scrutiny from the federal government?

That potential entanglement could hamper any presidential candidate with a history in corporate America, such as

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton, the former secretary of state whose family foundation received big-money support from corporate interests.

"Anytime you have these kinds of entanglements, there's certainly the potential for conflict," said Dale Eisman, a spokesman for Common Cause.

Unlike lower-ranking employees, a president can't effectively recuse himself and pass on a decision to a more neutral supervisor.

Bush began shedding his corporate ties late last year to prepare his run for president. Potential conflicts of interest involve federal interactions with companies that paid him millions.

Beyond his own companies and educational foundations, Bush was a board member or adviser to at least 15 companies and nonprofits after leaving the Florida governor's office early in 2007, an AP review found. At least seven of those companies lobbied the federal government in recent years — an effort likely to continue over a range of issues, such as health care and corporate taxes.

Bush spokesman Tim Miller said Bush won't play favorites.

"If Jeb is successful in his campaign, special interests are going to find his administration to be unwelcome territory because he's going to clean out the broken tax and regulatory system," Miller said.

The companies Bush formerly advised frequently appear before regulatory agencies.

Take, for instance, Dallas-based Tenet Healthcare, where Bush served on the board of directors for eight years through 2014, earning nearly $2.4 million in compensation. In the past two years, Tenet has hired lobbyists to represent its interests on dozens of issues in Washington, including the congressional budget, Medicare's reauthorization and the Hospital Payment Fairness Act.

Tenet has benefited from President Barack Obama's health care law, with the company's CEO saying last year that an increase of newly insured people led to an uptick in admissions to its hospitals. Republicans, including Bush, have chided "Obamacare," raising the specter that a GOP White House victory could lead to a legislative imbroglio — and trigger a massive lobbying effort from industry.

Tenet's lobbying goes well beyond one issue. Since 2014, the company put its lobbyists to work before 10 different federal agencies and offices.

Another example is Rayonier Inc., a publicly traded Florida timber company where Bush served on the board of directors from 2008 to 2014 and earned nearly $1 million in total compensation.

This year, Rayonier has hired lobbyists on federal issues involving taxation of timberland, an international trade dispute involving U.S. pulp production and the tax treatment of timber real estate investment trusts.

In November, with Bush on the board, the SEC subpoenaed Rayonier over its public filings; the company said it is cooperating with the agency, which is led by a presidential appointee.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rayonier spokesman Mike Bell said any candidate seeking to rise to national prominence would naturally bring "a body of knowledge, background associations and affiliations with business and nonprofits."

Rayonier won't stop lobbying in Washington and Bell said he does not believe the connection would be troublesome. "I am confident that Governor Bush knows when to recuse himself," he said.

Another potential connection involves the Barrick Gold Corp., where Bush served on the international advisory board from 2011 to 2013.

In the last two years, Barrick lobbyists pressed issues with the Senate, House, Army Corps of Engineers, Treasury and EPA. Barrick has been fined by the EPA, an agency also led by a presidential appointee.

Andy Lloyd, a Barrick spokesman, said the company complies with lobbying regulations in every country it serves, "and we will continue to do so."

Jeb Sells Catholicism to Evangelicals // Daily Beast // Betsy Woodruff – June 19, 2015

Evangelicals aren't typically the target audience for Roman Catholic theology talk. Low-church Protestants from the Bible Belt have historically been hostile to Catholicism, even sometimes fearing that Catholics' devotion to the pope will lead to one-world government, and that their political clout in the United States presages the end times.

So it was perhaps a little surprising when Jeb Bush, who converted to his wife's Catholicism, launched into an emotional testimony before a predominantly Evangelical audience on Friday about the joy he felt when he left Protestantism.

Catholics and Evangelicals haven't always played well together. In 2008, Rev. John Hagee—a Texas pastor and one of the country's most powerful Evangelical leaders—apologized to Bill Donohue of the Catholic League for intimating that the Catholic church was the "great whore" of Revelation, and for telegraphing the kind of anti-Catholic rhetoric typically associated with 19th-century nativists. (Among Southern Baptists, in particular, there's long been a flamboyantly anti-Catholic strain of thought and rhetoric.) And while conservative Catholics and Evangelical Protestants are simpatico when it comes to certain public policy goals, they usually avoid public discussions about areas of theological disagreement.

But here in a ballroom in a hotel in D.C.'s Woodley Park neighborhood, Bush decided that courting the country's leading social conservative activists could entail discussing one of the elements of Catholic theology that's least amenable to Evangelicals—namely the blessed sacraments, which include confession and communion.

"I converted to the Catholic Church—Christ came into my life a little earlier, but I converted to being Catholic in honor of my wife and because I believe in the blessed sacraments and they give me great comfort," he said at the beginning of his speech before the Faith and Freedom Coalition. "On Easter Sabbath of 1995, I had lost an election in 1994 and found a total serenity and solace in the RCIA class, and converted to being a Catholic and it's been an organizing part of my architecture, if you will, as a person and certainly as an elected official."

RCIA stands for Right of Christian Initiation of Adults, and refers to the catechesis process that would-be Catholic converts go through before entering the Church.

Evangelicals, needless to say, do not see the act of leaving Protestantism as something that should necessarily be a source of "total serenity and solace."

Evangelicals, needless to say, do not see the act of leaving Protestantism as something that should necessarily be a source of “total serenity and solace.” And sometimes, as in Hagee’s case, their leaders show outright hostility to those who jump ship. So Bush’s willingness to talk explicitly about his decision to leave behind the Protestantism that galvanizes so many members of the Faith and Freedom Coalition audience reflects an important shift in the way social conservatives talk to each other.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yes, the two groups have long been political allies—the evangelical George W. Bush handily won Catholics in 2004, and the stalwart Catholic Rick Santorum was kept afloat in the 2012 GOP primary by southern Evangelicals. But increasingly, Evangelical Christians and conservative Roman Catholics are finding common ground not just in their shared political concerns but also in a shared language about personal devotion to faith.

And that shared devotion played heavily in Bush’s speech, as he reiterated his support for the Little Sisters of the Poor, a group of Catholic nuns embroiled in a fight with the federal government over contraceptive coverage, and his repulsion with Hillary Clinton’s comment that “religious beliefs…have to be changed.” Clinton’s camp hasn’t clarified which specific religious beliefs she thinks must change, but conservatives like Bush have taken the comment as a direct attack on their pro-life convictions. Bush’s criticism of Clinton’s comment drew warm applause from the crowd.

Penny Nance, an Evangelical Christian who heads the conservative Concerned Women for America, said those comments reflect growing unity and cooperation between conservative Catholics and Evangelicals.

“We are more united than we have been in my lifetime, certainly,” she said. “Catholics and Evangelicals have certainly linked arms and will continue to link arms over the issue of life and marriage.”

“Jeb embracing his Catholicism is not a problem for Evangelicals,” she added.

Nance would know—she wrote a Fox News op-ed in February of 2012 titled “We are all Catholics now”. And Patricia Miller of Salon argued in March of this year that white Catholics’ increasing affinity for the GOP could become a problem for the Democratic party.

“[F]or the first time, white Catholics are more Republican than the voting group usually considered the ultimate Republicans: white Protestants,” she wrote.

It’s just one more indicator that despite a fraught history, Protestant Evangelicals and conservative Catholics have become a cohesive political unit. As the two groups become more and more closely allied on public policy issues, and as they both increasingly adopt a defensive posture in the culture wars, conservative Catholic candidates like Bush will feel more comfortable talking about their faith in more explicit ways before Evangelical audiences.

Jeb Bush demonstates the opposit e of economic wonkery // MSNBC // Steve Benen – June 19, 2015

At his formal presidential campaign kickoff this week in Miami, Jeb Bush pointed to a rather specific economic target. “There is not a reason in the world why we cannot grow at a rate of four percent a year,” the Florida Republican said. “And that will be my goal as president – four percent growth, and the 19 million new jobs that come with it.”

In reality, there are all kinds of reasons why GDP growth of 4% per year is unrealistic – reasons Bush is supposed to understand. Indeed, in the modern era, how many presidents have averaged 4 percent growth over the course of their terms? Zero. Not Clinton, not Reagan, not Obama, no one.

But the real fun kicks in when we consider how, exactly, Jeb Bush arrived at his 4% target. When Reuters asked for an explanation, the Republican responded, “It’s a nice round number. It’s double the growth that we are growing at. It's not just an aspiration. It's doable."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Except, it's not doable at all. Matt Yglesias flagged this piece, noting that Bush apparently chose his goal randomly, "backed by zero substantive analysis of any kind."

That ambitious goal was first raised as Bush and other advisers to the George W. Bush Institute discussed a distinctive economic program the organization could promote, recalled James Glassman, then the institute's executive director.

"Even if we don't make 4 percent it would be nice to grow at 3 or 3.5," said Glassman, now a visiting fellow at the American Enterprise Institute. In that conference call, "we were looking for a niche and Jeb in that very laconic way said, 'four percent growth.' It was obvious to everybody that this was a very good idea."

That's a great use of the word "laconic," by the way. There was no detailed economic discussion, no number crunching, no projections based on hours of pouring over spreadsheets. Bush just blurted it out, convinced that four is a round number.

This is problematic on its face, but let's not forget that for much of the political world, Jeb Bush is one of his party's leading policy wonks. This is the guy who describes himself as a "nerd" who loves public policy and the substantive ideas of governing.

Except this reputation is a sham. He got on the phone with some folks from the George W. Bush Institute – as if his brother's economic team was brimming with competence – and picked that number off the top of his head, confident that his vague ideas about tax cuts will make him the single most successful economic president of the last 75 years.

Anyone who still considers the former governor a policy wonk simply isn't paying close enough attention.

Paul Krugman: Jeb Bush's economic policies could t urn the entire country into a failed Kansas-style "experiment" // Salon // Scott Eric Kaufman – June 19, 2015

Paul Krugman lit into Jeb Bush in Friday's column for the New York Times, calling the Republican presidential contender "a high priest of voodoo economics" whose plan to revitalize the American economy resembles Governor Sam Brownback's disastrous "experiment" in Kansas.

Bush has promised that, if elected, "he would double America's rate of economic growth to 4 percent," which would be an impressive feat given that not even economists "know very much about how to raise the long-run rate of economic growth."

But unlike economists, Bush believes he has the answer — and he's basing it on the misguided belief that "the growth in Florida's economy during his time as governor offers a role model for the nation as a whole." Krugman finds that "kind of funny…because everyone except Bush knows that during those years, Florida was booming thanks to the mother of all housing bubbles."

When the bubble burst, the state plunged into a deep slump, much worse than that in the nation as a whole. Taking the boom and the slump together, Florida's longer-term economic performance has, if anything, been slightly worse than the national average.

The key to Mr. Bush's record of success, then, was good political timing: He managed to leave office before the unsustainable nature of the boom he now invokes became obvious.

But Mr. Bush's economic promises reflect more than self-aggrandizement. They also reflect his party's habit of boasting about its ability to deliver rapid economic growth, even though there's no evidence at all to justify such boasts. It's as if a bunch of relatively short men made a regular practice of swaggering around, telling everyone they see that they're 6 feet 2 inches tall.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To be more specific, the next time you encounter some conservative going on about growth, you might want to bring up the following list of names and numbers: Bill Clinton, 3.7; Ronald Reagan, 3.4; Barack Obama, 2.1; George H.W. Bush, 2.0; George W. Bush, 1.6. Yes, that's the last five presidents — and the average rate of growth of the U.S. economy during their time in office (so far, in Mr. Obama's case). Obviously, the raw numbers don't tell the whole story, but surely there's nothing in that list to suggest that conservatives possess some kind of miracle cure for economic sluggishness. And, as many have pointed out, if Jeb! knows the secret to 4 percent growth, why didn't he tell his father and brother?

Jeb Bush's pathetic Charleston dodge: "I don't know" if white supremacist suspect was motivated by racism // Salon // Scott Eric Kaufman – June 19, 2015

As news of Dylann Roof's longstanding and deeply rooted racist beliefs began to filter through the media yesterday, many of the Republican candidates for president nevertheless denied that race was the motivating factor. Taking their cues from Fox News, Rick Santorum and Lindsey Graham speculated that Roof was a "whacked out" opponent of "religious liberty," just one of many "people out there looking for Christians to kill them."

Early Friday morning, CNN reported that a source close to the investigation said that Roof had confessed to police that he chose the historically black Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church because he wanted to start a race war. That statement is consonant with what a survivor told Sylvia Jones yesterday — that Roof had said that African-Americans have "raped our [white] women, and you are taking over the country. I have to do what I have to do."

And yet, despite the abundance of evidence that Roof's attack was racially motivated, GOP presidential front-runner Jeb Bush told attendees at a Faith and Freedom Coalition summit in Washington today that he doesn't "know what was on the mind or the heart of the man who committed these atrocious crimes."

According to Talking Points Memo's Tierney Sneed, Bush followed Santorum and Graham's lead and focused on the fact that Roof decided to stage the opening salvo of his race war at a church. (The fact that it's a historically black one is, we must assume, beside the point.) Bush later claimed that while Roof is completely opaque to him, he does know "what was in the heart of [Roof's] victims."

"They were praying. They were learning and studying the word of the Lord," he said. "In times like these, in times of great of national mourning, people of faith, all of us must come together and at least reflect on this and fortify our strength and love of Christ, love of God to be able to continue to go forth."

The Huffington Post's politics reporter Laura Bassett asked him point blank about the racial component of the Charleston massacre:

For their part, both Democratic candidates have addressed the racial animus that motivated Roof, Clinton in a speech yesterday and Senator Bernie Sanders on Twitter today.

Jeb Bush already a winner – when it comes to campaign logos // Dallas News // Christy Hoppe – June 19, 2015

Political campaigns take apple pie, pour in red, white and blue, sprinkle sunshine, add a hint of Lincoln, a kiss of hope, wrap it in a flag and call it a logo.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fifteen announced presidential campaigns have unfurled their banners. And the symbols they'll put on signs, stickers and shirts are mostly predictable, though some have refreshing flourishes, two experts in campaign messaging say.

"You can spot a political logo a mile away," said San Antonio political consultant and marketing executive Lionel Sosa. They have flags, American colors and usually, a tagline like "leadership, honesty, integrity or the even more boring, experienced," he said.

But this year, a few at least "have a touch of freshness," Sosa said.

Ben Bentzin, a marketing lecturer at the University of Texas at Austin, said eventually the logo of a well-known and well-funded candidate will become emblematic of who they are and what they want to do.

And the most effective logos incorporate the candidate's name as a brand.

Bentzin, who has been a legislative candidate, said he skews "toward simple logos that convey personality."

The two experts largely agreed on which candidates have succeeded with their first important decision — the symbol of their campaign — and which should have stayed a little longer at the drawing board.

Follow Christy Hoppe on Twitter at @christyhoppe.

Winner: Jeb Bush

Sosa: "Jeb's logo is the freshest and therefore the best — a strong, sophisticated serif typeface with an exclamation point. Short, sweet, to the point."

Bentzin: "I ranked Jeb the highest for personality and simplicity."

The experts agreed on the next four as their next top choices. Ted Cruz, Rand Paul, Rick Santorum all conveyed strong symbols — eternal flames and an eagle. Bernie Sanders' simple star dotting the "i" was a notable touch.

Sosa: "The eternal flame as the American flag for Ted Cruz. Nice and simple. No taglines needed for these, and that's part of their strength."

Bentzin: "These logos are brands."

Hillary Clinton, perhaps trying to avoid the dynasty tag, left out her name altogether. And the experts see that as a mistake.

Sosa: "Is she taking a page from Nike and Apple, big brands that substitute a graphic for the name? Or does she think she is so well known that there is no need to even mention her name?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“While I like the simplicity of Hillary’s logo, it works against her — the graphic reflects a hard, corporate and untouchable feel, which only reinforces her least desirable qualities.”

Bentzin: “Hillary is simple, but I didn’t rate it higher because it feels contrived, like it is trying too hard.”

The complicated logo for Rick Perry prompted a novel suggestion from Sosa.

“Perry’s logo would be much stronger if he had left out the silly P with the nerdy star and replaced it with a strong graphic of his face,” Sosa said. “After all, he’s not a bad-looking fellow.”

Sosa: “All lowercase letters and the use of a U.S. map for a period? Really? ‘A new American century’ might have worked in 2000 but comes off as unimaginative today.”

The weakest effort, both experts agreed, was Mike Huckabee’s.

Bentzin: “These messages help to define the candidate, but at the expense of making the logos more complex and that’s harder to understand and remember.”

As for the rest, Sosa summed it up: “Just more of the same old, same old.”

Jeb Bush changes tune, calls Charleston shooter ‘racist’ // Tampa Bay Times // Kirby Wilson – June 19, 2015

In a speech at a Hillsborough County Republican Party dinner Friday night, Jeb Bush called the Charleston shooter who killed 9 African Americans as they prayed Wednesday a "racist."

"It breaks my heart that somebody, a racist, would do the things he did," Bush said.

The former governor's characterization of shooter Dylann Roof stood in contrast to remarks from earlier Friday, when he said, "I don't know what was on the mind or heart of the man who committed these atrocious crimes."

The earlier remarks came in a speech to Christian conservatives Friday morning at the Washington, D.C. Faith & Freedom Coalition conference.

Bush cancelled his planned events in Charleston Thursday in the aftermath of the tragedy.

Bush makes his case vs. Walker, Rubio, minus criticism // Des Moines Register // Jennifer Jacobs – June 19, 2015

Ask Jeb Bush why he'd be a better president than Scott Walker or Marco Rubio, and his argument comes down to this: After eight years as Florida's chief executive and decades managing ventures in the business world, he has learned that his "sweet spot" is his ability to forge fixes for big problems.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Practical business experience is actually a virtue in public service because you can apply private-sector practices. For people who have only been involved in government, they literally have no clue," Bush told The Des Moines Register on Wednesday in his first sit-down news interview in Iowa of his presidential campaign.

And as a governor, Bush said, he has a concrete record of reforms.

"We have a lot of really talented senators, but they have the ability to hide behind the collective body," he told the Register during an hourlong van trip between two campaign stops. "Over time, they kind of start speaking in a different language. They speak the language of Washington. They honestly do brag about filing an amendment and calling that success. Governors have to balance budgets. They have to make decisions that make people mad sometimes. They have to lead."

Bush added: "I don't say any of this in criticism of anyone else. I hope we can get to the point where you can actually toot your own horn without implying that someone else is bad."

As it happens, Walker, the Wisconsin governor and frontrunner in Iowa polling in the race for the GOP caucuses, has had a career mainly in government. He'd been doing marketing and fundraising for the American Red Cross at age 22 when he made his first bid for public office. He lost that legislative race, but was victorious at age 25.

He was a state representative for nearly nine years, then county executive in Milwaukee County for almost nine years. He was elected governor at age 43 and has held that office for 4 ½ years.

Rubio, a 44-year-old first-term U.S. senator in Florida, is popular among Iowa's likely GOP caucusgoers as their second choice for president and has a high favorability rating, according to a late May Iowa Poll. Those are signs he could potentially do very well in Iowa if he can persuade voters to make him their top choice.

In the horse race for first choice for president, Walker is strongly in the lead, followed by Rand Paul and Ben Carson tied in second place, and Bush and Mike Huckabee tied in fourth place, the May 25-29 Des Moines Register/Bloomberg Politics Iowa Poll found.

Asked Wednesday how his approach to dealing with public-sector unions compares to Walker, who has a strong reputation for taking on organized labor, Bush said: "In Florida, we created probably the most dramatic changes in career civil service rules in the country."

Bush said he shrunk the state government workforce by 13,000 employees.

That statement is true, Matthew Corrigan, chairman of the Department of Political Science and Public Administration at the University of North Florida, told the Register later. Bush also reclassified another 16,000 from civil service to at-will employees, Corrigan said. That means the workers are nonunionized and can be fired without evidence to support disciplinary or performance problems.

Bush also said he reformed the pension system.

"I earned the wrath of AFSCME," he said, referring to the public employee union.

"Someone who's a friend of mine who's active in Democratic politics told me that at my re-election, they had

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

4,000 folks that came in from out of state to take me out," Bush said. "Because they were worried that if Florida could do it, then other states could do it as well, so they had to punish me. My opponent outraised me in terms of money, plus his union support was pretty spectacular. And I beat him like a drum."

Bush added: "You have tenure for all government workers in most places in the country. In Florida, you don't."

In 2008, the country made a big bet on a gifted senator, Bush said.

"I think it's pretty clear now despite the skills, the eloquence, the charisma of Barack Obama, he's not a leader. And there was nothing in his background that suggested he would be one," he said. "So we need a leader now, because we can't keep talking about our problems. Leaders skip over that, and they start talking about solutions. That's my sweet spot."

Bush joined a Florida real estate firm with a friend in 1981 and built it from three employees to 280, he said. He and his son, Jeb, started a consulting business and an investing business, he said.

As governor from 1999 to 2007, Florida saw 4.4 percent growth annually over eight years, Bush said, and he left the state with a triple A bond rating and close to $10 billion in reserves. He cut taxes every year, for a total of $19 billion, he said.

Corrigan said Florida added a million jobs during Bush's tenure, although some were low-wage agriculture and tourism jobs, and some were housing-boom construction jobs that went away when the recession hit in 2007. Corrigan said Bush did cut taxes, but the exact amount is in dispute. PolitiFact rated Bush's "$19 billion" statement "half true."

Education is at the center of Bush's legacy.

"I'm not bragging here. It's just a simple fact that when you look at rising student achievement in Florida, we to this day continue to lead the nation," Bush said. "We started at the bottom. The state of Florida, with 57 percent of the students qualified for free and reduced (price) lunch, kids near or at the poverty level, are now in the upper quartile in terms of reading and math scores."

But the testing element of Bush's reforms has become unpopular, Corrigan said. The charter school Bush co-founded in Miami had financial problems later and closed.

Bush also said he managed the affairs of state during eight hurricanes and four tropical storms that caused more than $100 billion in losses.

"Nothing's ever happened like this in the country," he said.

Corrigan agreed that the 2004 hurricane season was particularly tough, and Bush handled it well, partly because of his ability to speak Spanish.

Bush said: "I'm a proven leader. No disrespect to anybody else."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[As Florida Governor, Jeb Bush Bought Land from Timber Company That Later Paid Him $1 Million] // IB Times // Andrew Perez – June 19, 2015

Florida was buying wetlands. Seeking to conserve its fragile coastline, the state sought to set aside acreage in perpetuity, ensuring it would never be developed. But as then-Gov. Jeb Bush assessed a proposal to buy a choice parcel -- a 26,000-acre piece of swampland near Jacksonville -- he worried that the price was far higher than the land's true worth.

"I'm concerned about the value of the property," Bush told top state officials during a meeting in Tallahassee in March 2000.

This was a subject Bush knew something about, having previously earned his living in real estate. After expressing his reservations, however, Bush quickly assented to the purchase, calling the parcel "a jewel." Then he cracked a prescient joke.

"Man," the governor said, according to the minutes of the meeting, "I can't wait to get back into the real-estate business and sell property to the state."

That wish would ultimately come true.

A year after the state bought the land, Bush approved a plan through which the state purchased logging rights on part of the property, paying $4.6 million to a publicly traded timber and real-estate company called Rayonier Inc. A state audit would later conclude that this price was likely inflated: Florida officials had relied on "questionable assumptions" that "may have led to misleading and overstated value conclusions."

During Bush's eight years in office, Rayonier would secure almost $100 million from the state of Florida in exchange for surrendering logging rights and property. In 2008, two years after Bush left office, Rayonier gave him a seat on its board of directors as it continued to sell property to Florida.

When Rayonier appointed Bush to its board, the company specifically touted his "expertise in real-estate and public-policy issues." This know-how was an asset, given that Rayonier was at the same time publicly expressing concerns about what it called "anti-development groups" in Florida that were "seeking constitutional amendments, legislation and other anti-growth limitations" that threatened to impede the growth of its business.

With Bush on hand to lend his knowledge of state government and his political connections, Rayonier overcome these obstacles, securing state government backing for two major developments near Jacksonville. Florida has agreed to spend taxpayer money widening a highway in the vicinity of those developments. Rayonier secured a deal with the state to sell renewable energy to Florida utilities. Rayonier also waged a legal battle that ultimately prompted the state Legislature to preserve a tax benefit boosting major landowners.

During his six years on Rayonier's board, Bush would draw nearly $1 million in pay for this part-time job, according to the company's financial statements.

As Bush now seeks the Republican Party's nomination for the U.S. presidency, he is presenting himself as an outsider who abhors the culture of lobbying and inside dealing that often shapes politics. But some advocates for greater government transparency point to the land deals Bush brokered with Rayonier followed by the hefty payday he secured for himself as evidence that he is a savvy exploiter of the very culture he now decries.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It's a classic example of cronyism," said Peter Butzin, who leads Common Cause Florida, an advocacy group, who described Bush's dealings with Rayonier as emblematic of how many politicians operate. "When they are cozy with interests in office, it's not surprising they would end up working on behalf of those interests when they leave office."

Bush's presidential campaign did not respond to questions from International Business Times. A Rayonier representative, Roseann Wentworth, told IBTimes it was "entirely appropriate" for the company to have brought on Bush.

"We had in Governor Bush somebody with extensive real-estate experience and experience in the state of Florida where we had so many real-estate interests," said Wentworth, whose company manages 416,000 acres in Florida and runs a factory in one of 29 areas recently flagged by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency for failing to meet air-pollution standards.

Although Bush stepped down from Rayonier's board in December, his relationship with the timber company is not the only one that has provoked questions about his proclivities for mixing public and private interests.

While Bush was governor, his administration directed state pension investments to firms that employed top donors to the campaign that elevated his brother, George W. Bush, to the White House. Some of those donors are now contributing to his own campaign. Jeb Bush also pressed state officials to consider investing taxpayer money into a donor's financial firm. Since leaving office, he has gone on to serve as a board member or adviser to 15 companies and nonprofit organizations, including firms with significant business with the Florida government, such as Barclays PLC, Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. and Tenet Healthcare Corp. Some of those firms also lobby federal government agencies Bush would supervise were he to win the presidency.

Few relationships better illustrate Bush's overlapping public and private dealings than the one he forged with Rayonier. The firm is one of the largest landowners in Florida. It lobbies both the Florida and federal governments.

The connection dates back to 1999, when Bush's administration helped coax the timber conglomerate into moving its headquarters to Jacksonville from Stamford, Connecticut, with the aid of $2.6 million worth of state and local tax incentives. Bush and other state officials soon approved a $60 million purchase of 57,000 acres of the company's land in the northern part of Florida as part of an environmental-preservation deal negotiated by the Nature Conservancy.

In 2001, Bush and other Florida officials backed the proposal to buy the timber rights from Rayonier on a portion of the swampland the state had purchased the year before.

An audit that emerged in 2003 suggested the terms of the two deals had been overly generous to Rayonier. The report from Florida's auditor general, obtained by IBTimes, said the administration's appraisals on one of the Rayonier land deals contained "inconsistencies" and "unsupported assumptions" about the potential for development. The report further found the valuations on the timber-rights purchase "contained questionable assumptions related to future timber rights that may not have supported" the price the state paid to Rayonier.

Wentworth, the Rayonier representative, said the company was not concerned by the questions the audit raised about the appraisal process. "It's part of a normal state auditing process, and due diligence is part of that kind of transaction," she said.

While he was governor, Bush acknowledged the state often paid a premium in purchasing property. He presented this as a sign that Florida was successfully pursuing public aims while still rewarding property owners.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“When I got elected governor, I thought that private property owners typically got the shaft from the state, that there was an erosion of private property rights,” he said during a meeting to approve the deal for land on which Rayonier held timber rights. “They come up here every other week, and they do real well.”

While the state was directing taxpayer money to Rayonier, Bush was developing political ties with the company. As Bush sought re-election in 2002, his administration was publicly lauding Rayonier’s environmental record. Both the company’s then-CEO, Lee Nutter, and his wife gave the Bush campaign maximum contributions of $500 each. According to emails compiled by the Florida Center for Investigative Reporting, Bush also agreed to solicit a donation from Nutter to Enterprise Florida, the state’s public-private partnership that recommends economic-development strategies. An Enterprise Florida representative said the group has no record of support from Nutter or Rayonier.

Those ties were a precursor to 2008, when Bush was appointed to Rayonier’s board of directors.

Some longtime observers of Florida politics say Bush’s current rhetorical mode, in which he rails against political influence peddling, collides with the apparent reason that Rayonier saw fit to include him within its inner circle.

“You know why people get on boards and why they are sought after, and why he in specific was sought after,” said Ron Book, a prominent lobbyist in Florida’s capital Tallahassee. “People end up on boards because they are people of stature and people of influence, and they are looking for intelligent people that fit that sphere from a profile perspective.”

In Bush’s first year on Rayonier’s board, the company lobbied the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission to oppose an accounting regulation that would have required timberland to be appraised at “fair market value” on a quarterly basis. The rule was designed to compel companies to more accurately report the value of their property to governments and to ensure that firms are paying required taxes.

While Bush was on the board, the company also raised objections to a Florida clean-water regulation proposed by the federal government. At the same time, Bush served on Rayonier’s audit committee, which helps oversee the company’s financial statements -- now the subject of a class-action lawsuit and an SEC subpoena amid claims that the firm misstated its earnings.

Government watchdogs say the former governor must explain how he came to land on the Rayonier board.

“The question that comes to mind is, ‘Is this some sort of payback for the land purchase and the tax breaks?’” said Greg LeRoy, executive director of Good Jobs First, an advocacy group that tracks government development deals nationwide. “The governor should be forthcoming about how this happened and whether there’s a quid pro quo.”

Jeb! Bush isn’t sure what motivated the killer who ‘wanted to start a race war’ // Daily Kos // Barbara Morrill

Jeb! Bush becomes the latest Republican who just can't bring himself to admit that racism motivated the mass murder of nine African Americans in Charleston, South Carolina, on Wednesday night:

"I don't know what was on the mind or the heart of the man who committed these atrocious crimes," Bush said in remarks at a Faith and Freedom Coalition summit in Washington.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Huh. Let's see if we can help old Jeb! out here. Has Dylann Roof himself said anything about why he did it?

One of the officials said that Roof, who is white, told investigators that he wanted to start a race war.

Did this killer say anything as he gunned these people down?

Sylvia Johnson, a cousin of church shooting victim Pastor Clementa Pinckney says she spoke with one of the survivors "and she said that he had reloaded five different times... and he just said 'I have to do it. You rape our women and you're taking over our country. And you have to go.'"

And did family or friends of Roof offer any insight?

There were many signs Roof had been planning an attack, telling his roommate he "wanted to start a civil war" and "was going to do something like that and then kill himself." He was infuriated by Trayvon Martin and Freddie Gray protests and told a friend something needed to be done for the sake of "the white race."

Yep, what was on Dylann Roof's mind when he murdered those nine African Americans remains a mystery. Could have been anything ... heck, maybe it was even an attack on Christianity.

Guess we'll never know ...

RUBIO

Marco Rubio's supply-side problem: Why anti-tax fanatics have it in for him // Salon // Simon Maloy – June 19, 2015

Marco Rubio's tax plan has always been fantasy. His proposal, crafted in conjunction with Sen. Mike Lee, R-Utah, sought to bridge the gap between two factions of conservative economic thinkers: the supply-side devotees who view rate cuts for top earners as the alpha and omega of tax policy, and the so-called "reformicons" who want to gently ease the Republicans away from tax-cut mania and focus more on using the tax code to bolster middle-class incomes. The solution Rubio and Lee came up with was to try to give both sides what they wanted: a reformicon-friendly expansion of the Child Tax Credit paired with across-the-board rate cuts, a slashed corporate tax rate, and the elimination of taxes on capital gains and estates.

This was quite sensibly derided by the New York Times' Josh Barro as the puppies-and-rainbows tax plan: "It's full of things everybody likes, at least on the Republican side: family tax cuts that will make it easier to buy the children a puppy, and capital tax cuts that chase a pot of capital investment gold at the end of the rainbow." Deeply cutting taxes on the wealthy lowers revenue, and expanding tax credits costs money, and in doing both Rubio created a plan that would rip a gargantuan hole in the budget – the price tag is so high that he doesn't even pretend that it can be dynamically scored into revenue neutrality.

It also suffers another potentially fatal flaw: It doesn't account for just how single-minded and ferociously zealous the supply-siders are when it comes to rate cuts and "pro-growth" tax policy. And now the supply-siders are lashing out at Rubio for his heresies.

The Wall Street Journal published a long editorial yesterday attacking Rubio's tax plan as a "major detour from pro-growth tax reform." Their biggest beef is with the expanded Child Tax Credit, arguing that it "does nothing for economic growth. The only growth case for it is the Keynesian claim that it would boost consumer spending and aggregate demand, but by now we've seen how that doesn't work." Instead of wasting money on families and children, they argue, they should cut taxes for rich people some more. This is very similar to the Heritage Foundation's critique of Rubio's plan, which judged it to be "pro-growth" overall but viewed the expanded tax credit as a "missed opportunity" to make further cuts to the top rate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Strangely, though, the Wall Street Journal sees the political dynamic in Congress as favoring the reformicon-oriented portions of Rubio's plan winning out over the tax cuts they so desperately crave. "The larger political danger would arrive if Mr. Rubio became President," they write. "In the inevitable negotiations with Congress, his tax cuts on capital would surely be watered down while his giant tax credit would pass. What happens if the economy failed to respond?"

Really? If nothing else, Rubio has shown that his tendency is to mollify the supply-siders, who still dominate the conservative establishment. The Journal may complain bitterly about Rubio's tax plan, but the fact is that he's already massively overhauled to make it more acceptable to the trickle-down set. As the New Republic's Brian Beutler wrote back in April:

As originally conceived, [Rubio's] tax plan would've paired modest middle class benefits with very large tax cuts for high earners, much like George W. Bush's first big tax cut in 2001. But when conservatives voiced dissatisfaction with that particular distribution, Rubio responded not by telling them to buzz off, or by eliminating the middle-income benefits and plying the savings into further high-end tax cuts. He kept the benefits, and layered hugely regressive additional tax cuts for the wealthy on top of an already unaffordable plan. What once would have increased deficits by $2.4 trillion over a decade, according to the Tax Policy Center, would now increase them by trillions more.

In Congress, Republicans tend to take their tax policy cues from people like Paul Ryan, who is squarely in the supply-side camp, views tax cuts as the "secret sauce" of economic growth, and considers them vastly more important than expanding tax credits for middle-income families. Seems like they'd be unwilling to let a newly elected President Rubio back off his promise of zeroed-out capital gains taxes and more than happy to let the Child Tax Credit wither, if forced to choose between the two.

On a broader level, though, this entire debate is surreal. Rubio's tax plan is already an insanely generous giveaway to top earners, and he's already bent over backward to try to make peace with the trickle-down folks. But they're still not happy, they're still demanding more. There's just no compromising to be had with extremists, I suppose.

PAUL

Rand Paul Names Hedge Fund Chief Mark Zpitznagel as Economic Advisor // NYT // Alexandra Stevenson – June 19, 2015

Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky has appointed Mark Spitznagel, the hedge fund manager, as a senior economic adviser as he seeks the Republican presidential nomination.

At first blush, the two might seem like an odd pair. Mr. Spitznagel is the founder of Universa Investments, a $6 billion hedge fund that is set up to make money in an economic crisis.

But the two share a similar outlook on the government's role in the financial markets: that it should not have one.

Mr. Paul, whose policies are inspired by libertarianism, has promoted his belief in limited government spending and a hands-off approach to the economy by the Federal Reserve. Mr. Spitznagel has argued that the Fed's recent policy of quantitative easing, which involved pumping trillions of dollars into the financial system, set the stage for the next market reckoning.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"As I travel across the country, the top concern of the American people is our failing economy," Mr. Paul said in a written statement. "I look forward to working alongside Mark to solve our nation's economic problem and to restore the American dream," he added.

In his own statement, Mr. Spitznagel credited Mr. Paul as the only presidential candidate who understood "the destructive ramifications" of the Fed's current policy. "I look forward to working with him on his ideas and message to change that policy," Mr. Spitznagel said.

Mr. Spitznagel, who is 44, gained credibility for predicting two market routs over the last decade, first in 2000 and then in 2008. In the 2008 financial crisis, his Universa funds rose by 115 percent as the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index plummeted. Mr. Spitznagel believes the next market rout is coming soon.

"There needs to be a purge," he said in an interview with The New York Times in 2013. "If there isn't a purge, you don't get healthy growth."

His thinking is shaped by the Austrian school of economics, which has its roots in 19th-century Vienna and makes the argument that the government should not meddle in any part of the economy because when it does, it causes all kinds of distortions.

In addition to limiting the role of the government in the markets, Mr. Spitznagel has had other ideas on how to bolster the economy. Last year, he brought 18 goats to a blighted neighborhood in Detroit to help clean it up. Part of his plan was to employ local residents to take care of the goats, which he hoped to increase to 60 in total.

But the plan was thwarted by city officials who argued local laws prohibited animals from grazing on city property. Within 48 hours the goats were back on a truck, destined for the butcher.

Mr. Spitznagel is also a friend of Mr. Paul's father, Ron Paul, a former Texas congressman and presidential candidate. The elder Mr. Paul wrote a foreword in Mr. Spitznagel's book, "The Dao of Capital" (Wiley, 2013), in which Mr. Spitznagel outlines his philosophy of the markets.

Rand Paul taps hedge-fund manager as senior economic advisor // Politico // Daniel Strauss – June 19, 2015

Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul has brought on a hedge-fund manager known for his strong support for the so-called Austrian school of economics as a senior economic adviser for his 2016 presidential campaign.

Paul's campaign announced Friday that Mark Spitznagel, the founder and chief investment officer of the $6 billion investment management firm Universa Investments L.P., would be joining the campaign. Spitznagel has been a vocal critic of the Federal Reserve and an advocate of the Austrian school of economics, which argues vigorously against government intervention in the economy.

"Rand Paul is the only candidate that really understands the destructive ramifications of current economic policy driven in large part by a reckless Federal Reserve. I look forward to working with him on his ideas and message to change that policy," Spitznagel said in a statement released on Friday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Spitznagel seems like a comfortable ideological fit with Paul, who has repeatedly criticized the Federal Reserve's use of monetary policy during the 2007-2008 financial crisis and has pushed legislation to "audit the Fed."

"I am very grateful to have Mark Spitznagel serve as Economic Advisor to my campaign," Paul said in a statement. "As I travel across the country, the top concern of the American people is our failing economy. I believe we can revitalize our economy by encouraging opportunity and entrepreneurship with lower taxes, a balanced budget, less Federal Reserve interventionism, and limited government spending. I look forward to working alongside Mark to solve our nation's economic problem [sic] and to restore the American Dream."

character: In 2014, he sent 20 goats to a blighted neighborhood in Detroit to graze there in what he called an "urban farming experiment." At the end of that summer, he promised to give the goats to butchers and send the profits to help the community.

"Goats are an effective way to do landscaping," he told The New York Times.

A New 'Rand Paul' Super PAC is Making Paul's Official Super PAC Nervous // Bloomberg // David Weigel – June 19, 2015

The phone calls were confounding, until they multiplied. People at the top of Kentucky Senator Rand Paul's network were being asked about a new group that wanted to turn donations into campaign wins. What, they asked, was the Concerned American Voters super PAC?

The short answer: A headache. The new iteration of the CAV super PAC is the child of a movement that mostly helps but sometimes bedevils Rand Paul. It was relaunched this week, with much fanfare, when long-time FreedomWorks CEO Matt Kibbe announced that he'd left the Tea Party group to become a senior PAC advisor. The new PAC would try to organize Iowa for Paul, starting with 40-full time organizers. Kibbe's goal, he told reporter Byron Tau, was to prevent 2016 from being another "train wreck for the GOP" by out-organizing the Republican establishment.

At FreedomWorks, Kibbe had endorsed Paul's work whenever he could. In 2013, he and FreedomWorks endorsed Paul's filibuster over the legality of drone warfare. In 2014, he stood behind Paul to endorse the senator's civil suit over the NSA's bulk data collection program, "on behalf of our six million-plus members."

Yet people close to Paul discouraged Kibbe from building up his own PAC. It was nothing personal; it was just that the candidate had already sanctioned America's Liberty PAC. One source euphemistically described Kibbe's move as entrepreneurial, to emphasize that the senator had not been pining for a second super PAC.

"We have no animosity and Mr. Kibbe is free to support Rand in any way he likes," America's Liberty PAC Jesse Benton told Bloomberg in an e-mail. "America's Liberty PAC, however, will remain the only Super PAC endorsed by Senator Paul, and the only PAC that will host Senator Paul at events."

Benton, that PAC's lead strategist, has spent eight years in Paul's orbit. He became the spokesman for the quixotic presidential campaign of his father, former Texas Congressman Ron Paul, in 2007. He went on to work with Paul's congressional re-election committee, for his Liberty PAC, for the Campaign for Liberty (a non-profit grassroots group created in the wake of the presidential bid) and for his 2012 presidential campaign—and during all that, he married Paul's granddaughter and started a family. Benton and Campaign for Liberty president John Tate were making America's Liberty PAC what Right to Rise PAC was for Jeb Bush, or what Priorities USA Action was for Hillary Clinton.

But Concerned American Voters pulled from another group of pro-Paul activists. Its president is Jeff Frazee, who ran Ron Paul's youth outreach campaign in 2008 and turned that into the still-growing Young Americans for Liberty. Its senior tech advisor is Steve Oskoui, president of the 2012 pro-Ron Paul Endorse Liberty PAC that convinced Silicon Valley entrepreneur Peter Thiel to fork over $2 million. Thiel, famously, has resisted making a similar commitment to Rand Paul. While America's Liberty PAC is most famous (so far) for a WWE-styled commercial for Paul's PATRIOT Act filibusters, CAV is packaging itself as an on-the-ground disrupter.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We already have 40 full-time field staffers in Iowa knocking on doors and making phone calls," Frazee told Bloomberg. "Our team has knocked on over 75,000 doors and made over 70,000 phone calls as of today. We're building a grassroots operation that the other candidates won't be able to compete with in Iowa. Based on polling and the responses we're getting back, it's certainly a state we think Rand can win."

If anything, Frazee was even more ambitious in a Thursday statement about the new PAC. "By focusing on grassroots organization, e-marketing and proven Get Out The Vote tactics, Concerned American Voters will give Rand the edge he needs to win the Republican nomination and the general election," he said. "The Internet cuts out middlemen, party bosses, lobbyists, and bundlers looking for a quid pro quo. This is the dynamic that allowed then-Senate candidate Rand Paul to beat Mitch McConnell's hand-picked successor in Kentucky in 2010."

Benton might not put those exact words together. In 2013 and 2014, he embodied the rapprochement between Paul and McConnell by serving as McConnell's campaign manager. He only left, late in the campaign, after nagging questions about the Ron Paul campaign's 2012 endorsement from an Iowa state senator who took a kickback. In the sprawling, grassroots side of Paul movement, the branding of America's Liberty PAC leaves something to be desired.

Yet Concerned American Voters is no blank slate. As Ken Vogel has reported, Kibbe left FreedomWorks after a years-long struggle that spilled into the media. After the disappointing losses of the 2012 election, FreedomWorks president Dick Armey resigned, and Kibbe took over. In 2013, Armey himself went on a PR tear, describing a fight over the writing and rights of Kibbe's 2012 book, decrying the "secrecy" with which money came in for campaigns.

Later in 2013, when Buzzfeed reported that FreedomWorks was in "dire financial straights," the group dismissed the "baseless attacks" and went ahead funding a series of 2014 Republican primary challenges—with limited success. According to FreedomWorks's 990 tax filing, its revenue dropped dramatically in 2013, and it ended the filing period with less than $1 million in net assets, down from around $5 million the year before. In the same period, Kibbe's compensation was cut from $321,343 to $258,619.

But Kibbe no longer works for FreedomWorks. "The Concerned American Voters team is going going to focus on grassroots organization, GOTV, door knocking, and social media persuasion and canvassing," Kibbe told Bloomberg in an e-mail. "This is our comparative advantage, and it nicely complements what the other Rand PAC is doing. I think we both add value in our efforts to ensure a Rand Paul victory."

Asked if he had been discouraged to join and build a new pro-Paul PAC, Kibbe said he hadn't. "I think everyone is good and we will run a very inclusive operation that does not step on other folks' toes."

Rand Paul Pitches Plan to 'Blow Up' Tax Code // AP // June 19, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Rand Paul called Thursday for a "fair and flat tax" that would "blow up" the nation's tax code, offering a proposal his campaign said would cut taxes by $2 trillion over the next decade.

The first-term senator from Kentucky released the outline of a plan to institute a 14.5 percent income tax rate on all individuals and on businesses. It was among the first major policy proposals released by Paul's presidential campaign, although he did not make the full plan available for review.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Basically my conclusion is the tax code can't be fixed and should be scrapped," he said in an interview with The Associated Press. "We should start over."

Many of the dozen major Republican candidates for president list tax reform among their priorities. Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, for example, is among the GOP contenders calling for the wholesale abolition of the Internal Revenue Service -- a position many experts say is unrealistic.

But few have offered detailed proposals, and while Paul said his plan would benefit American both rich and poor, he cited an independent analysis that his campaign did not make available to reporters.

In a column describing highlights of his plan published Thursday in The Wall Street Journal, Paul called for the outright elimination of payroll taxes on workers and of several other federal taxes, including those on gifts and estates, telephone service and all duties and tariffs. He also proposed eliminating all corporate tax subsidies and personal tax deductions, except those for mortgage interest and charitable donations.

Paul says the first $50,000 of income for a family of four would not be taxed and the earned-income tax credit would be preserved.

"In Washington, most Republicans are very tepid and very uninspiring on tax policy," he said in the interview.

It was not clear how Paul would ensure cutting taxes so deeply would not at the same time explode the nation's debt. He wrote in the column that his plan would "reduce the national debt by trillions of dollars over time when combined with my package of spending cuts," but he did not detail those cuts.

In the interview, Paul referred to his previous budget proposals, which include sweeping cuts in foreign and domestic spending. In particular, he has previously called to eliminate all aid to foreign governments, including Israel. He has also proposed eliminating the federal departments of education, energy and housing and urban affairs.

He noted, however, he's also called for increased national security spending in his most recent spending plans. "I think that the priority for spending is national defense and national security so we don't have significant cuts in our preparedness," he said.

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio stands out among his Republican colleagues for offering the most detailed economic agenda of the GOP candidates for president, anchored by a massive tax cut that the conservative Tax Foundation said could add as much as $4 trillion to the nation's debt in its first decade.

That approach keeps with conservative economic thinking that the best way to spark growth and increase wages is to reduce the tax burden on businesses, the wealthy and investors. Rubio would also eliminate all taxes on investment income, a change that largely favors the most wealthy Americans.

Like Paul's emphasis on tax cuts, however, it is an approach that exposed Republicans to Democratic criticism that they favor the rich.

While Paul offers just one tax rate, Rubio's plan would set two: 15 percent for those making less than $75,000 (or families earning under $150,000), and 35 percent for all making more.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Our outdated policies from yesterday are not going to fix this," Rubio said Thursday while calling for new tax policies in a speech to religious conservatives.

"The more your employer pays you, the less they will owe in taxes to the IRS," he said of his plan. "We will help working families by helping them to keep more of what they earn."

Cruz, meanwhile, has repeatedly promised to scrap the tax-collecting agency as he runs for the GOP presidential nomination.

He did not address taxes while speaking to evangelical Christians on Thursday, but Cruz advisers said the senator would soon release more details on his proposal, which he has said would allow most Americans to file their taxes on the back of a postcard-size form.

Rand Paul's First Two Books Are Full Of Fake Founding Fathers Quotes // Buzzfeed // Andrew Kaczynski and Megan Apper – June 18, 2015

Many of the quotes attributed to the Founding Fathers in two of Rand Paul's books are either fake, misquoted, or taken entirely out of context, BuzzFeed News has found.

Paul's first two books — Government Bullies, which was an e-book best-seller, and*The Tea Party Goes to Washington* — lay out the conservative manifesto he hoped to bring to Washington following the tea party wave in 2010.

A heavy theme in Paul's books is that the tea party movement is the intellectual heir to the Founding Fathers, with Paul often arguing he knows what position our country's earliest leaders would have had on certain issues.

The final line in Paul's book The Tea Party Goes to Washington is a fake sentiment attributed to Jefferson:

> The Constitution is very clear about it. The Tea Party's job is to keep making things clearer, and this is only the beginning. It is not a job that will be finished overnight or even in an election cycle. Thomas Jefferson believed that the price of liberty was eternal vigilance — and now the Tea Party must prove it.

"We currently have no evidence to confirm that Thomas Jefferson ever said or wrote" this phrase, the Thomas Jefferson Foundation has said of "the price of liberty was eternal vigilance," which Paul uses twice in his book.

Earlier, Paul used another fake Jefferson quote:

> In their wisdom, the Founding Fathers— whose Constitution was supposed to restrain our rulers— would have likely made the same prediction. Jefferson wrote, "My reading of history convinces me that most bad government results from too much government." This has certainly been true of too much government intervention, as well as attempts to administer too many government benefits.

"This exact quotation has not been found in any of the writings of Thomas Jefferson," writes the Thomas Jefferson Foundation.

Writing on the Patriot Act, Paul again cites a fake Jefferson quote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“This sort of invasiveness is also precisely the reason we have a Second Amendment protecting our right to keep and bear arms, or as Jefferson wrote ‘The strongest reason for the people to retain the right to keep and bear arms is, as a last resort, to protect themselves against tyranny in government.’”

As noted by the Thomas Jefferson Foundation, “this quotation has not been found in any of the writings of Thomas Jefferson.”

Later, writing on Obamacare, Paul cites a different fake Jefferson quote.

When Thomas Jefferson wrote that a “government big enough to give you everything you want is big enough to take away everything you have,” he could have easily been referencing Obamacare.

“Neither this quotation nor any of its variant forms has been found in the writings of Thomas Jefferson,” writes the Thomas Jefferson Foundation. The foundation notes that it has been attributed to Gerald Ford, though an assistant to Ford said he heard it from someone else.

Another quote cited by Paul from Jefferson appears to be a misquote.

“To compel a man to subsidize with his taxes the propagation of ideas which he disbelieves and abhors is sinful and tyrannical,” reads the Jefferson quote at the beginning on one chapter.

As noted by the Thomas Jefferson Foundation, this quote comes from Jefferson’s Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom and the original actually reads, “to compel a man to furnish contributions of money for the propagation of opinions which he disbelieves and abhors, is sinful and tyrannical.”

Paul also uses a fake George Washington quote.

Such is the nature of government, which is precisely why the Founders viewed military use, even when warranted, as something that should be definite and limited. George Washington told us: “Government is not reason; it is not eloquence; it is force.... Never for a moment should it be left to irresponsible action.” Science tells us that for every action there is an equal and opposite reaction. Yet today it seems we are much less hesitant to use government action, whether abroad or domestically, than the Founders could have ever imagined. The Founding Fathers also would not be surprised to see that trying to solve problems with continuous government action creates its own set of problems. Not surprisingly, the majority of what our federal government does today, abroad or domestically, also continues to take place well outside the parameters of the Constitution.

The quote, as noted by professor Eugene Volokh and Fred Shapiro, editor of the*Yale Book of Quotations*, is also fake.

“This is undoubtedly apocryphal, like many other quotations attributed to Lincoln or Washington,” said Shapiro. “No one has ever found any evidence that Washington said it.”

Later in the book, a quote from Benjamin Franklin is used out of context. In the context of the quote as used in the 1750s, Franklin was actually speaking in support of not only taxation but also defense spending.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Writes Paul:

> Who's to say the Tea Party won't become the government's next target under the PATRIOT Act? Benjamin Franklin once wrote, "They who can give up essential liberty to obtain a little temporary safety, deserve neither liberty nor safety," and Americans who continue to support unconstitutional intrusions into the private lives of their fellow citizens will inevitably learn the same lesson.

As noted by Benjamin Wittes, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and the editor of Lawfare blog, the letter from Franklin concerned a dispute between the Pennsylvania General Assembly and the Penn family.

"He was writing about a tax dispute between the Pennsylvania General Assembly and the family of the Penns, the proprietary family of the Pennsylvania colony who ruled it from afar," Wittes said recently on NPR.

"And the legislature was trying to tax the Penn family lands to pay for frontier defense during the French and Indian War. And the Penn family kept instructing the governor to veto. Franklin felt that this was a great affront to the ability of the legislature to govern. And so he actually meant purchase a little temporary safety very literally. The Penn family was trying to give a lump sum of money in exchange for the General Assembly's acknowledging that it did not have the authority to tax it."

Paul also mischaracterized this quote in his second book, Government Bullies, on two separate occasions with slightly different variations.

Writes Paul in his book, "as Benjamin Franklin famously said and our Founders knew well, those who trade liberty for security get neither."

Then, Paul cites a fake Thomas Jefferson quote again to lead off the chapter "Living Everyday in Fear of Your Government."

"When governments fear the people, there is liberty. When the people fear the government, there is tyranny," Paul cites Jefferson as saying.

But again, the Thomas Jefferson Foundation notes they "have not found any evidence that Thomas Jefferson said or wrote" these remarks.

Paul's chapter "Paved With Good Intentions" also starts off with a mischaracterized Jefferson quote.

"If people let the government decide what foods they eat and what medicines they take, their bodies will soon be in as sorry a state as the souls who live under tyranny," Paul attributes to Jefferson.

As noted again by the Thomas Jefferson Foundation, "This quotation has never been found in Jefferson's papers in its above form, but it is most likely a paraphrase of Jefferson's statement in Notes on the State of Virginia, "Was the government to prescribe to us our medicine and diet, our bodies would be in such keeping as our souls are now."

Paul's chapter "How Can We Solve the Problem" starts off with a quote from former President James Madison that is likewise disputed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“If tyranny and oppression come to this land it will be in the guise of fighting a foreign enemy,” Paul quotes Madison saying.

As noted by etymologist Barry Popik there’s no evidence Madison said it, and no citations link it to Madison before the 21st century.

In the past three weeks, Paul has misattributed a quote to former President Abraham Lincoln (a quote he again repeated in a speech today) and used a fake quote from Founding Father Patrick Henry. Previously, Paul used a fake Thomas Jefferson quote in his Senate victory speech.

At CPAC in 2011, Paul cited a Jefferson quote that the Thomas Jefferson Foundation says they have “no evidence” he ever said.

Paul’s campaign declined to comment, and the book publisher did not respond to request for comment.

CRUZ

Ted Cruz: Democrats using Charleston as ‘excuse’ to take away gun rights // WaPo // Katie Zezima – June 19, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.) said Friday that Democrats are using the shooting deaths of nine people in a Charleston, S.C., African American church as an "excuse" to try to roll back gun rights.

"It’s sad to see the Democrats take a horrific crime and try to use it as an excuse not to go after people with serious mental illness or people who are repeat felons or criminals but rather try to use it as an excuse to take away the Second Amendment rights of law abiding citizens," Cruz told reporters after a town hall event here.

"Those are altogether different issues and we need to focus on protecting our Bill of Rights and also on keeping everyone safe."

Cruz said it is evocative of a line used by Chicago Mayor and former White House chief of staff Rahm Emanuel.

"I’ll tell you it’s reminiscent of Rahm Emanuel who said you never let a good crisis go to waste," Cruz said.

Cruz said, as he did Thursday, that he is "horrified" by the killings and offered his prayers to the families of the victims.

"A sick and deranged man went and prayed for an hour with the congregants in an historically black church and then, for reasons that we don’t fully understand murdered nine innocent souls," Cruz said of Dylann Roof, who was charged with nine counts of murder. The nine victims were shot Wednesday night inside Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church in Charleston, the South’s oldest African American church.

"Sadly there is evil in the world and there is evil in the world that has to be dealt with. We’ll find out more about this crazed gunman and what led this to happen."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Roof confessed to police, a law enforcement official said, and wanted his actions known. In an extraordinary display at Roof's bond hearing Friday, relatives of the dead offered him forgiveness.

A reporter for The Huffington Post asked Cruz why it has been "difficult" for Republicans to "acknowledge that the attack was racially driven."

Cruz said he disagreed with the premise of the question.

"It appears to be racially driven from what was reported that this deranged man said and a racial hate crime is horrific. And any murder is horrific," Cruz said. "I don't think we should be using this question to try to divide people and to try to seek partisan advantage. I think we should be praying for those who lost loved ones."

Cruz said earlier that Democrats like to "go after our rights to keep and bear arms" and there has been a "consistent pattern" from the Obama administration and Democrats of violating the Constitution and Bill of Rights.

During the town hall event Cruz defended Second Amendment rights and used a quip he tailors for the states he is visiting on campaign trail: "The great thing about the state of Iowa is pretty sure y'all define gun control the same way we do in Texas: hitting what you aim at."

Cruz is scheduled to attend a "celebrate the Second Amendment" event in Iowa Saturday. He recalled going to a gun range in New Hampshire recently that had a fully automatic machine gun on a tripod. His wife Heidi, whom he described as a "petite California blond," fired the machine gun while wearing a "pink baseball cap that said 'armed and fabulous,'" he said.

Cruz comm its to 'full Grassley' in caucus run // Des Moines Register // Matthew Patane – June 19, 2015

Speaking from the home city of one of his fellow U.S. senators, Ted Cruz committed Friday to completing a full 99-county tour of Iowa as he competes for his party's presidential nomination.

"I'm going to be spending a lot of time in your great state. Indeed, between now and the Iowa caucuses, it is my intention to do what I guess is called the 'full Grassley' ..." Cruz told a crowd in Red Oak, the home of U.S. Sen. Joni Ernst.

The Red Oak stop was part of a series of visits Cruz is making this weekend. He gave a similar speech at a stop in Denison.

Friday's speeches focused on many of the same issues he has laid out at prior events, such as religious liberty, maintaining the Constitution, fighting terrorism and distancing himself from Washington, D.C.

"If you think things in Washington are going great, we're on the right trajectory, we just need someone to fiddle around the edges — I ain't your guy," the Texas Republican said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rod Goodemote , 49, of Villisca brought his 11-year-old daughter, Bethany, to the town hall to witness "history in the making."

"This is history 101, right here," Goodemote said.

After hearing him speak, Goodemote said Cruz could "very well be my guy."

"I think that we need a man that fears and respects God," he said. "We need a man that has wisdom, and wisdom comes from God. We need a man that supports life, that understands that God is the author of life."

Earlier in the day, the leaders of Cruz's Iowa campaign took over for him at a stop in Council Bluffs. A canceled flight kept Cruz from making it in time for the town hall.

In Council Bluffs, registered nurse Barb Wunderlich came from her night shift to see Cruz speak.

Although disappointed he wasn't there, Wunderlich said she is "pretty much all in" for Cruz because he's a constitutionalist and because of his faith. "Ted's the whole package to me. Any of the guys — except for (Donald) Trump and Jeb Bush — that are running would probably be good. Ted would be best," said Wunderlich, who lives in Glenwood.

David Overholtzer, a self-employed certified public accountant in Council Bluffs, said he hasn't decided who to back in the 2016 race.

"I haven't seen one I wouldn't be comfortable with in the White House. ... I'm looking for fresh ideas," Overholtzer said.

Cruz was the first contender to enter the Republican presidential race, but he sits in the middle of the pack in a number of polls.

Five percent of likely caucusgoers said Cruz is their current first choice in the most recent Des Moines Register/ Bloomberg Politics poll. That ranks him eighth in the field of 16 declared and possible contenders.

The event

SETTING: In Council Bluffs, a meeting room in the city's public library. In Red Oak, a conference room at the Red Coach Inn & Restaurant. In Denison, a dining room in Cronk's Cafe.

CROWD: About 60 people started at Council Bluffs, but only about 30 were left by the end of the event, which Cruz did not attend. About 73 showed up in Red Oak and about 80 in Denison.

REACTION: Sighs of disappointment, followed by relatively calm discussion in Council Bluffs. In Red Oak and Denison, Cruz was greeted with multiple rounds of applause around some of his more popular lines, such as jokes about the Obama administration. One supporter rang a cowbell multiple times during Cruz's speech in Denison.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WHAT'S NEXT: On Saturday, Cruz is scheduled to attend a "Celebrate the 2nd Amendment" event in Johnston.

PERRY

Rick Perry calls Charleston church shooting an 'accident' // WaPo // Patrick Svitek – June 19, 2015

The one presidential candidate who cannot make a mistake did just that Friday.

Addressing Wednesday's massacre at a South Carolina church, former Texas governor Rick Perry referred to it as an "accident." His campaign quickly clarified that he meant "incident," but not before the apparent slip of the tongue sparked a social media backlash, inviting inevitable comparisons to the so-called "oops" moment that defined Perry's last bid for the White House.

The comment came during a TV interview in which Perry was asked about President Obama's response to the shooting, which left nine people dead at the historically black Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church in Charleston. In a speech Thursday, Obama suggested more gun control might be necessary to prevent tragedies like it.

"This is the M.O. of this administration anytime there is a accident like this," Perry told Newsmax's Steve Malzberg in an interview published Friday. "You know, the president's clear. He doesn't like for Americans to have guns, and so he uses every opportunity, this being another one, to basically go parrot that message."

Shortly after Perry's remark began making headlines and ricocheting around social media, spokesman Travis Considine indicated the former governor misspoke. "From the context of his comments, it is clear Gov. Perry meant incident," Considine said in a statement.

But the sound bite had already become a hot topic online, evoking memories of the 2012 debate where Perry was unable to remember the third federal agency he would eliminate if elected president.

In the Newsmax interview, Perry spoke extensively about the shooting, saying he did not know whether it was an act of terror but did know it was a "crime of hate." He also suggested the alleged shooter, 21-year-old Dylann Roof, may have been "medicated," apparently tying the issue to his campaign's outreach to current and former members of the military.

"I know for a fact, being a substantial supporter of our military and our veterans, that the Veterans Administration, for instance, is handing out these opioids in massive amounts," Perry told Malzberg. "And then people question, 'Well then why can't these young individuals get work?' or 'Why is the suicide rate so high?' "

Perry was also asked whether the Confederate flag should fly over the South Carolina Capitol in the aftermath of the shooting, which many consider racially motivated. In his response, Perry reminded Malzberg that the Supreme Court ruled Wednesday that Texas has the right to refuse to issue Confederate license plates, a decision with which he agrees. And Perry indicated he would be open to taking down the flag in South Carolina, saying "maybe there's a good conversation that needs to be had."

Rick Perry Says Obama Administration Always Overreacts to 'Accidents' Like Charleston Shooting // Think Progress // Kay Steiger – June 19, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In an interview with Steve Malzberg's Newsmax TV program on Friday, Republican presidential candidate and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry called the shooting deaths of nine black church members in Charleston, S.C. an "accident."

"This is the M.O. of this administration, any time there is an accident like this — the president is clear, he doesn't like for Americans to have guns and so he uses every opportunity, this being another one, to basically go parrot that message," Perry said in response to President Barack Obama's Thursday remarks, according to a video posted by RWW blog.

Perry then went on to say that Dylann Storm Roof, the alleged shooter who confessed to the killing, may have been unduly influenced by drugs. "Also, I think there is a real issue to be talked about. It seems to me, again without having all the details about this, that these individuals have been medicated and there may be a real issue in this country from the standpoint of these drugs and how they're used."

He may have been referring to a theory the conspiracy website Infowars posted about on Thursday that postulated Roof may have been taking a drug called suboxone, which supposedly causes personalities to change and prompt violent outbursts in its users.

Perry also called the incident "a crime of hate."

GRAHAM

Returning Home to Console, Lindsey Graham Joins t he Mourning // NYT // Ashley Parker – June 19, 2015

Senator Lindsey Graham was in the passenger seat on Friday, preparing to make what would be the first of many difficult phone calls in the coming days.

Mr. Graham, a South Carolina Republican and 2016 presidential hopeful, was running down a list, calling the families of the nine people who were killed Wednesday night at a historic black church.

First on his list: John Pinckney, the father of the church's slain pastor, the Rev. Clementa C. Pinckney, a state senator whom Mr. Graham knew.

"I just wanted to say, well, I feel terrible, but nobody can feel it like you do," Mr. Graham said, clearing his throat. "Your son — every time he walked into the room, I'd smile because I knew I was going to get something nice said, and a request to help someone other than himself."

"You raised a fine man," the senator continued.

People attended a vigil on Friday for the nine shooting victims at the College of Charleston TD Arena in Charleston, S.C. Credit Travis Dove for The New York Times

"It's hard for people, particularly in the South, to imagine somebody could go into a church, stay for Bible study, talk to people for an hour, look them in the eye, and then stand up and start shooting," Mr. Graham said.

"Even the crazy people, they don't go into church," he said.

Mr. Graham visited the church Thursday evening, quietly making his way there with a bouquet of lilies, bowing his head, and offering a short prayer. "For comfort and healing and understanding to those who have suffered in a way that most of us can never imagine," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He spent Friday morning shuttling around town for television interviews, making himself a presence on screens throughout the city. Later, his aides sent him a list of the victims' families for him to call. And Friday evening, he arrived at a prayer vigil here, greeting residents who had come to mourn with handshakes and hugs.

Continue reading the main story

Who Is Running for President (and Who's Not)?

In the process, he also grappled with the racial history of his state, which in many ways he himself embodies. He did not have an African-American classmate until middle school, and said he did not experience full integration until high school.

The importance of the end of segregation, he said, could not be overstated: "It's not just for a black family to go to a better school," he said. "It's for white kids at an early age to understand that merit and leadership are not unique to one group."

And in an e-book he recently released, he recalled growing up underfoot at his parents' bar, which sold beer to anyone of legal age but for many years expected black patrons to drink it off premises. "That eventually changed, but not until the early seventies, much later than it should have," he wrote.

He said he thinks he has earned some credibility among South Carolina's black communities by being open to working with Democrats, and supporting some of Mr. Obama's nominees, like Loretta E. Lynch, a black woman, who is now attorney general. Yet during his Senate re-election campaign last year, he won just 6 percent of the state's black vote.

But on Friday morning, he clarified when asked, saying he believed it was a racially motivated hate crime. "The only reason these people are dead is because they're black," he said.

Later, Mr. Graham described Mr. Roof as "a racial jihadist."

He also fielded questions about the Confederate flag, demurring when asked if he believed it should continue to fly on the grounds of the State Capitol. He was fine revisiting the issue, he said, but it was a decision for the State Legislature.

On the question of gun control, he said he welcomed a debate on background checks for guns, but that the current background check system was broken.

"We'll talk about guns, we'll talk about the flag, we'll talk about anything you want to talk about, but we're going to bury these people with dignity, we're going to honor their memory," Mr. Graham told one television reporter.

But throughout it all, Mr. Graham could not seem to shake the question: How could someone enter a church, attend a Bible study, an then open fire, killing nine people?

He kept coming back to it — when former Senator Saxby Chambliss called him to offer condolences and when he set out Friday morning, the temperature sliding past 80 degrees before the sun was even ripe in the sky.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The night before, over dinner — his usual fried green tomatoes and fried chicken livers at Magnolias— Mr. Graham wondered again and again, what it must have been like to learn that your loved one had gone off to Bible study and was not coming home.

“I don’t know why I’m fixated on it, but I just keep thinking about what it must be like, to pick up the phone and hear your loved one was killed at church,” he said.

Lindsey Graham: Confederate Flag Is a “Part of Who We Are” // Mother Jones // Inae Oh – June 19, 2015

Following the mass shooting inside a black church in Charleston, South Carolina on Wednesday, one flag was conspicuously not lowered to half-mast in tribute to the nine lives lost in the deadly attack—the Confederate flag, which regularly flies on the grounds of the state capitol, despite countless calls for its removal because of its racist roots.

The rebel flag's presence in Columbia was especially disturbing this week after images surfaced showing the suspected gunman's embrace of the flag, which was on his license plates. (Dylann Roof also wore patches baring the flags of Apartheid-era South Africa and Rhodesia, the racist symbolism of which was evident.)

While other GOP politicians, including Massachusetts Gov. Charlie Baker, are criticizing the flag's enduring presence, Sen. Lindsey Graham, who hails from South Carolina and is now running for president, has come to the rebel flag's defense. According to Graham, the Confederate flag is an integral "part of who we are."

This isn't exactly surprising, considering Graham appeared on "The View" yesterday to promote his new e-book and brushed aside the obvious racial overtones of the attacks, suggesting that suspected shooter Dylann Roof was seeking to massacre Christians. "This guy's just whacked out," he said. "It's 2015—there are people who are looking for Christians to kill them."

Although Graham acknowledged to CNN the flag has been used to push racist agendas in the past, he said "the problems we have in South Carolina and throughout the world" do not stem from symbols, but because of "what's in people's heart."

"How do you go back and reconstruct America?" he asked hopelessly.

Actually, here's one solution: remove the damn Confederate flag.

CARSON

‘Crazy’ Ben Carson Is The GOP’s Voice of Sanity on Charleston // Daily Beast // Olivia Nuzzi – June 19, 2015

Before today, Ben Carson was far from the voice of reason in the Republican party. The brain surgeon and presidential candidate has purveyed theories like “Obamacare is worse than slavery” and Obama’s America is reminiscent of Nazi Germany.

Now, however, Carson has the distinction of being the lone Republican candidate to be honest and plainspoken about the fact that racism was the motive for the Charleston church shooting.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

How we got here is a sad indictment of American politics, where candidates would rather shove their fist in their mouths or speak in riddles than risk upsetting anyone with the reality of racism.

It started yesterday afternoon. Just before Rand Paul took to the stage of the Omni Shoreham Hotel in Washington, where a crowd of evangelical conservatives waited for him to speak, police arrested Dylann Storm Roof. A 21 year old white supremacist, Roof had, the night before, walked into a historic black church in Charleston, South Carolina, sat among its congregation for a time, and then opened fire, murdering nine of them.

It seemed obvious that Paul would address the tragedy before the self-anointed "Faith and Freedom Coalition."

If the Republican Party is truly shifting to appeal to new (i.e., less white) constituencies, it is Paul who is helping to lead the way by openly discussing things Republicans of primaries past wouldn't touch, like the failed war on drugs, criminal justice reform, and the fact that "race…skew[s] the application" of justice in America.

But, when Paul opened his mouth to discuss the terrorist attack in Charleston, what came out was a confusing string of words designed to assure the Christian crowd that none of it would've happened if more Americans were like them.

How we got here is a sad indictment of American politics, where candidates would rather shove their fist in their mouths or speak in riddles than risk upsetting anyone with the reality of racism.

"What kind of person goes into church and shoots nine people?" he asked. "There's a sickness in our country, there's something terribly wrong, but it isn't going to be fixed by your government. It's people straying away, it's people not understanding where salvation comes from. And I think that if we understand that, we'll understand and have better expectations of what we get from our government."

Paul didn't say anything about Roof's confederate flag license plate, his pro-apartheid emblazoned jacket, or his blatant act of domestic terror.

Ted Cruz, as Talking Point's Memo's Brendan James put it, "kinda dipped his toe in," to the topic of race when he held a moment of silence for the victims and said, "Today the body of Christ is in mourning that a sick and deranged person came and prayed with a historically black congregation for an hour, and then murdered nine innocent souls."

The following day, the Faith and Freedom Coalition's event was still going. Chris Christie took to the stage and acknowledged that the "conduct" of the shooter was "depraved [and] unthinkable," but "only the goodwill and the love of the American people can let those folks know that that act was unacceptable, disgraceful that we need to do more to show that we love each other." He said nothing about race.

Jeb Bush, at the same event, said, "I don't know what was on the mind or the heart of the man who committed these atrocious crimes." After his speech, Bush told The Huffington post, "it was a horrific act and I don't know what the background of it is, but it was an act of hatred." Asked again if race was behind the attack, Bush said, "I don't know. Looks like to me it was, but we'll find out all the information. It's clear it was an act of raw hatred, for sure. Nine people lost their lives, they were African-American. You can judge what it is."

Rick Santorum and Bobby Jindal similarly evaded the issue, while Marco Rubio ignored the shooting altogether, save for a polite Tweet, but spoke of his love for the Second Amendment during his Thursday speech to the Faith and Freedom crowd.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Lindsey Graham, who is the Senator from South Carolina, initially suggested the persecution of Christians was as likely a reason for the shootings as racism. “There are real people out there that are organized to kill people based on race. This guy is just whacked out. But it’s 2015, there are people out there looking for Christians to kill them.” On Friday, however, while visiting Charleston, Graham had made a shift. He told The New York Times’ Ashley Parker, “the only reason these people are dead is because they’re black.”

Rick Perry on Friday told Newsmax “this was a crime of hate. We know that.” But the former Texas governor criticized president Obama’s call for gun control. “So I mean there are a lot of issues here underlying this that we as a country need to have a conversation about rather than just the knee-jerk reaction of saying, ‘if we can just take all the guns away, this won’t happen.’”

During an appearance on MSNBC, Martin O’Malley acknowledged race as the motivating factor but did so timidly. “From the reports I read, and let’s be honest with one another, the facts are still evolving here. I mean, it would appear that the racial motivation was certainly a big part of what happened here.”

In contrast, Hillary Clinton and Bernie Sanders sounded like civil rights activists.

Clinton said that in order to make sense of the shooting, “we have to be honest—we have to face hard truths about race, violence, guns and division,” and offered words of comfort from Dr. Martin Luther King.

Sanders was even more direct.

“The Charleston church killings are a tragic reminder of the ugly stain of racism that still taints our nation,” he said in a statement. “While we have made significant progress in advancing civil rights in this country, we are far from eradication racism.”

But it was Carson who stuck out amid the cowardly tongue-twisting of the majority of his party’s candidates with his straightforwardness.

"Racial based hate is still very much alive as last night so violently reminds us,” he wrote on Facebook. “I fear our intolerance of one another is the new battle ground of evil. Today many feel it is ok to hate someone who thinks different than you do…As a brain surgeon I can assure you that all of our brains look the same, no matter what our skin color or party affiliation.”

And so here we are, with Ben Carson—the right-wing sideshow who, despite competitive polling, could never truly be taken seriously as a candidate because of his proclivity for voicing off-the-rails theories and his complete lack of political experience—is teaching the rest of the Republican field how to sound like a human being when discussing a tragedy caused by racism in America. The real absurdity of American politics is that the people running for office are more often than not the ones stupid enough to believe that they can only win if they are so agreeable that they ignore reality altogether, fearing that acknowledging its ugliness might reflect it onto them.

Perhaps that’s why Carson felt free to say the truth before poll-testing it, and without insulating it in caveats.

Ben Carson Not for Traditional Marriage // Real Clear Politics // Rebecca Berg – June 19, 2015

Should the Supreme Court decide this month that state same-sex marriage bans are not constitutional, some Republican presidential candidates plan to push for a constitutional amendment to define marriage as between one man and one woman.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Ben Carson would not be one of them.

In an interview Friday with RealClearPolitics, the neurosurgeon and conservative favorite said although he "would not be in agreement" with a ruling to legalize gay marriage nationwide, "I think you always have the obligation to uphold the laws of the land."

"My strong belief is that everybody i protected by the Constitution, regardless of their sexual orientation, their race, whatever," Carson said. "That needs to be our primary focus."

The Supreme Court is expected to decide within the next two weeks whether state bans on gay marriage are constitutional.

Carson has been vocal about his support for "traditional marriage," and has indicated that he views homosexuality as a choice.

But he said Friday that his primary concern regarding a Supreme Court ruling would be with any groups granted "extra rights."

"We need not be thinking of providing extra rights to anybody. That's where you get into problems -- where you pick this group or that group and say, 'Well, let's change everything for everybody because you want it that way,'" Carson said. "That's when you start having problems with America as it was envisioned."

He added: "I would be comfortable with phrasing that said, 'Everybody in our society has equal rights, and equal rights of association.'"

Carson was in Washington, D.C., to appear at a conference hosted by the conservative Faith and Freedom Coalition, where the prospect of the Supreme Court legalizing same-sex marriage was vigorously opposed by many speakers.

Sen. Ted Cruz, another Republican candidate for president, warned in a speech Thursday of a deliberate attempt by Democrats to impose "mandatory gay marriage in all 50 states."

"I would encourage everyone here to be lifting up in prayer that [the Supreme Court] not engage in an act of naked and lawless judicial activism tearing down the marriage laws adopted pursuant to the Constitution," Cruz said.

In addition to Cruz, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and former Sen. Rick Santorum have said they will push for a Constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage if the Supreme Court rules to legalize it.

TRUMP

Carl Icahn politely declines Trump Cabinet offer // Politico // Adam B. Lerner – June 19, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Donald Trump may be less than a week into his presidential campaign, but he's already been rebuked by one of his top Cabinet picks.

On Thursday, Trump floated three names that he would possibly nominate as Treasury secretary in the unlikely event that he wins the presidency next year.

"I'd like guys like Jack Welch. I like guys like Henry Kravis. I'd love to bring my friend Carl Icahn," the real estate mogul and current 2016 Republican presidential contender said in an interview Thursday on MSNBC's "Morning Joe."

Icahn, a legendary billionaire 'corporate raider' who founded Icahn enterprises, responded to Trump's comments in a blog post on Shareholders' Square Table, saying, "I am flattered but do not get up early enough in the morning to accept this opportunity."

Though he declined to "opine on [Trump's] chances" to win the presidency, he wrote, "I am knowledgeable concerning markets and believe Donald is completely correct to be concerned that we have 'a big fat bubble' coming up. We have artificially induced low interest rates."

Trump warned in his MSNBC appearance Thursday that interest rates are too low, noting that he had borrowed cheaply to finance the building of a luxury hotel in Washington, D.C. "Without proper leadership, I predict you're going to see some very, very bad things happening economically," he said. "They give you free money."

Icahn agreed with Trump's point wholeheartedly.

"I personally believe we are sailing in dangerous unchartered waters," Icahn wrote. "I can only hope we get to shore safely. Never in the history of the Federal Reserve have interest rates been artificially held down for so long at the extremely low rates existing today."

"I applaud Donald for speaking out on this issue — more people should," he concluded.

Carl Icahn Says He'll Never Be Trump's Treasury Secretary // Bloomberg // Ben Brody – June 19, 2015

Billionaire Carl Icahn doesn't want to be Treasury Secretary in the Trump Administration, but he thinks the Donald is "completely correct" in his concern about interest rates.

"I was extremely surprised to learn that Donald was running for President and even more surprised that he stated he would make me Secretary of Treasury," the activist investor wrote in a statement he linked to on his verified Twitter account. "I am flattered but do not get up early enough in the morning to accept this opportunity."

He added, though, that he thinks the real estate mogul, who is seeking the Republican nomination for president, is right to worry that the U.S. has "a big fat bubble coming up" because of low interest rates.

"I personally believe we are sailing in dangerous unchartered waters," wrote the former corporate raider, who is worth approximately $22 billion and is the 33rd richest person in the world, according to Bloomberg. "I can only hope we get to shore safely. Never in the history of the Federal Reserve have interest rates been artificially held down for so long at the extremely low rates existing today. I applaud Donald for speaking out on this issue — more people should."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump said Thursday he might name his "friend Carl Icahn" treasury secretary of he should find himself in the White House. He also suggested former GE CEO Jack Welch and KKR co-founder Henry Kravis could also fill the spot.

Trump slams Hillary Clinton, calls her 'pathetic' // CNN // Theodore Schleifer – June 19, 2015

Donald Trump said Hillary Clinton is blaming him for the killings in Charleston, South Carolina, an attack he returned as "pathetic" and as evidence that "politicians are just no good."

In an 11-second video posted to his Instagram account on Friday, Trump, the bombastic new entrant into the Republican presidential race, said Clinton "blamed me for the horrendous attack that took place in South Carolina."

In an interview on Thursday, Clinton said Trump's comments about Mexicans during his announcement speech typified the inflammatory rhetoric that could "trigger people who are less than stable to do something" like the shootings.

Trump said during his speech that some Mexicans who come to the United States are "rapists."

"Everybody should stand up and say that's not acceptable. You know, you don't talk like that on talk radio," Clinton said in the interview.

Donald Trump 'felt bad' for bashing Jeb Bush // CNN // Tom LoBianco – June 19, 2015

Republican candidate Donald Trump says he "felt bad" after being "too rough" on Jeb Bush in his campaign announcement this week.

"I think he's a nice person. I actually felt bad because I hit him very hard one day like two days ago, three days ago, and I said, why am I hitting him so hard?" Trump told CNN's Jake Tapper in an interview set to air Sunday during "State of the Union."

Trump grilled many of his Republican competitors this week in his announcement speech, dropping the politeness and subtler digs most other politicians stick to and he delivered his sharpest hits on Bush.

"I don't see how he can get the nomination," Trump said in his kickoff. "He's weak on immigration and he supports Common Core. How the hell can you vote for this guy?"

Trump told CNN that the Bush campaign is taking him seriously and that he knows it because "they do call, and they write, and just believe me they take me very seriously."

On reflection, the grandiose billionaire told Tapper he might have gone too far knocking Bush.

"I actually saw myself a couple of days ago and I said that's, that's too rough. Because I really think he's a nice man, I think he's a wonderful man. I don't know if I want him negotiating with ISIS. I think Trump will do a lot better. You think so too, but you're not going to say it."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump opened his campaign for president this past Tuesday with an hourlong speech packed with some spectacular claims, by political standards. He held out a financial statement he said showed his worth at $8.7 billion and said he "will be the greatest jobs president God ever created."

If elected president, he also said he would seek to build a wall along the border and have Mexico pay for it. (The U.S. struggled initially with the construction of the border fence, taking five years to construct from the time President George W. Bush signed the legislation creating it in 2006.)

Some top tier candidates, like Bush friend Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, have been keeping their powder dry when it comes to knocking their Republican rivals, instead focusing their fire squarely on Hillary Clinton. But Trump and a few others, including Ohio Gov. John Kasich, have had no trouble firing away at Bush.

Trump campaign responds to Hillary linking him to South Carolina shooting: 'She must be nervous' // Breitbart // Alex Swoyer – June 19, 2015

The 2016 Democratic presidential frontrunner hinted that the shooting at a church in Charleston, South Carolina is in some way connected to Donald Trump's recent presidential announcement. Clinton told an interviewer:

Public discourse is sometimes hotter and more negative than it should be, which can, in my opinion, trigger someone who is less than stable. I think we have to speak out against it. Like, for example, a recent entry into the Republican presidential campaign said some very inflammatory things about Mexicans. Everybody should stand up and say that's not acceptable.

Clinton was referring to Trump's announcement speech, when he commented about the illegal aliens coming across the southern border from Mexico.

"They're not sending their best. They're not sending you. They're not sending you. They're sending people that have lots of problems, and they're bringing those problems with us. They're bringing drugs. They're bringing crime. They're rapists. And some, I assume, are good people," Trump said in his announcement speech.

A spokesperson said Trump sends his prayers and condolences to South Carolina residents.

Following the violent incident, Trump canceled a sold out campaign event in South Carolina out of respect for the grieving.

"At this time of national sorrow, a responsible leader should be focused on uniting and healing the country," the spokesman said, adding:

Mr. Trump believes that Hillary Clinton does not have any credibility when she blames words for violence. This is the same politician who lied to the world after she failed to take proper steps to secure the U.S. Consulate in Benghazi and falsely blamed the radical Islamic attack on a YouTube video. This is the same person who illegally deleted her emails after getting a subpoena from the U.S. Congress.

Also, it is "totally inappropriate" for Clinton to use this tragedy as a way to attack a political opponent, the spokesman says.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"She must be nervous about something," he added, hinting Clinton must feel threatened by Trump's recent media popularity following his formal White House bid.

Charleston: Hillary Clinton says Trump-like comments can spark race attacks // Telegraph // Rob Crilly – June 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton has accused Donald Trump, the property mogul and Republican presidential candidate, of deploying the sort of race rhetoric that can trigger attacks like the Charleston shootings.

Mrs Clinton, who is the frontrunner in the Democratic race, used a radio interview to take issue with language used by Mr Trump in his campaign launch on Tuesday.

Her comments came two days after Dylann Roof is accused of walking into a historic church in Charleston, South Carolina, and shooting dead nine black people.

Dylann Roof after his arrest

"The people who do this kind of dastardly horrible act are very small percentage, but unfortunately the public discourse is sometimes hotter and more negative than it should be, which can, in my opinion, trigger people who are less than stable to do something like what we've seen," said Mrs Clinton during an interview in Las Vegas with KNPB.

Although Mrs Clinton did not name Mr Trump, her target could not have been more clear.

"For example, a recent entry into the Republican presidential campaign said some very inflammatory things about Mexicans," she said. "Everybody should stand up and say that's not acceptable. You know, you don't talk like that on talk radio."

On Tuesday Mr Trump had been characteristically blunt in describing the problems facing the US and its jobs market.

"When Mexico sends its people, they're not sending their best," he told his audience at Trump Tower in New York. "They're not sending you. They're not sending you.

"They're sending people that have lots of problems and they're bringing those problems with us. They're bringing drugs, they're bringing crime, they're rapists, and some, I assume, are good people."

On Friday he fired back at Mrs Clinton with an Instagram post.

"Wow, it's pretty pathetic that Hillary Clinton just blamed me for the horrendous attack that took place in South Carolina. This is why politicians are just no good. Our country's in trouble," he said.

UNDECLARED

WALKER

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Scott Walker unveils new Web site as he stockpiles money for unlikely presidential bid // WaPo // Matea Gold – June 19, 2015

Scott Walker is making an early push to stockpile money for his likely presidential bid, asking donors to raise $27,000 by mid-July, when he is expected to launch a White House campaign.

An e-mail that went out to supporters Thursday asked them to be the first donors to a new “testing the waters” committee, which he can use to raise and spend money as he considers a run. All contributions made to the committee now would go to his eventual campaign.

Donors were urged to visit a new Web site and participate in “The Race to 270” by raising $27,000 by Sunday, July 12. That is the day before when supporters expect Walker to formally launch his campaign in the Milwaukee area.

“Once you cross the finish line, you will be invited to a special thank you event and be provided RACE TO 270 benefits,” according to an e-mail from fundraiser Jenny Drucker that was obtained by The Washington Post.

Those benefits include an exclusive Race to 270 event and special gear, along with an “Exclusive Race to 270 Conference Call with Governor Scott Walker,” according to the details provided to supporters.

The donation page of the new Web site asks supporters to show Walker that "he has the support to run for President of the United States."

"It is clear what we have accomplished in Wisconsin can be replicated across the country," the Web site states. "Big Government liberalism broke Washington. Limited government conservatism will fix it."

A spokeswoman for Walker's political organization said he will not make a final decision about running until after the Wisconsin budget is complete.

However, the governor appeared to confirm his mid-July timing in an off-air comment to Fox’s John Roberts, who tweeted last week that Walker told him that “his presidential announcement would likely be around the 2nd week of July.”

Once Walker decides to run and collects $5,000 for his "testing the waters committee," he has 15 days to file his statement of candidacy with the Federal Election Commission.

Scott Walker learns a lesson // WaPo // Jennifer Rubin – June 19, 2015

The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel reported this week:

Scott Walker said Wednesday that he will stop talking about private meetings with world leaders after British Prime Minister David Cameron disputed that he had disparaged President Barack Obama’s leadership in private comments to the Wisconsin governor.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I’m just not going to comment on individual meetings I had with leaders like that, be it there or anywhere else,” the White House hopeful told reporters when asked about Cameron’s response.

Walker on Friday told Republican donors at a Utah gathering that Cameron and other leaders were concerned about Obama’s “lead-from-behind mentality.”

Cameron’s office responded that the prime minister never expressed concerns about Obama in his February meeting with the governor.

The report quotes Walker as saying, “What I learned best from that is I should leave discussions like that that aren’t done in front of the media to be treated privately, whether it was there or anywhere else.”

On the one hand, a mini-kerfuffle this early in the race is unlikely to have any lasting effect. On the other hand, coming on the heels of Jeb Bush’s near-flawless overseas trip and Sen. Marco Rubio’s (R-Fla.) adept handling of all sorts of foreign policy questions, it should remind Walker and his supporters that he still has much to learn.

In particular, Rubio — the other “new generation” Republican reformer with appeal to working and middle class voters — poses a real challenge to Walker. Dorothy Rabinowitz writes:

Candidate Rubio has, and it is no small advantage, a gift for language found frequently in people who have been voracious readers from childhood on. Like many children with his history, he also imbibed the sense of American exceptionalism at an early age and it has not gone away nor is it likely to do so.

There is no love of country quite as deep or conscious as that of the first-generation American. Mr. Rubio is the child of immigrants, Cubans in this case, who tutored him, as other immigrant parents have done with their children, in the unparalleled blessings of America. . . .

In the course of his campaign rollout two months earlier than Mrs. Clinton’s, Mr. Rubio too addressed the dangers of leadership and ideas based on the values of yesterday. Only in his view those dangers were the obstruction of economic progress, the stifling of America’s ability to compete—and not least the failure to remember the importance of U.S. leadership in the world.

“And so they appease our enemies, they betray our allies, they weaken our military,” he says of the current administration. A dramatically different set of charges against yesterday’s thinking—and one with which virtually all Republican candidates would agree—than the compendium of victims suffering under the heels of Republicans and millionaires and billionaires that Mrs. Clinton cited on Roosevelt Island.

In other words, it may be that the policy outcome Rubio and Walker reach is quite similar, but Walker will find it hard to match Rubio’s verbal dexterity and comfort level on national security — at least for a while. Walker navigated some bumpy moments early in the year before he began his foreign policy studies and started traveling. For a time he seemed to have found his footing and was effective in interviews. But the bar rises as the campaign goes on, especially in side-by-side comparison with other candidates in debates and the like. As other candidates show their ability to navigate foreign policy issues Walker will have a smaller margin for error. And soon when he travels abroad, the expectation will be that he speaks and/or takes questions from the press.

The lesson for Walker is therefore two-fold: Don’t characterize publicly what foreign leaders say to you privately, and, more importantly, the goal posts will keep moving throughout the race, forcing each candidate to improve. For someone who has not spent his career delving into foreign policy and has no military experience, that means the learning process must continue throughout the primary and into the general election. It’s not enough as it was a couple of months ago to avoid big missteps or to just list Hillary Clinton's errors. Candidates will need to instill confidence and demonstrate mastery of the ins and outs of international affairs. It is a tall order, but then no one ever said it was easy to become a credible commander in chief.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ScottWalker.com goes live // Politico // Nick Gass – June 19, 2015

In the latest step toward his all-but-announced presidential campaign, Scott Walker's "testing the waters" committee on Friday launched a new website, ScottWalker.com.

The website features a prominent link to donate to Walker's personal Facebook, Twitter, YouTube and Instagram profiles, along with options to donate $10, $50, $100, $250, $500, $1,000, $2,700 or some other amount. The website is listed as paid for by "Scott Walker Inc., Testing the Waters."

According to The Washington Post, Walker is asking donors to raise $27,000 ahead of his expected campaign announcement next month. Walker has said that he will not make a decision on when he is specifically going to announce until the completion of the state's budget.

In a post to RedState on Friday, Walker outlined why he is considering a run for the White House.

"I have heard these voices loud and clear. That's why I am launching a testing the waters committee to gauge support for a presidential run. This will be the final step before I decide whether I become a candidate for our nation's highest office, and I urge you to sign up at ScottWalker.com so you can be among the first to know when I have made this important decision," he wrote.

"There are many accomplished people eyeing the GOP nomination for president. Some want you to think they fight. But speeches aren't fighting or winning. Others have won elections but haven't fought any big fights. In Wisconsin, we have a record of doing both," the governor said.

How Scott Walker dismantled Wisconsin's environmental legacy // Salon // Siri Carpenter – June 19, 2015

When Wisconsin's new state treasurer Matt Adamczyk took office in January, his first act was to order a highly symbolic change in stationery. Adamczyk, a Republican and one of three members of the board that oversees a small public lands agency, "felt passionately" that Tia Nelson, the agency's executive secretary, should be struck from the letterhead. As soon became clear, his principal objection to Nelson, daughter of former Wisconsin governor and environmentalist-hero Gaylord Nelson, was that in 2007–08 she had co-chaired a state task force on climate change at the then-governor's request. Adamczyk insisted that climate change is not germane to the agency's task of managing timber assets, and that Nelson's activities thus constituted "time theft." When he couldn't convince the two other members of the agency's board to remove Nelson from the letterhead, he tried to get her fired. When that motion failed, he moved to silence her. In April the board voted 2–1 to ban agency staff from working on or discussing climate change while on the clock. The climate censorship at the public lands agency made national headlines.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker has kept his distance from Adamczyk. It is easy to see why: Walker is widely expected to announce a bid for the Republican presidential nomination. And his environmental legacy—which so far has gone largely unexamined in the national press—has reached much farther than anything the board of a tiny public lands agency could accomplish.

Since taking office in 2011 Walker has moved to reduce the role of science in environmental policymaking and to silence discussion of controversial subjects, including climate change, by state employees. And he has presided over a series of controversial rollbacks in environmental protection, including relaxing laws governing iron mining and building on wetlands, in both cases to help specific companies avoid regulatory roadblocks. Among other policy changes, he has also loosened restrictions on phosphorus pollution in state waterways, tried to restrict wind energy development and proposed ending funding for a major renewable energy research program housed at the University of Wisconsin–Madison.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Most recently Walker has targeted the science and educational corps at the state's Department of Natural Resources (DNR), which has responsibility for protecting and managing forests and wildlife, along with air and water quality. In his 2015–17 budget, released in February, he proposed eliminating a third of the DNR's 58 scientist positions and 60 percent of its 18 environmental educator positions. (The cuts were approved by the state legislature's budget committee in May, and the budget is currently making its way through the legislature.) Walker also attempted to convert the citizen board that sets policy for the DNR to a purely advisory body and proposed a 13-year freeze on the state's popular land conservation fund—both changes that lawmakers rejected in the face of intense public objections.

Walker's office did not respond to repeated requests for comments for this article. But he and his allies in the Republican-controlled legislature have said that such policy shifts will streamline regulations that they say interfere with business development. Many scientists and environmental advocates as well as some conservative political and business leaders say Walker's actions diminish the role of science in policy decisions and undermine key environmental protections that have long distinguished Wisconsin as a conservation leader.

"I just see a guy who's afraid of the mob"

One of the biggest environmental controversies to mark Walker's tenure came in 2013,when he signed a law paving the way for Gogebic Taconite, a mining company later revealed to be a major political donor, to build a 6.5-kilometer-long open-pit mine in the Penokee Hills region in the Lake Superior watershed. Citing a 2011 study funded by Gogebic, Walker argued the mine would bring thousands of jobs to the struggling region. Gogebic helped write the new law, which allows companies to dump mine waste into nearby wetlands, streams and lakes; doubles the area around a mine that a company can pollute; allows the DNR to exempt any company from any part of the law; and strips citizens of the right to sue mining companies for illegal environmental damage.

The new law also included a philosophical shift: Where the old law specified that mining should impact wetlands as little as possible, the new one says that significant adverse impacts on wetlands are presumed to be necessary.

Gogebic dropped the Wisconsin mining project after finding more wetlands than expected in the area, raising questions about the cost of meeting federal mitigation standards. The rewritten Wisconsin law, however, would govern any future projects.

Phosphorus pollution has been another flashpoint. In 2010 Wisconsin was the first state in the U.S. to adopt rules imposing numeric limits on phosphorus pollution, which impairs hundreds of Wisconsin waterways and can harm aquatic life and human health. When Walker took office in 2011, he argued that the rules would be too expensive for manufacturers and communities to follow and proposed to delay implementing them for two years. In 2014 he signed a law allowing polluters to postpone meeting the phosphorus restrictions if they could demonstrate that complying with the rules would pose a financial hardship. Environmental groups say that by diminishing polluters' responsibility for reducing phosphorus discharges, the law is a step backward for water quality.

Walker has also resisted measures to reduce carbon emissions that contribute to climate change. Like many Republican governors and lawmakers, he has avoided making public remarks on climate change. But his actions paint a picture.

In 2008 before he was governor, he signed the Koch-backed "No Climate Tax Pledge,"vowing to oppose any climate legislation that increased government revenue. In 2014 he appointed a utility commissioner who said in a confirmation hearing that "the elimination of essentially every automobile would be offset by one volcano exploding," a remark he later recanted. In February a child asked Walker what he would do about climate change if he were president. Walker's reply: as a Boy Scout he believed in leaving his campsite cleaner than when he found it. Nevertheless, this spring Wisconsin joined 13 other states in a lawsuit challenging U.S. Environmental

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Protection Agency's proposed Clean Power Plan, which would cut carbon emissions from Wisconsin power plants by 34 percent by 2030. (A federal court dismissed the suit on June 9.)

Walker has argued, based on a study funded by the coal company Peabody Energy that the new rules are "unworkable" because they would be too expensive for manufacturers and residents and has implied that Wisconsin might not comply with them.

Although some conservatives in Wisconsin praise Walker's actions, he's attracted the ire of others, including former Republican state senator Dale Schultz, who retired from the senate last winter after 32 years in the legislature. "I think what's going on is appalling," Schultz says. "As somebody who thinks that should be the first thing conservatives ought to be doing is protecting our environment, it's embarrassing. I'm a pretty pro-business Republican. But a clean environment is essential to business. This is just wholly unacceptable."

Schultz attributes Walker and other far-right Republicans' policy positions to the demands of wealthy benefactors, especially those connected to the energy industry. "Some days I look at Governor Walker and I just see a guy who's afraid of the mob," Schultz says. "He helped create it, he fosters it, but then he's also fearful of it."

"The term 'climate change' has become a red flag"

The Walker administration's policy changes have been accompanied by efforts to weaken scientists' role in policymaking. Even before taking office, Walker signaled his environmental agenda by appointing former Republican state senator and construction-company owner Cathy Stepp as DNR secretary, explaining that he wanted "someone with a chamber-of-commerce mentality" at the agency's helm. Stepp, who does not have a background in science or natural resource management, had publicly derided DNR staff as "unelected bureaucrats who have only their cubicle walls to bounce ideas off of" and who thus "tend to come up with some pretty outrageous stuff that those of us in the real world have to contend with."

Recently retired scientists spoke to a sharp shift under Stepp's leadership. Adrian Wydeven, a wolf biologist who ran the DNR's wolf management program from 1990 until 2013 and retired last year, points to the 2013 restructuring of all the DNR's wildlife advisory committees. In that restructuring the agency removed university scientists and greatly reduced the number of DNR professional staff; it also gave special interest groups, such as politically influential pro-hunting groups, more slots. Wydeven says the DNR has also restricted scientists' opportunities to speak directly with lawmakers about proposed regulations and has become deferential toward the legislature. "In the past, if the legislators were proposing anything that wasn't scientifically sound, the DNR was much more forceful in disagreeing with the legislature and making recommendations to improve the legislation," he says. "Now there's much less of that."

Although DNR researchers haven't been explicitly forbidden from mentioning climate change (as Tia Nelson was at the public lands agency until the board yesterday amended its policy to ban staff only from engaging in advocacy on climate policy), they nonetheless describe a "chilling effect" on discussion about politically controversial subjects. In November 2010 the DNR's main climate change Web page was a rich portal containing detailed information about climate trends, forecasted impacts of climate change and DNR programs aimed at addressing the problem. The page also acknowledged that "the most renowned group of scientists working on climate change, the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC), stated that it is very likely [more than 90 percent probability] that human activity is responsible for rising temperatures." Today, the page contains a single paragraph describing, in general terms, a partnership with the University of Wisconsin to study the impacts of climate change and a link to the university's project Web site.

The chilling effect is also evident in internal discussions, DNR scientists say. Sally Kefer, a land use expert who retired from the DNR in 2014, says that she encountered increasing institutional resistance to discussing climate change in the course of helping communities prepare for a warmer and wetter future. "I was being told to quit contacting the communities to determine their level of interest in having a discussion about climate adaptation," Kefer says. "I was told to wait until they called me. And can't I figure out a way to call it something other than 'climate adaptation'? Can't we just call it 'sustainability'?" A current DNR scientist, who requested anonymity, says that the term "climate change" has become a red flag in internal grant proposals. "It's impossible to work on natural resources without incorporating climate change in some way," the researcher says. But "we're less likely to cause problems if we just call it something else. 'Environmental variability's sort of our code word."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Kimberlee Wright, executive director of Midwest Environmental Advocates, an environmental law center, works closely with DNR engineers and scientists to review and comment on pollution permits for activities such as wastewater disposal and groundwater pumping under the Clean Water Act. In the past, Wright says, the process was typically straightforward, and she and colleagues were routinely able to hammer out permits that followed the technical requirements of the law. But since Gov. Walker took office, she says, "We have not been able to settle one permit—we've had to litigate every single challenge. We're often told by [DNR] staff, 'We know you're right, but you're going to have to sue us because the people above me won't let me issue a technically sufficient permit.' That's a really big difference—the interference in science-based decision-making is pretty complete."

The DNR Office of Communications did not permit agency scientists to be interviewed for this article and did not make Sec. Stepp or Bureau of Science Services Director Jack Sullivan available for comment on whether the agency restricts scientists' freedom to communicate about areas of their expertise. The department's spokesperson, William Cosh, said in an e-mail that "When it comes to making decisions the agency remains committed to doing so by using sound science, following the law and using common sense."

But Walker's 2015–17 budget proposal, which called for eliminating a third of all research scientist positions and more than half of environmental educator positions from the DNR, would dramatically decrease the influence of science on natural resources policy and public outreach.

According to the state's bipartisan Legislative Fiscal Bureau, which provides fiscal information to the lawmakers, about half of the scientist positions Walker slated for elimination are federally funded. In March Stepp said the agency was considering subsuming remaining positions into other parts of the agency, dissolving the Bureau of Science Services altogether. Walker has indicated that he wants science to inform policy decisions on "an as-needed basis." The agency spokesperson said the cuts do not eliminate the agency's research capacity. "What these cuts require us to do," he said in an e-mail, "is to better prioritize the research that our scientists are engaged in to help inform management decisions."

DNR scientists reject that assertion. "I don't understand how they can say with a straight face that cutting a third of the research program will not diminish their capacity to do research," says one researcher, who requested anonymity. "We already have a pretty formalized process of prioritizing research; every two years we go through a process where they identify their research needs."

Walker's proposal to shrink the DNR's scientific capacity appears to have been the brainchild of Tom Tiffany, a GOP state senator who is a longtime critic of the DNR's science bureau. In May he confirmed on a regional radio program that he requested Gov. Walker cut the DNR scientist, educator and communications positions. Tiffany said he thinks the agency's scientists have a wildlife management "agenda" that has driven the agency to mismanage the deer herd, curtailing sportsmen's hunting opportunities. He has also said he believes the agency's scientists spend too much time on controversial subjects like climate change, which he views as "theoretical." (According to DNR records, just under 3 percent of DNR scientists' work hours during the last fiscal year involved activities related to climate change.)

The DNR changes are "an assault on the science side of policy making," says Curt Meine, a conservation biologist and biographer of conservation pioneer Aldo Leopold. "Wisconsin's conservation has always been built on a broad public commitment to building and sustaining the health of the landscape and the inherent connection between a healthy economy and healthy land and waters," he says. "We have a long record of bipartisan support for that. There's always been tensions, there always will be tensions, maybe—but science has always been a way of talking across those divisions because everybody wants good information to make decisions. Now that legacy, fostered by the likes of Aldo Leopold and Gaylord Nelson, is eroding away."

Scott Walker's Wisconsin job agency gave out $124 million without review // Chicago Tribune // June 19, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

More than two dozen awards worth more than $124 million were made to companies without a formal staff review by the underwriting department of Gov. Scott Walker's economic development agency, it reported Friday.

Documents detailing the awards were made public late Friday afternoon in advance of a Wisconsin Economic Development Corporation board meeting on July 20 to discuss one troubled unsecured loan that went to a failing company owned by a Walker donor.

The Republican Walker, who is expected to formally launch a presidential campaign in mid-July, has been hounded by troubles with the quasi-private jobs agency he created shortly after taking office in 2011.

An internal review released Friday showed that WEDC gave out 27 award contracts to 24 companies between July 2011 and June 2013 without staff review, which WEDC said was not required at the time. Those were discovered during a review of 371 awards WEDC made in its first two years of operation.

Walker's spokeswoman Jocelyn Webster said the governor would review the documents to prepare for the discussion at the July 20 board meeting.

Rep. Peter Barca, the Assembly's Democratic leader, called the situation "outrageous." He said there are many unanswered questions about how many loans were approved over underwriters' objections.

"I am not at all confident we have even a fraction of the troubling details board members need in order to carry out our fiduciary responsibility," he said. "This is yet another example of how senior WEDC officials have kept the board and Wisconsin taxpayers in the dark about serious problems surrounding the governor's jobs agency."

Some of the companies on the list are owned or affiliated with donors to Walker's political campaigns.

Kenneth C. Stock, the chief executive of KCS International, a luxury boat builder in Oconto, donated $8,500 to Walker. Members of the Sonnentag family, which owns County Materials, have donated at least $36,000 to Walker. Laona-based WD Parket LLC, is a fifth-generation company run by the Connor family, longtime Republican donors.

The three highest un-reviewed awards all came through the enterprise zone program. The largest, $62.5 million, went to Kohl's Department Stores for an expansion of its corporate headquarters on June 28, 2012, for a project that was expected to create 3,000 jobs but that has created just 473 so far.

The next highest was $18 million to Kestrel Aircraft Company for an expected 665 jobs, but just 24 have been created. The third highest was $15 million to Plexus Corp. to create 350 jobs, but none have been created, according to a tally provided by WEDC.

Of the 27 awards, just over 6,100 jobs were expected to be created, but to date only about 2,100 have been. Nearly 8,900 jobs have been retained, according to WEDC. The projects made about $490 million in investment, the report said.

One of the 27 unsecured awards was a $500,000 loan to the now-defunct Milwaukee construction company Building Committee Inc. that was collapsing at the time and created no jobs. That was among several loans questioned by state auditors that led Walker in May to call for scrapping the loan program.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The loan to BCI came after its owner William Minahan had given Walker's 2010 gubernatorial campaign a last-minute $10,000 donation on Election Day — the maximum individual contribution.

A memo from Jake Kuester, the vice president of credit and risk at WEDC, outlined what he called an "extensive review" of all awards the agency made worth more than $200,000 during its first two years in operation.

Kuester said employees of the former Department of Commerce, which WEDC replaced, said it was an "acceptable practice" for the secretary of the agency to approve an award with no formal written staff review "when the need to be flexible and reactive to a business's needs warranted it. That practice was carried forward into WEDC during its early days."

In July 2013, the WEDC board approved a new policy that included requiring a written review on all program awards. Since then, WEDC says it has approved more than 760 awards, all of which were reviewed by staff.

CHRISTIE

Chris Christie rips Rand Paul on the Patriot Act // Politico // Daniel Strauss – June 19, 2015

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie lit into Sen. Rand Paul on Friday over his efforts to force the expiration of the PATRIOT Act.

The governor and likely 2016 Republican presidential candidate devoted a chunk of his speech at the Faith & Freedom Coalition's Road to Majority conference to hitting Paul for successfully causing parts of the PATRIOT Act to expire.

Christie didn't mention Paul by name, but it was clear he was referring to the Kentucky Republican senator's efforts to alter the anti-terrorism law.

"These types of actions, I'm telling you from experience, are shortsighted. And these same people who give these long speeches up on Capitol Hill if, God forbid, there is some kind of other attack in this country, will be the first ones to [drag] the CIA director and the FBI director up to Capitol Hill, put them under oath and excoriate them for not connecting the dots and not preventing the attacks," Christie said.

In late May, Paul was able to cause parts of the PATRIOT Act to expire through procedural tactics that delayed the law's renewal. Christie suggested in his speech Friday that the move was really about Paul raising money and his profile for his presidential bid.

"This is about life and death for our country, and I stand for keeping America safe and making America strong and not giving political speeches on the floor of the Senate to raise money for a political campaign," Christie said.

KASICH

Operation replace Jeb Bush // Politico // Alex Isenstadt – June 19, 2015

Sensing the window of opportunity is closing, John Kasich is on a last-minute dash across the country to convince party donors and power-brokers that there's room for one more candidate in the most crowded Republican presidential field in decades.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Ohio governor, who's expected to formally announce his White House bid next month, is jetting to America's political money capitals — from Dallas to New York City to Palm Beach — with the goal of securing the financial support he'll need to wage a 2016 campaign.

He's huddled with Ann Romney at a lavish Utah ski resort and pushed to win the backing of a powerful longtime friend, media mogul Rupert Murdoch. He's also tried to convince Ohio's deepest-pocketed donors to keep their powder dry and not commit until he gets into the race.

The case for his candidacy is grounded in his record as a popular swing state governor. But part of his sell to donors is that Jeb Bush has run an ineffective campaign, creating an opening for a candidate who happens to fit Kasich's own profile.

At times, Kasich, who waged a disappointing campaign for the GOP nomination in 2000 and lacks the national profile of many of his would-be 2016 rivals, has faced tough questions about whether he's getting in too late.

During one meeting, which took place about two weeks ago, the governor grew angry when a major Republican Party contributor pointed out that others had already formally launched their campaigns and built expansive teams of political advisers. "You don't know what you're talking about," Kasich snapped at the donor, who wished to remain anonymous because the meeting was private. It was still early, Kasich insisted, and Bush, who had endured a rocky rollout, was "losing steam."

Kasich's temper has made it harder to endear himself to the GOP's wealthy benefactors. Last year, he traveled to Southern California to appear on a panel at a conference sponsored by the Republican mega-donors Charles and David Koch. At one point, according to accounts provided by two sources present, Randy Kendrick, a major contributor and the wife of Ken Kendrick, the owner of the Arizona Diamondbacks, rose to say she disagreed with Kasich's decision to expand Medicaid coverage, and questioned why he'd expressed the view it was what God wanted.

The governor's response was fiery. "I don't know about you, lady," he said as he pointed at Kendrick, his voice rising. "But when I get to the pearly gates, I'm going to have an answer for what I've done for the poor."

The exchange left many stunned. About 20 audience members walked out of the room, and two governors also on the panel, Nikki Haley of South Carolina and Bobby Jindal of Louisiana, told Kasich they disagreed with him. The Ohio governor has not been invited back to a Koch seminar — opportunities for presidential aspirants to mingle with the party's rich and powerful — in the months since.

A Kasich spokesman, Chris Schrimpf, declined to comment on the episode.

As he travels the country, Kasich, a two-term governor who spent nearly two decades in the House of Representatives, has made a forceful case for why there's room for him in the race and has said that the fluid nature of the contest guarantees that the dynamics will shift before the primary season intensifies.

In his talks with the party's top donors — a group that includes retail king Les Wexner and publishing magnate John Wolfe — Kasich, 63, has argued that other candidates had failed to coalesce the party behind them. And he has suggested they consider holding off on giving to other contenders, or at least consider contributing to him as well.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In his conversations with some of the party's top statewide leaders, he's pointed out that Bush had been unsuccessful in steamrolling the competition — as, he's fond of pointing out, he was expected to do.

"It's a year-and-a half before the election," said Matt Borges, the Ohio Republican Party chairman and a staunch Kasich ally. "It's not that the landscape might change. It's that the landscape will change."

Those briefed on Kasich's plans say he's begun a concerted push to lock down the support of Murdoch, the Australian-born media tycoon who is an influential voice in conservative circles, and was hopeful he could be brought aboard. The two have long been close: Murdoch was Kasich's boss during his six-year tenure as Fox News host, and during Kasich's 2010 gubernatorial bid he persuaded Murdoch to make a $1 million contribution to the Republican Governors Association. When they are both in New York City, Kasich and Murdoch make plans to see one another.

But Murdoch, those familiar with the effort say, hasn't yet committed to Kasich, and has said he has many friends in the contest. He has pointed to Bush, Scott Walker, and Chris Christie as candidates he particularly admires.

There's little question that Bush is a serious obstacle to Kasich. Both see themselves as serious, cerebral men with unrivaled policy chops. And both are seeking to win over the party's pro-business establishment. Leaving nothing to chance, in recent months, the former Florida governor has launched a mission to secure support in Ohio, robbing Kasich of prospective fundraising dollars in his home state before he gets his campaign off the ground.

Two of Ohio's biggest Republican givers, Wexner and businessman Mercer Reynolds, recently cut checks to Bush, who's brought on Heather Larrison, a top fundraiser for Ohio Sen. Rob Portman, to help introduce him to the state's Republican benefactors. And while House Speaker John Boehner, who remains a force in Ohio politics, has stopped short of endorsing Bush, there's little question about where his allegiances lie. Last year, Boehner praised the former Florida governor by saying that he "has a record of serious, big reforms" and that he would have "a real shot" at winning the White House.

For Kasich, it's an ironic twist. Running for president in 2000, Kasich, then a congressman, found himself gasping for air when George W. Bush dominated in the race for money and endorsements. Kasich would drop out before the primary season got under way, and in the years after, he would tell friends that he was stung by the loss.

Today, another Bush is standing in his way. But as he prepares to enter the 2016 maw, Kasich's advisers insist he's a different candidate — and one with more financial support. He's gathered a formidable group of donors that is expected to include manufacturing company executive Karen Wright and venture capitalist Mark Kvamme.

"What that experience taught him was that he wasn't really ready," said Doug Preisse, the Franklin County Republican Party chairman and a longtime top Kasich political adviser, noting that historically, it's been difficult for a member of the House to seek the presidency. "The difference is that he's 15 years older, and he's the executive of the seventh-largest state in the union."

Kasich isn't simply focused on raising dollars. He's also racing to increase his profile, hoping that it will boost his standing in national polls so he can qualify for the first Republican debate, slated for August in Cleveland. If he doesn't get in, it would prove embarrassing — and potentially damaging to his prospects. In recent weeks, Kasich — who at times during his gubernatorial tenure has been media-shy — has made himself a regular figure on the Sunday show circuit.

Unlike most candidates who attended a Republican donor retreat in Park City, Utah, Kasich went out of his way to make himself accessible to the reporters covering the event. He hung out in a media room, joked around with journalists, and made time for a 15-minute press conference.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The only thing he didn't want to talk about, it seemed, was the thing he got asked about the most: Bush. Just days earlier, while stumping in New Hampshire, Kasich had said, "I thought Jeb would just suck all the air out of the room, and it just hasn't happened."

"You know, I said some things in New Hampshire about the fact that I wouldn't have gotten in if I thought there was a clear winner," Kasich said in Utah, adding: "I'm done talking about Jeb Bush, OK? I like Jeb."

OTHER

GOP Presidential Candidates: The More the Scarier // RealClearPolitics // Jonathan Riehl & David B. Frisk - June 20, 2015

Hillary Clinton apparently doesn't scare the Republican Party, since a candidate roster of unprecedented size is amassing in search of the party's presidential nomination. But the very size of that overcrowded field is diminishing GOP chances of retaking the White House in 2016.

For centrist voters, the chaotic array of candidates will reinforce an impression that except for criticizing the incumbent president, the GOP lacks focus. Meanwhile the Democrats will, perhaps fitfully, draw toward their center of gravity. The challenge Clinton faces in maximizing unity and enthusiasm before her coronation as nominee is not trivial, as Bernie Sanders' unexpected strength in the recent Wisconsin Democratic convention straw poll reveals. But Clinton's intra-party difficulties look trivial compared with those a ridiculously crowded field presents to the GOP.

This is all the truer because base Republican voters are juggling a complicated set of criteria that makes it hard for them to settle on what "best nominee" actually means. With no clear leader, the conservative ship of state is truly adrift – notwithstanding any half-hearted protestations about the embarrassment of riches.

An important factor in lengthening the candidate roster and also making a quick winnowing unlikely is a long decline in political discipline among conservatives, who for many decades have dominated the Republican electorate. One notable result of this indiscipline is trouble judging who is most worth backing in a presidential race – the proliferation of fuzzy thinking about who is most likely to win a general election, remain true to conservative principles, and deliver for conservatives as president. This situation results from at least two causes. One is conservatives' and libertarians' ambivalent attitude toward power and therefore toward practical, as distinct from merely expressive, politics. The other is their long record of frustration with presidential power and federal authority.

Despite their substantial success within the GOP, some of these voters have felt increasingly alienated from a political system that has produced such limited policy victories for them in the half century since conservatives flouted the party's moderate establishment to nominate the unabashedly ideological Barry Goldwater. In addition, the famous "Buckley Rule" from that era, accurately attributed to the founding editor of National Review — that the party should nominate the rightmost viable candidate — has been widely preached but little fulfilled.

What William F. Buckley Jr. meant was that the party should focus on someone who would clearly advance the conservative cause even if he didn't win. Even by that modest standard, it would be hard to choose from among the current crop of contenders on the Republican right. How has Ted Cruz, for example, demonstrated any ability to nudge large swaths of voters in his direction, even in a losing cause? As for winning a national election while advancing conservatism's broader agenda, Ronald Reagan may be the only nominee who ever pulled off that trick. In that sense Reagan succeeded where Goldwater did not. But in the 2016 field, the Republicans don't appear to have a Reagan or a Goldwater. They do have a Bush, but that's part of the problem, not the solution.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To cite one result of the dysfunctional criteria many conservatives now apply to nomination contests: Organizers of the early debates will probably feel compelled to include Carly Fiorina and Ben Carson even if their poll numbers are statistically nonexistent — lest conservatives accuse them of favoring insiders. Symbolic politics are too much at work. Conservatism and its postwar legacy of intellectual seriousness are in real peril.

The crowded debate stages will prevent any one or two candidates from making a strong enough impression to actually begin shaping the Republican field. Worse, the teeming cast will allow far too little time for viewers to learn much about candidates or issues — a problem not just for democratic citizenship, but for the GOP's morale and sense of identity as well. The overcrowding will also tend to dangerously delay the emergence of strong motivation for any particular candidate among volunteers and donors, even if they have early inclinations toward one or another. (Each candidate of any prominence will have some deeply, durably committed backers. But not, we think, a very significant number.) The existence and likely continuance of a plethora of campaigns will also multiply occasions for resentment among the supporters of various candidates, or types of candidates, as the looming battle is joined. And finally, all of this proceduralism will waste even more Republican money in the primary phase than would be the case anyway.

Furthermore, even if conservatives did promptly zero in on the questions that actually matter most to their cause, this candidate field would be hard to judge. A thumbnail sketch of the higher-profile Republican hopefuls' key assets and liabilities suggests the trouble that primary voters will have in deciding who is most electable and politically trustworthy — and therefore ending, reasonably soon, what promises to be a dangerously long primary season for the GOP.

Jeb Bush would insure the GOP against the risks of relative inexperience, can be expected to show strong command of many issues, and wouldn't offend centrist independents. But his name and the dynastic factor are backward-looking minuses — and he isn't likely to win the hearts of social conservatives or immigration restrictionists, two constituencies that exert significant pressure on the nominating process, or the many Republicans who distrust the politics of compromise and incrementalism.

Ben Carson breaks the party's supposedly damaging "white male" image — and does so as an outspoken conservative. His combination of geniality, superior achievement in a profession far more popular than the corporate world, and fearless denunciation of the left could be formidable, but he's never held or run for office, and is given to the kind of impolitic gaffes that invariably bedevil political amateurs.

Ted Cruz has a strong aura of self-promotion, and something rings hollow in his rhetoric, (and his thin Senate record) especially if he is standing next to someone like fellow freshman Sen. Rand Paul. But he can motivate conservatives, and with his public speaking skills might be able to get others to listen.

Carly Fiorina is the Hillary Clinton antidote, at least as far as gender demographics are concerned, but her resume stands in stark contrast to the Democrats' frontrunner. Clinton is a former first lady, U.S. senator, and secretary of state—though not without critics of her role as the nation's top diplomat. Fiorina is a corporate CEO with a mixed record of success and a failed Senate candidate.

Mike Huckabee has, like Jeb Bush, "run" a state. Uniquely among the candidates, he also has experience dealing with the Clinton machine back home in Arkansas. More than most in the field, he understands the economic plight of working and middle-class Americans. And his commitment to social conservatism is genuine and appreciated by the GOP base, but may have limited appeal. Those traits might make him a more formidable primary season candidate than his current poll numbers suggest, but his social conservatism could render him unelectable in November 2016.

Rand Paul capitalizes credibly on the anti-Washington mood —giving the impression of an honest, committed, independent thinker who would rather be right than president. But his tendency toward isolationism — even if he pref ers it to be called non-interventionism — is simply not in sync with most Republicans' foreign policy views.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Marco Rubio, the third of the GOP's troika of freshmen senators, is a fresh face, projects inclusiveness and optimism, and is especially quick and articulate. Like Cruz, he is Hispanic and speaks evocatively of the immigrant experience. But many conservatives also want a candidate who can speak convincingly of the great danger they believe the country is in — and who is comfortable "going negative." He may not be able to.

Scott Walker has an impressive gubernatorial and electoral record, beating back the twin bogeymen of public-employee unions and MSNBC (in the person of Ed Schultz) for good measure. But does he have the charisma the role demands? His network of think tank leaders, opinion leaders, and donors is impressive to insiders, but does he come across as presidential? Will his lack of gravitas give voters pause?

Republican candidates struggle to talk about race, guns // Politico // Eli Stokols and Daniel Strauss – June 19, 2015

Republican presidential candidates are struggling to characterize the motivation behind the tragic mass shooting in Charleston, S.C., with only Ben Carson speaking quickly and forcefully about the role of race in the killing of nine people in a historically black church this week.

"If we don't pay close attention to the hatred and division in our nation, it is just a harbinger of what we can expect," said Carson, who stands apart from the rest of the GOP field as a rare African-American conservative.

The Faith and Freedom Coalition, at which many of the Republican contenders are appearing this week, showed the party's overall discomfort with talking about race and guns.

While the Justice Department quickly opened up a hate crime investigation into the killings, carried out by a 21-year-old white man, and Hillary Clinton argued the tragedy should force America to focus on "hard truths" about race, guns, violence, and divisions, Republicans were initially reluctant to attribute the murders to racism.

Some of the earliest reactions argued that the shooting at the A.M.E. Church in Charleston was really an attack on religious liberty and a matter of good versus evil. But by Friday afternoon much of the field suggested that the shooting was (at the very least) related to race.

"The idea that anyone would walk into a church and pray with the people he intended to murder is depraved," said New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, who spoke Friday morning. "It's unthinkable."

Early on in the conference, several Republican candidates who touched on the Charleston shooting here — only Marco Rubio, who spoke Thursday, completely ignored it — chose to focus on the fact that it happened inside "a House of God."

Though he spoke about race when urging Republicans to become a "party of minority rights," Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, ascribed the killings to "people straying away" from faith.

"There's a sickness in our country," he said. "There's something terribly wrong but it isn't going to be fixed by your government … It's people not understanding where salvation comes from."

That same day, former senator Rick Santorum described the shooting as a "crime of hate" and pegged it as a "assault on religious liberty."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jeb Bush, who emphasized his conservative bona fides at the conference, was cautious when asked whether he thought the shooting was racially motivated.

"Looks like it to me it was, but we'll find out all the information," Bush said Friday at the conference during a hallway interview, according to spokesman Tim Miller . "It's clear it was an act of raw hatred, for sure. Nine people lost their lives, and they were African American. You can judge what it is."

During his remarks just before from the stage, however, the former Florida governor told the crowd that he didn't know "what was on the mind or heart of the man who committed these atrocious crimes.

"I do know —I do know what was in the heart of the victims. They were meeting in brotherhood and sisterhood in that church."

The candidates' hedges and wobbles are at odds with the facts that have emerged about the alleged killer, Dylann Storm Roof. His own Facebook page, his statements to law enforcement officers and media reports quoting those who know him show strong connections to white supremacy beliefs.

Bush's initial avoidance of that reality mirrored that of Ohio Gov. John Kasich, who acknowledged the obvious racial aspect of the shooting only after being asked by reporters after his speech.

"What I noticed is that the entire country is now standing shoulder to shoulder with the minority community, the African American community in South Carolina, and God bless them," he said. Asked whether the shooting was a hate crime, Kasich replied, "There's nine people dead…you read what they say about the guy, it sure appears that way."

Speaking to the crowd of several hundred religious conservatives, Bush, Christie and others called for prayer and little else.

"Laws can't change this," he said. "Only the good will and love of the American people can let folks know that an act like this is unacceptable."

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal opened his remarks by himself leading a long prayer, expressing grief for the victims, their families and the Charleston community; he prayed that God brings comfort to children asking their parents "about the realities of evil."

Bush, while acknowledging that the shooting "has had a big effect on me", encouraged the audience to turn inward for solace in the shooting's aftermath.

"We must continue to bear witness to the truth that God acts through us; and that, even in crisis, even in desperate times, we can always walk upright as brothers and sisters and look to the havens and know that we're children of God," Bush said.

"Let's hope it never happens again."

GOPers road-test their religious messages // Politico // Kyle Cheney, Katie Glueck, and Eli Stokols – June 19, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jeb Bush invoked Terri Schiavo. Rand Paul called for cutting foreign aid to countries that "persecute Christians." And Ted Cruz warned that a Supreme Court decision legalizing gay marriage would amount to "naked and lawless judicial activism."

Washington's annual social conservative cattle call, a three-day event hosted by the Faith & Freedom Coalition, has so far amounted to a message test for a dozen Republicans running for president, each tailoring rhetoric they hope resonates among the religious right.

Some quoted scripture and others hewed closely to their stump speeches. But the ones who found particular favor with their audience — a potent force in GOP primary politics — described a conservative Christian community under siege by government, Democrats and an increasingly godless society.

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal warned of an "assault on religious liberty" in America. Paul called it "a sickness." Bush said freedom of religion was "under attack." But few were more hot-blooded than Cruz, who argued that a recent battle in Indiana over a religious freedom law — ripped by opponents as an attack on gay rights — exposed many of his Republican competitors as weak-kneed.

"More than few Republicans, sadly, even more than a few Republican running for president in 2016, chose that moment to go rearrange their sock drawer," he said. Cruz referenced William Barret Travis, who, according to legend, drew a line in the sand with his saber to determine which of his men were willing to die defending the Alamo. "You choose which side of the line you're on," Cruz said.

The candidates are betting that the moment is right to mobilize evangelicals and other Christians worried about the erosion of religious values in America. The latest blow, they fear, will come later this month, when the Supreme Court is set to decide whether same-sex marriage is legal nationwide. That anxiety was on display throughout the conference, which included a panel discussion dubbed "The War on Christianity" and it was threaded through many speeches by non-candidates too — Rep. Steve King called for "civil disobedience" if the Supreme Court supports gay marriage.

Bush, who has run afoul of the GOP base by supporting immigration reform and Common Core education standards, emphasized his Catholicism and social conservatism.

"We shouldn't push aside those who believe in traditional marriage," he said, touching on a subject he rarely brings up during his forays into Iowa and New Hampshire.

As he did in his announcement speech in Miami Monday, Bush focused on his belief in religious freedom and blasted Hillary Clinton and the Obama administration for suing Hobby Lobby and Little Sisters of the Poor over their religious objections to Obamacare.

"Religious freedom now is under attack more than ever before," Bush said, as he defended religion generally as "the greatest force for good in the world."

"If we act on our faith everyday, we're going to create a more just, more loving world," Bush said.

The former Florida governor reminded the audience of his intervention on behalf of Schiavo's family in the 2005 right-to-die case in an effort to keep her alive.

"When I was asked to intervene on behalf of a woman who could not speak up for herself…I stood on her side,"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush said.

He also emphasized his work during two terms as Florida governor regulating abortion clinics, signing a bill into law requiring parental notification and another banning partial-birth abortions.

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie also mentioned abortion, albeit obliquely, telling the audience it's important to support people before and after they're born.

"I believe if you are pro-life, as I am, you need to be pro-life for the whole life," Christie said, pivoting to his own record and his administration's prioritizing of drug treatment over incarceration for nonviolent offenders and its support for expanding educational opportunity through charter schools. "You can't just afford to be pro-life when the human being is in the womb."

In fact, the issue of abortion rarely came up in the candidates' comments. Cruz, Paul and Sen. Marco Rubio barely discussed it at all. It was left largely to other speakers — Wisconsin Sen. Ron Johnson and Iowa's King — to broach the subject with any force.

The forum, which continues Saturday with speeches from Carly Fiorina and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, also offered a chance for underperforming candidates to find new energy.

Jindal trails badly in early polling, but on Friday, he found a receptive audience, earning one of the most enthusiastic receptions of the morning. Jindal, who is expected to announce for president next week, tapped into the siege mentality that has gripped many religious conservatives, charging that under the Obama administration, the ability to freely practice faith is under attack. He blasted the Obamacare contraception coverage mandate that became an issue for Hobby Lobby, described his path to Catholicism — he converted from Hinduism — and jabbed at Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, who once opposed same-sex marriage, saying, "My views on marriage are not evolving with the polls."

The Louisiana governor was one of the earliest and consistently loudest voices supporting the Indiana religious freedom measure and, like Cruz, tore into businesses that opposed the law.

"I've got a message for big business: You're now in bed with the folks who want to tax you and regulate you," he charged.

To big applause, Jindal argued, "The United States of America did not create religious liberty. Religious liberty created the United States of America."

Even former New York Gov. George Pataki, whose barely perceptible presidential campaign launched last month, found that standing up for religious liberty could energize his audience. He quoted St. Francis of Assisi and hailed a recent Supreme Court ruling preventing limits on pastors who wish to advertise when they hold services.

Others tested mellower messages and mixed in stories about the role of faith in their lives, like Ben Carson, who quoted proverbs and emphasized a belief that God (not evolution) created humanity. He said that God helped him find his wife more than 40 years ago, after years of ignoring romantic relationships to focus on his studies.

"He's available if we just ask him for stuff in terms of our faith," he said.

Ohio Gov. John Kasich — who's taken flak from Republicans for invoking God to justify controversial decisions — spent the bulk of his speech … invoking god to justify controversial decisions.

"I have a mission and I have a role on this Earth, but I'm trying to prepare myself for the world to come," he said, describing his policy decisions to aid the working poor through Medicaid expansion and through de-emphasizing incarceration for convicts with mental health issues. It just so happens, he said, that those decisions made good politics, too, leading to a resounding reelection last year in which he won a quarter of the African American vote and a majority of women.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Why did that happen? Hope returned,” he said, adding, “That’s what has to happen in America.”

Top Republican Candidates Tread Lightly on Gay marriage at Evangelical Summit // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur and Josh Eidelson – June 19, 2015

There was an elephant stalking the room this week at the Faith & Freedom Coalition's annual Washington meeting, and it wasn't of the crowd-pleasing Republican variety. The Supreme Court's imminent ruling on same-sex marriage has Republican presidential candidates caught between a general election electorate that’s rapidly embracing gay rights, and a large faction of the party's evangelical base that's still steadfast in its opposition.

Same-sex marriage, which the Republican Party successfully wielded as a wedge issue just a decade ago, now commands the support of three-fifths of Americans. Many legal scholars expect the Supreme Court to legalize same-sex marriage in all 50 states before the justices conclude their term by the end of the month.

The result: Delicate footwork by the Republicans most likely to win the nomination — and therefore wanting to preserve their opportunity with swing voters — and red meat rhetoric from long-shot competitors anxious to gain ground with the evangelical constituency that can often determine primary and caucus winners. The differences in how they addressed the crowd were stark.

The Red Meat Contingent

Senator Ted Cruz of Texas accused Democrats of pushing "mandatory gay marriage in all 50 states," and warned that a judicial victory for gay marriage advocates could lead to government persecution of Christian churches and schools. He asked the crowd to pray that the justices “not engage in an act of naked and lawless judicial activism, tearing down the marriage laws adopted pursuant to the Constitution."

Cruz also cited this year’s controversies over two states’ religious freedom bills, where Republican governors and state lawmakers backtracked following protests over the prospect that the laws would shield anti-gay discrimination. “Every one of us, our hearts broke a couple months ago in Indiana and Arkansas,” the Texan said, before adding "more than a few Republicans running for president in 2016 chose that moment somehow to go and rearrange their sock drawer." The crowd ate it up.

Former Pennsylvania Senator Rick Santorum, the party's runner-up in 2012 who's running again in 2016, stressed his history of fighting gay marriage and urged the crowd while evaluating candidates to "look at their track record" and willingness to lead, "particularly on the cultural issues."

Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal cast the issue of same-sex marriage as an overarching battle about whether Americans truly have freedom of religion and speech.

"Unlike President [Barack] Obama and Hillary Clinton, my views on marriage are not evolving with the polls. I believe in traditional marriage between a man and a woman," said the potential Republican candidate. "This fight is bigger than marriage... This fight is about religious liberty. This fight is about whether you really do have First Amendment rights.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I'll summarize this in a way that even the liberals and Hollywood can understand: The United States of America did not create religious liberty, religious liberty created the United States of America," he said.

Other candidates seemed aware of the changing poll numbers, delivering remarks that suggested sympathy with the crowd without leaving a trail of tell-tale soundbites that Democrats might use against them

The Front Runners

"While there are people that disagree with this, we should not push aside those that do believe in traditional marriage," said former Florida Governor Jeb Bush. "I for one believe it's important, and I think it's gotta be important over the long haul irrespective of what the courts say."

Senator Marco Rubio of Florida didn't mention same-sex marriage, but made a veiled reference to it when he argued that "the government is not meant to replace moms and dads, it is meant to empower them."

"We see an erosion in our culture and in our values," he added. "You cannot have strong families with a government that strong-arms parents and our faith."

Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky emphasized the importance of virtue and the rights of minority religious views, but didn't directly address same-sex marriage. "We believe that our rights come naturally from God," he told the crowd, "and that a majority shouldn't take them away from us."

The pledge

The National Organization for Marriage on Thursday released a pledge which would commit candidates to back a constitutional amendment restricting marriage to opposite-sex couples, in an attempt to overturn an unfavorable Supreme Court ruling, and to have the Justice Department investigate harassment of same-sex marriage opponents. Iowa Congressman Steve King used his Faith & Freedom speech Thursday to reiterate his call for "civil disobedience" if the Supreme Court sides with same-sex couples, a prospect he compared to its rulings in Roe v. Wade and Dred Scott, the 1857 pro-slavery decision.

If they're defeated at the Supreme Court, some same-sex marriage opponents want presidential candidates to show similar commitment. "I would hope that they would strike that [ruling] down, and just do what our Founding Fathers said to do and what the Bible says to do," said Faith and Freedom attendee Gary Cuprisin, a 69 year-old retired chef. If a ruling in favor of gay marriage stands, he said, "what I've heard on the talk radio is that every law, and everything that says 'man and woman' and 'family' is going to have to be struck from the records."

But even at the conference of the Faith & Freedom Coalition — the group Ralph Reed founded as 'a 21st-century version of the Christian Coalition on steroids' — others were ready to move on if same-sex marriage becomes the law of the land. "I don't think they should amend the constitution," said South Carolina insurance agent Donna Snyder. 'If the Supreme Court says it, then I will go along with it, because they are the rulers of the land ultimately."

Post-Charleston, Republicans Urge Prayers But No Action // Real Clear Politics // Rebecca Berg – June 19, 2015

In the aftermath of the mass shooting Wednesday at an African-American church in Charleston, S.C., Republican candidates for president have offered heartfelt prayers and solemn condolences.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

They have also derided a culture of hate that might have caused suspect Dylann Roof, 21, to shoot and kill nine people.

But few have suggested that the government should act in response. On the contrary, many GOP candidates are insisting that lawmakers cannot solve the problems at the root of this and other such tragedies.

“There's a sickness in our country. There's something terribly wrong,” Sen. Rand Paul said Thursday at a conference in Washington, D.C., hosted by the conservative Faith and Freedom Coalition. “But it isn't going to be fixed by your government.”

That thinking reflects not only his party’s steadfast support for the Second Amendment and its opposition to restrictive gun laws, but also the small-government theme that anchors many of the Republican presidential campaigns and the party at large.

In an interview Friday with RealClearPolitics, Ben Carson said he believes the shooting represents not a regulatory problem but a cultural one, which would require cultural solutions.

“There’s something that we can all do, and that is to begin to teach real values and principles to our young people. That’s the only way you’re going to solve this problem,” Carson said. “This young man obviously was not brought up in the right environment, because he would not have harbored such hatred if he had been. That’s what we need to be working on.

“In terms of government regulations, that’s not going to do anything,” Carson added. “If you have an evil heart, government regulation isn’t going to help you.”

Likewise, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie on Friday characterized the shooting as a “depraved” and “unthinkable” act. But, he said, “laws can’t change this.”

“Only the goodwill and love of the American people can let folks know that act was unacceptable,” Christie said in his speech to the Faith and Freedom gathering.

Democrats have presented a starkly different picture of the root causes of mass violence in American society and of the regulatory path forward, urging government action to prevent such events in the future, including more stringent gun control laws.

“How many people do we need to see cut down before we act?” Hillary Clinton, the presumptive Democratic nominee for president, said Thursday.

That call for action was echoed Thursday by President Obama, delivering his 14th statement in response to an act of gun violence while president.

“At some point, we as a country will have to reckon with the fact that this type of mass violence does not happen in other advanced countries. It doesn't happen in other places with this kind of frequency,” Obama said. “It is in our power to do something about it. ... I say that [while] recognizing the politics in this town foreclose a lot of those avenues right now."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The divide between Democrats and Republicans mirrors the chasm so apparent in the aftermath of the 2012 school shooting in Newtown, Conn., where 20 children and six adults were killed. Although the president took a series of executive actions in response, Congress did not approve any new legislation.

On Friday, one Republican candidate for president, Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, broke with his party, saying he is "open-minded" about improving the system of background checks for gun owners and taking into account mental illnesses.

"I own a bunch of guns, and I haven't hurt anybody. But there is something wrong with the background system," Graham told CNN. "... There's probably a million people who have been adjudicated by a court to be mentally unstable whose records are not in the national background system."

But that remark put Graham in the minority, with most of his peers recommending a considerably more passive approach.

At the Faith and Freedom event Friday, Jeb Bush urged only this: “Let’s hope it never ever ever happens again.”

Wilmore: Santorum, Fox News on Charleston ‘Makes My Fking Head Explode’ // TPM // Brendan James – June 19, 2015

While his colleague Jon Stewart decided not to tell any jokes on Thursday after the killing of nine people in Charleston, S.C., Larry Wilmore had more to say.

"Even on a day like today, Fox News just makes my fucking head explode," the host of "The Nightly Show" said.

He ran a montage of clips showing Fox frame the attack of a historically black church as an "attack on faith," in the words of "Fox & Friends" co-anchor Elizabeth Hasselbeck, and actively downplay the idea it was a racially-motivated attack.

Wilmore was stunned, referencing the evidence and replaying the clips reporting shooter Dylann Roof's racism and statements to the victims like, "you are raping our women and taking over the country.”

"Nice try anyway, Fox," Wilmore said.

Next he turned to presidential candidate and former Sen. Rick Santorum (R-PA), who echoed the Fox line, saying the attack was an assault on "religious liberty."

Wilmore pointed out that when four black girls were killed in a church bombing in Birmingham, Alabama in 1963, there wasn't a question about motive.

"Back then, no one pretended to wonder what the motivation was," he said. "If you tried to say it was about religion, even the perpetrators would have corrected you."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Watch the clip, courtesy of Comedy Central.

RNC raised $9.3M in May // The Hill // Ben Kamisar – June 19, 2015

The Republican National Committee raised $9.3 million in May, a figure first shared with The Hill, growing its campaign fund to almost $15 million for the competitive 2016 election cycle.

The figures, to be released on Friday, show 98 percent of those donations were $200 and under, with an average donation of $92.

RNC Chairman Reince Priebus told The Hill in a statement that the committee is "incredibly grateful for the strong support."

"There is clearly enthusiasm on the Republican side to take the fight directly to Hillary Clinton and the Democrats and to put a Republican back in the White House," he said. "Our supporters understand the importance of investing early in ground game infrastructure, staff and volunteer training, voter engagement, and data and digital operations.

"We're laying the groundwork for our nominee earlier than ever before. While Hillary Clinton has already lost the trust of the majority of Americans, Republicans are working every day in communities across the country to earn the trust of new voters and first-time voters, sharing our values and listening to their concerns," Priebus added.

The May haul is slightly less than the $10.1 million the committee raised in April. The RNC has now raised more than $45 million in the 2016 cycle and holds $1.8 million in debt, according to the new figures.

The Democratic National Committee has not yet released its May figures, with one more day to file before the Federal Election Commission's deadline. In April, the party raised $4.9 million, bringing its cash on hand to more than $8.2 million with a total of $21 million raised in the 2016 election cycle.

With its fundraising figures set to go public within days, the DNC also held about $5.4 million in debt as of April.

OTHER 2016 NEWS

TOP NEWS

DOMESTIC

Today in Politics: Charleston Shooting Leads to a Campaign Pause // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 19, 2015

The killing of nine people at a predominantly African-American church in South Carolina, where the gunman was said to have sat and prayed with his victims before unleashing violence, will leave a lasting impression on the state and has already affected the dynamics of the 2016 presidential race.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The magnitude and maliciousness of the crime will linger in national discussions. It is unclear whether Democrats, who tried in vain to pass a federal gun-control bill in early 2013 along with some center-right Republicans in Congress, will broach that politically difficult issue in their campaigns.

Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, a Republican presidential hopeful, denounced the violence. Jeb Bush canceled his planned appearances in the state.

Hillary Rodham Clinton, a Democratic candidate for president, had left Charleston, where the shootings took place, just before the violence occurred. In an appearance in Nevada on Thursday, Mrs. Clinton called for facing "hard truths" about race, policing and gun violence. She did not make an explicit call for gun-control measures, which bedeviled President Obama after the school massacre in Newtown, Conn., in December 2012. But the question of race in America is going to be critical as the nation looks toward the post-Obama era.

Other Democrats also weighed in. Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, who has voted against gun-control bills in the past, emailed his list of supporters seeking donations to the church where the shootings took place, and canceled what had been a large rally planned in the state this weekend. Martin O'Malley, the former Maryland governor, posted a note of prayer for the victims on Twitter.

NRA board members blames pastor for Charleston deaths // Politico // Nick Gass – June 19, 2015

A board member for the National Rifle Association blamed the gun-control position of South Carolina state Sen. Clementa Pinckney, a pastor who was killed in Wednesday night's shooting at a historic black church in Charleston, for the deaths of his congregation.

If had voted to allow gun owners to carry their own weapons, Charles Cotton wrote, "eight of his church members ... might be alive."

A spokesman for the NRA told POLITICO, "Individual board members do not speak for the NRA and and do not have the authority to speak for the NRA."

Cotton, who according to his bio page has been a board member for 13 years, also moderates TexasCHLforum.com, described as "the focal point for Texas firearms information and discussions."

In one thread discussing the shooting at Emanuel AME Church on Thursday morning, a user with the name ShootDonTalk wrote: "Something else to consider: The pastor of this church, who was killed, is a State Legislator in S.C."

"And he voted against concealed-carry. Eight of his church members who might be alive if he had expressly allowed members to carry handguns in church are dead," Cotton responded to the post on Thursday afternoon. "Innocent people died because of his position on a political issue."

The bill that Pinckney voted against in 2011 would have permitted gun owners to bring guns into public places like churches and daycare centers. It ultimately failed.

Gov. Nikki Haley addresses a full church during a prayer vigil held at Morris Brown AME Church for the victims of Wednesday's shooting at Emanuel AME Church on Thursday, June 18, 2015 in Charleston, S.C. Dylann Storm Roof, 21, was arrested Thursday in the slayings of several people, including the pastor, at a prayer meeting inside the historic black church.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

According to an NRA site, Cotton has also been elected to the Board of Trustees of the NRA Civil Rights Defense Fund. Following the 2012 shooting at Sandy Hook Elementary School in Newtown, Connecticut, Cotton wrote that President Barack Obama, Michael Bloomberg, George Soros and others were trying to use the event to launch their “anti-gun response.”

“The shameful truth is that the Obama-Bloomberg Coalition used the Sandy Hook shootings as a Hollywood-like soundstage to launch their long planned attack on the Second Amendment,” he wrote at the time.

McConnell promises Senate vote on late-term abortion bill // AP // Alan Fram – June 19, 2015

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell promised Friday that his chamber will vote on legislation banning most late-term abortions, setting the stage for a showdown over a top conservative priority that his party will likely lose.

"It's about time we begin the process of putting America into the ranks of most other civilized countries by protecting unborn children after 20 weeks in the womb," the Kentucky Republican told a conference of the conservative Faith and Freedom Coalition.

McConnell was interrupted by applause as he reminded the crowd that the measure "couldn't even get a hearing" when Democrats controlled the Senate.

"I promise you will be getting a vote," he said, though he did not specify when.

Underscoring how the issue galvanizes both sides, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee almost immediately solicited contributions from supporters, writing in an email, "When anti-women attacks are what passes for leadership, it's time for a change."

Though the GOP-run House approved similar legislation last month, it faces an uphill climb in the Senate. Republicans control that chamber with 54 seats but will need 60 votes to defeat a Democratic filibuster.

Most Democrats are sure to oppose the bill by presidential hopeful Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., and some moderate Republicans could too. Among the handful of GOP senators not listed as co-sponsors Friday were Sens. Kelly Ayotte of New Hampshire and Mark Kirk of Illinois, who face potentially competitive re-election races next year.

Should it reach his desk, a veto by President Barack Obama would be all but certain.

"I hope Republicans will reverse course and focus on real challenges rather than using women's health to score political points, but if they don't, they should know that this dangerous legislation is nothing but a dead end," said Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash., top Democrat on the Senate Health committee.

The bill makes exceptions to save the mother's life or if she was a rape victim who receives counseling or medical treatment at least 48 hours before the procedure. Also exempted would be minors who were victims of rape or incest and reported the incident to law enforcement or social service officials.

owa court allows remote dispensing of abortion pill // AP // June 19, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Iowa Supreme Court has struck down a restriction that would have prevented doctors from administering abortion-inducing pills remotely via video teleconferencing, saying it would have placed an undue burden on a woman's right to get an abortion.

Iowa is one of only two states that offers so-called telemedicine abortions — Minnesota offers them on a smaller scale — and doctors at Iowa's urban clinics that perform abortions had been allowed to continue offering the remotely-administered abortions while the ruling was pending.

Planned Parenthood's local affiliate, Planned Parenthood of the Heartland, had sued the Iowa Board of Medicine over its 2013 decision that would have required a doctor to be in the room with a patient when dispensing abortion-inducing medication.

The board cited safety concerns when it passed the rule requiring a physical examination, but Planned Parenthood and other critics said it was just another attempt by abortion rights opponents to make it harder for women to get abortions. They said the Iowa board's restriction particularly would have made it harder for women in more rural areas who don't live near the few urban clinics where doctors who perform abortions are based.

The court agreed with Planned Parenthood's argument that the rule would have placed an unconstitutional burden on women by requiring a doctor's physical presence in the room.

"Because the Board agrees the Iowa Constitution protects a woman's right to terminate her pregnancy to the same extent as the United States Constitution, we find the rule violates the Iowa Constitution," the justices wrote.

Telemedicine is becoming a more popular method of treating patients nationwide, but its use to dispense abortion-inducing medication is fairly new. Iowa was the first state in the country to offer it in 2008, and it has provided services to more than 7,000 women to date.

More than a dozen states in recent years have preemptively banned the abortion method without ever having allowed it, according to the Guttmacher Institute, a national nonprofit that follows reproductive health issues.

The Left and Right Try to Lobby Pope Francis Months Ahead of U.S. Visit // Bloomberg // Melinda Henneberger – June 19, 2015

In Rome last week, a Vatican official who had already seen Pope Francis's encyclical on the environment had this advice for a visiting American who was concerned that the pontiff was about to blame man for changing the Earth's climate: You might not want to read it, then.

That's one way Catholics have been able to avoid the disagreeable experience of ever disagreeing with their pope: Just play dumb and keep walkin'. Another strategy, though—and one that's become far more blatant under Francis—is to try and influence him by passing messages through those around him. Lobbying, in other words.

In the months leading up to the release of the encyclical, conservative American Catholics and even the oil and gas industry sent emissaries to the Vatican hoping to dissuade the Holy Father from weighing in on climate change, arguing that the science isn't settled and that cutting back on fossil fuel use would hurt rather than help the world's poor. Exxon Mobil sent several delegations to meet with Vatican officials, and a conservative Chicago-based think tank, the Heartland Institute, held a whole counter-conference on alternative climate science in Rome at the end of April. But the Pope was apparently unmoved, and the encyclical states "there is a very consistent scientific consensus that indicates that we are witnessing a worrying warming of the climatic system…Humanity is called to take conscience of the need to change life styles, ways of production and consumption to fight this warming, or at least the human causes that produce it or accentuate it."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Conservatives aren't the only ones who have been lobbying. Ahead of Francis's September trip to the U.S., both left- and right-leaning believers, as well as secular groups, are offering him their unsolicited counsel. Earlier this month, a delegation of about 20 American community organizers and union leaders stressed to the Vatican officials they met with how important they feel it is that Pope Francis use his U.S. pulpit to preach on criminal justice and immigration reform and institutional racism. They also want him to talk as specifically and forcefully as possible about pay so low it doesn't add up to a "living wage"—a phrase coined by the American priest John A. Ryan in his doctoral thesis at Catholic University way back in 1906.

The trip, organized by the Service Employees International Union and PICO, a national network of faith-based community organizations, felt like a big success, said Allen Stevens, a deacon at St. Peter Claver Catholic Church in New Orleans and long-time PICO organizer.

"We were able to meet with a number of cardinals who advise Pope Francis," he said, and talk to them about the push to raise the minimum wage, the Black Lives Matter campaign, and the Live Free response to mass incarceration. "We wanted to make sure he clearly understands the landscape, and there's no doubt the message came through." Some cardinals prayed with them, and Stevens said that some of the cardinals even said they hoped the pope would adopt specific language proposed by the group.

Wish List

Conservative American Catholics have a very different wish list, of course, and want the Pope's men to pass on their impression that he doesn't seem to like the U.S. that much—he's never been here, after all, although his friends insist that this is simply because he hates traveling. Conservatives also see anti-Americanism in his writing about the excesses of capitalism—though his predecessors also touched on that subject. They want to hear more from him on abortion, religious liberty and the traditional family, aren't sure he should even be going to Cuba in the fall, and wonder why, with Christians being rounded up and killed in Libya, he would choose to focus on the environment, of all things.

Not all efforts to shape the message are going on inside the Vatican. Maureen Ferguson, of the conservative lay group Catholic Alliance, said, "We're not part of any direct lobbying, but we're in conversations with people putting together the visit, and we're very focused on the Philadelphia stop," where Francis will speak on the family. The central purpose of his whole visit, said Ferguson, a former official with National Right to Life, "is to talk about the beauty of church teaching on the family." Yet there is also some risk involved, she said: "Because of his off-the-cuff manner of speaking, which is marvelous and refreshing, when he says 'Who am I to judge?' that also lends itself to misunderstanding and confusion among faithful Catholics…We see our role as helping to communicate the full message."

That the pope's first trip to the U.S. comes against the backdrop of a presidential election–and one in which several of the candidates are Catholic, including Jeb Bush, Rick Santorum and Chris Christie–heightens one of the pontiff's own concerns about the visit, according to several people who know him well: He doesn't want to be used by any aspirant or either party, and is determined not to be.

There has been more intense and more obvious lobbying under Francis, several church officials said, especially from Americans. (Though the Vatican practically invented politics, Italians don't even have one word for 'lobbying,' and tend to use the English one instead of the Italianized 'lobbismo,' or work-arounds like 'tentare di influenzare'–to try to influence–or plain old 'pressione,' or pressure.)

Though it's Francis's open, easy manner that seems to have invited the perception that he can be moved, those who know him say that once he makes a decision, he isn't likely to change his mind. And in fact, he's less accessible through old-fashioned "I know somebody who knows somebody" channels than Benedict or John Paul: You're unlikely to meet this pope, a friend in Rome quipped recently, unless you're in a wheelchair or a wedding dress, at one of the Wednesday morning audiences where he embraces the sick and blesses the newly married. ("The high point" of his group's recent lobbying trip to Rome, said Deacon Stevens, "was that even though we didn't get to meet him, we did get to see him," at the audience, "and our founding director was able to shake his hand and look him in the eye and share that PICO spirit.")

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Gospel's Interests

Austen Ivereigh, author of The Great Reformer: Francis and the Making of a Radical Pope, predicts that attempts to shape what Francis says in the U.S. won't go any better than trying to get him to rethink what he wanted to say in the encyclical did: "Francis is allergic to lobbies and pressure groups," Ivereigh said, "and sees it as his duty as pope not to let the church or the papal office be used for interests other than those of the Gospel."

He even avoided going to his native Argentina this year because he doesn't want to be used in the presidential election there, Ivereigh said, and "he'll be studiously careful to avoid being used in the U.S. campaign. On the other hand, he'll want to build relationships with all the key players—but most of the bonding will be off-camera."

If anything, attempts to harness him to either party's agenda could backfire, he and others feel. And while Francis's message will certainly contain elements that will please and offend both Republicans and Democrats, one is likely to have a harder time than the other, though not because the pope is a closet Democrat: "One of Francis's objectives in his U.S. trip," Ivereigh said, "is to challenge what he regards as an unhealthy nexus that has grown up between U.S. conservatives and the Catholic Church" during fights over abortion and religious liberty. "The deal has too long been that evangelicals and Catholics present a united front on life and family issues and religious freedom while staying silent on economic injustice, immigration, the death penalty and ecology. Francis believes that a key part of the Gospel message has been suffocated by the church's proximity to conservatives, and he is determined to restore it." The new environmental encyclical, Laudato Si': On Care For Our Common Home, "is a major instrument of that rebalancing."

Previous popes spoke about the environment, too–to the point that Benedict was even called the "green pope"–but American conservatives remained unfazed because the overall emphasis on social issues was still to their liking. With Francis, that's no longer the case.

He is trying to integrate the two halves of Catholic teaching in the U.S., and here's a taste of what that looks like: "I think the environment has become a pro-life issue–respecting the life that we find of God in others and his handiwork in the environment," New Orleans Archbishop Gregory Aymond recently told GroundTruth's Jason Berry.

Meanwhile, lobbying the Vatican may not only have the effect of hardening the lobbied, but also of softening the supplicant: One American conservative who went to Rome recently filled with concern about whether Francis is anti-American, and eager to communicate that he ought to let Americans know how much he appreciates the generosity that only the prosperous can provide, came home with a changed focus. Now, she said, she's no longer as worried about what the pope is going to say to America as about what America is going to show the pope during his visit.

Danger for Democrats

The danger of trying to co-opt his message is clearly greater for Democrats, who may feel that he's on their side—but being seen as trying to translate his loftier purpose into votes could easily come off as shabby: "I'm going to slap the first person who says the pope is a Democrat," says Michael Sean Winters, a National Catholic Reporter columnist and fellow at Catholic University's Institute for Policy Research & Catholic Studies. In part, that is, because "it's so strategically stupid."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Taking on such a popular and persuasive figure as Francis carries as much risk as hugging him too tightly. But thus far, both Jeb Bush and Rick Santorum have said he should stick to matters of faith and avoid science. One jarring thing about their criticism is that conservatives have long chafed at references to Galileo, both because the case against the Renaissance astronomer was more complicated than the oft-told cartoon version, and also because the church has been pro-science–it was a Belgian priest, Georges Lemaître , after all, who came up with the Big Bang theory. Yet now it's Santorum and others on the right who are invoking Galileo as a cautionary tale about why the church should stay out of scientific debates.

But it isn't so much that the shoe is on the other foot now, with conservatives rather than liberals on the outs where the Vatican is concerned, as that the pope wants to put Catholic shoes on both feet: His social and economic messages don't fit together in American politics; but in church teaching, they do. Beyond the environmental message in his encyclical, he drives that home again and again, connecting abuse of the environment with human trafficking, the ecology of the human person with the ecology of the planet, and GMOs with research on human embryos. He's arguing that we're so interconnected that every form of violence, from disease-causing pollution to animal abuse to abortion, sends out ripples that affect the entire world.

When he addresses Congress in September, fellow Catholics John Boehner and Nancy Pelosi will be seated behind him, as speaker and minority leader of the House and his joint hosts. Presumably both will be applauding their pope, too. "I think John Boehner is the most excited person in Washington about this visit," said his friend Maureen Ferguson, of Catholic Alliance. Pelosi, who often attends daily Mass, issued a statement on Thursday lavishly praising Francis's encyclical and concluding, "We really must listen to His Holiness as we go forward." But the fact that Pelosi and Boehner are likely to be standing and cheering at very different moments during the pope's address is the perfect illustration of the very split he's coming here to address.

Cashing In // US News and World Report // Kenneth T. Walsh – June 19, 2015

How times have changed for America's former presidents.

Harry Truman, who served as commander in chief 70 years ago, wrote, "I have a very strong feeling about any man who has the honor of being an occupant of the White House in the greatest job in the history of the world, who would exploit that situation in any way, shape or form."

But ex-presidents today routinely make millions of dollars by parlaying their White House experiences into speeches, personal appearances and books. All this, taken together, diminishes their stature and lessens their influence.

Bill Clinton has been widely criticized for milking his presidency for tens of millions of dollars, and former first lady Hillary Clinton, who is running for president in 2016, has been attacked for using her time in the White House to boost her income, partly through book sales and speeches.

It turns out that former President George W. Bush has been doing much the same thing. Politico reports that since he left office in 2009, "Bush has given at least 200 paid speeches and probably many more, typically pocketing $100,000 to $175,000 per appearance. The part-time work, which rarely requires more than an hour on stage, has earned him tens of millions of dollars. Relative to the Clintons, though, he has attracted considerably less attention, almost always doing his paid public speaking in private, in convention centers and hotel ballrooms, resorts and casinos, from Canada to Asia, from New York to Miami, from all over Texas to Las Vegas a bunch, playing his part in what has become a lucrative staple of the modern post-presidency."

Clearly, the nature of the post-presidency has morphed in a fundamental way since Truman's time. As the longevity of ex-presidents increases, more of them will be on the public stage longer than their predecessors, and they will be tempted to seek media and public attention as they defend and promote their legacies, size up contemporary issues and make money. There are currently four ex-presidents who are still living – George W. Bush, Bill Clinton, George H.W. Bush and Jimmy Carter. Barack Obama will join this elite club in a year-and-a-half, when his second term expires.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A recent academic study offers some surprising assessments about who have been the best ex-presidents – John Quincy Adams, Jimmy Carter, William Howard Taft and Herbert Hoover, even though none of them was in the top tier of presidents when they were in office, according to historians.

Justin S. Vaughn, a political scientist at Boise State University who helped lead the study, said the standards he and his researchers used were two-fold: Having the longevity and good health to provide "meaningful service" for an extended period of time, and accomplishing "something significant beyond campaigning for their fellow partisans, burnishing their legacy and cutting the ribbon at the groundbreaking for their library." Vaughn concluded in a recent New York Times essay, "The greatest ex-presidents have engaged in important work, sometimes at a level that rivaled their accomplishments in the White House."

Vaughn added: "Our worst ex-presidents, on the other hand, have been noteworthy for taking strong positions against the national interest and consistently undermining their successors for personal and political reasons." The worst ex-presidents, he said, were John Tyler, Millard Fillmore, Franklin Pierce and Theodore Roosevelt. Of these, only Roosevelt was in the top tier of incumbent presidents.

Vaughn noted that, "Mr. Obama's slow pivot to his retirement coincides with renewed controversy over how Bill Clinton has conducted his, especially around donors to the Clinton Global Initiative and possible conflicts of interest during Hillary Rodham Clinton's tenure as secretary of state. Some assessments of Mr. Clinton's post-presidential career have become extremely critical. ... President Obama would do well to chart an active course that makes a difference but avoids partisan entanglements and financial controversy."

It is likely that Obama has more than a passing interest in this analysis as the outlines of his post-presidency become clear. He has approved building his presidential library in Chicago, his political base for many years. He is widely expected to write a book about his tenure, which will probably be a bestseller. (Book writing is probably the least offensive way in which a president can remain in the public eye and make money because presidential books tend to be at least in some way educational and add to the public's understanding of history.) It's unclear how much speaking he will do for profit.

His friends say Obama plans to devote himself, at least in part, to altruistic pursuits such as working with young people and inspiring African-Americans to strive and emulate him and his wife Michelle as examples of the American dream in achieving success. Obama has already signaled his intention through his devotion to a White House initiative called "My Brother's Keeper." It's designed to inspire African-American men to overcome whatever obstacles exist to live successful and productive lives and take good care of their families.

The challenge for the ex-presidents, as Truman suggested, is to avoid profiting crassly from their years of public service, and at the same time making a positive difference in people's lives. No one has come up with a perfect formula, but soon it will be Obama's turn to try.

Iowa Supreme Court: Ban on telemed abortion unconstitutional // Des Moines Register // Tony Leys – June 19, 2015

Iowa's Supreme Court ruled Friday that Planned Parenthood of the Heartland may keep using its controversial telemedicine-abortion system.

More than 7,200 Iowa women have used the system to obtain abortion-inducing pills since 2008. The system, the first of its kind in the nation, allows Planned Parenthood doctors in Des Moines or Iowa City to interact via video with patients in outlying clinics, then dispense the pills to the women.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

State regulators, appointed by Iowa's anti-abortion governor, ruled in 2013 that the system should effectively be banned because of purported safety concerns. The ban was put on hold while Planned Parenthood appealed in court. A district judge sided with the regulators in 2014, but the Supreme Court disagreed Friday.

The justices decided 6-0 that the Iowa Board of Medicine's rule violated women's constitutional rights. The court noted that telemedicine is being used to provide many other types of health care. But the medical board only focused on telemedicine's use for abortion when it imposed a requirement that doctors personally perform physical exams on patients, the justices wrote. "It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the board's medical concerns about telemedicine are selectively limited to abortion."

The Supreme Court determined the medical board's rule imposed an unconstitutional "undue burden" on women's right to abortion. It noted that national standards do not require a physician to perform a physical examination on a woman before providing a medication abortion. The court also noted that other staff members in the outlying Planned Parenthood clinics draw blood, take medical histories and perform sonograms on the patients, which are transmitted to the physicians. The justices wrote that they didn't see proof that an in-person exam by a doctor would "provide any measurable gain in patient safety."

Supporters say the telemedicine system provides a safe way to offer abortion services in rural areas where they otherwise are unavailable. The Iowa case is being watched nationally, because abortion providers in other states have considered setting up similar systems. This is believed to be the first time in more than 40 years that the state Supreme Court considered an abortion case.

Suzanna de Baca, Planned Parenthood of the Heartland's president, hailed the ruling. "This is a major victory for the women of Iowa and for reproductive rights in general," she said. De Baca added it was significant that the justices were unanimous. "It really validates our belief that this was politically motivated," she said, referring to the medical board's attempt to ban the telemedicine system.

De Baca was asked if the ruling also could be seen as a rebuke to Gov. Terry Branstad, who appointed the medical board members. She paused, then replied: "I think we are thrilled that we have an independent judiciary, who make decisions based on evidence and not on politics."

Branstad spokesman Jimmy Centers released a statement expressing the governor's frustration with the justices' ruling. He noted that the medical board's ruling came after it received a petition from health care professionals who were concerned about the system's safety. "The governor is extremely disappointed that the Iowa Board of Medicine's action, which ensured women received the high standard of care that they deserve, was reversed by the Iowa Supreme Court." Centers said it was too soon to speculate on whether any more appeals are possible.

Jenifer Bowen, executive director of Iowa Right to Life, said she'd heard conflicting theories on whether the Iowa justices' ruling could be appealed to federal court. Bowen said the ruling was a setback. "We're devastated," she said, "but obviously we're not going to wave the white flag of surrender."

Bowen said she was disappointed by the "lackluster" presentation of the medical-board's legal case before the Supreme Court in March. That presentation was made by a lawyer from the office of Attorney General Tom Miller, a Democrat. But she said she had hoped the justices would be swayed by the medical board's written explanation of why it believed Planned Parenthood's telemedicine arrangement was unsafe.

Bowen said her group would continue to spread its message that the telemedicine abortion system exposes vulnerable women to a potentially dangerous drug without sufficient medical backup in case of complications.

The medical board, responding to petitions filed by abortion opponents, ruled in 2013 that the system's use was inappropriate and unsafe. The board, which licenses physicians, ruled that doctors must perform in-person physical exams before dispensing abortion pills. That would effectively have banned use of Planned Parenthood's telemedicine system.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Planned Parenthood noted that under a previous governor, the medical board looked at the telemedicine abortion system and found no problems. The 2013 ruling against the system came after Branstad, who opposes abortion, replaced all 10 members of the board. His replacement members included a Catholic priest and a former legislator known for introducing abortion-limiting bills.

The medical board's ruling was on hold while Planned Parenthood fought the matter in court. A Polk County district judge sided with the medical board last August. Planned Parenthood then appealed to the Iowa Supreme Court, which heard arguments this March.

A lawyer for the attorney general's office, who represented the board before the Supreme Court, contended that the board followed proper procedures, including having a public hearing and taking written comments, before making the decision. Critics noted that the board rules wording was taken nearly verbatim from a petition filed by abortion opponents.

In its ruling, the Supreme Court sidestepped Planned Parenthood's request that it declare a more extensive right to abortion under the Iowa Constitution. The justices said they didn't need to answer that question, because the medical board's rule violated the "undue burden" test established by the U.S. Supreme Court.

The opinion was written by Justice David Wiggins, a political independent. Justice Bruce Zager, a Republican, did not participate in the case. Iowa Supreme Court justices don't generally explain reasons for such abstentions.

INTERNATIONAL

Iran Still Aids Terrorism and Bolsters Syria's President, State Department Finds // Michael Gordon and Eric Schmitt – June 19, 2015

WASHINGTON — Iran continued its "terrorist-related" activity last year and also continued to provide broad military support to President Bashar al-Assad of Syria, the State Department said Friday in its annual report on terrorism.

The assessment suggests that neither the election of President Hassan Rouhani nor the prospect of a nuclear accord with the United States and its negotiating partners has had a moderating effect on Iran's foreign policy in the Middle East.

"In 2014, Iran continued to provide arms, financing, training and the facilitation of primarily Iraq Shia and Afghan fighters to support the Assad regime's brutal crackdown," the report said.

"Iran remained unwilling to bring to justice senior Al Qaeda members it continued to detain and refused to publicly identify those senior members in its custody," it added.

The report does not contend that Iranian officials are conspiring to kill Americans. Nor does it accuse Iraqi militias backed by Iran of plotting to attack American advisers in Iraq. The report also does not provide specific figures on Iranian operations that might indicate whether they are increasing or decreasing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But it paints a picture of an aggressive Iranian foreign policy that has often been contrary to the interests of the United States. Even when the United States and Iran have a common foe, as they do in the Islamic State, the Iranian role in Iraq risks inflaming sectarian tensions. Some of the Shiite militias Iran has backed in Iraq, including Kataib Hezbollah, have committed human rights abuses against Sunni civilians, the report said.

Although the report covers 2014, American officials said the Iranian policies described in it had continued this year.

“We continue to be very, very concerned about I.R.G.C. activity as well as proxies that act on behalf of Iran,” said Tina S. Kaidanow, the State Department’s senior counterterrorism official, referring to Iran’s Islamic Revolutionary Guards Corps. “We watch that extremely carefully.”

Iran’s supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, has suggested that Iran sees its regional and nuclear policies as proceeding on separate tracks, an approach that may be intended to placate hard-liners at home but may also reflect his foreign policy strategy.

The White House has held out hope that a deal to limit Iran’s nuclear program might be the first step toward an eventual easing of tensions and perhaps even cooperation on regional matters. But even if the two sides remain at odds over the Middle East, Obama administration officials insist a nuclear accord is worth pursuing in its own right. The report comes a week before Secretary of State John Kerry is expected to travel to Vienna to try to seal a nuclear accord.

In a broad survey of terrorist trends, including a country-by-country assessment, the report notes that the threat from Qaeda leaders who have sought sanctuary in Pakistan has diminished even as the group continues to be a source of inspiration for militants elsewhere. But the threat from the Islamic State, the militant group that has established what it calls a caliphate in much of Iraq and Syria, has grown.

The report said that as of December, the Islamic State, also known as ISIS or ISIL, could muster 20,000 to 31,500 fighters. The group derives most of its funding not from external donations, as Al Qaeda does, but from smuggling oil, kidnapping for ransom, robbing banks and selling stolen antiquities.

The pace at which foreign fighters have traveled to Syria — more than 16,000 as of late December and thousands more since — is greater than that at which foreign militants have gone to Afghanistan, Iraq, Yemen or Somalia at any point in the last 20 years, the report said.

“The ongoing civil war in Syria was a significant factor in driving worldwide terrorism events in 2014,” it stated.

The report also noted that the Islamic State had deftly used the news media and social media to influence a wide spectrum of potential audiences: local Sunni Arab populations, potential recruits, and governments of coalition members and other populations around the world, including English-speaking audiences.

“ISIL has been adroit at using the most popular social and new media platforms (YouTube, Facebook and Twitter) to disseminate its messages broadly,” it said.

American counterterrorism officials have voiced increasing concern that the Islamic State, as well as Al Qaeda and its affiliates, is inspiring, but not necessarily directing, a greater number of so-called lone-wolf attacks — like the terrorist attacks last year in Ottawa and Sydney, Australia.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"These attacks may presage a new era in which centralized leadership of a terrorist organization matters less, group identity is more fluid, and violent extremist narratives focus on a wider range of alleged grievances and enemies," Ms. Kaidanow said.

An annex to the report indicates that the problem of terrorism has grown, though many of the figures reflect militant attacks in the wars in Iraq, Syria and Afghanistan. The number of terrorist attacks in 2014 was up 35 percent from 2013, while the number of fatalities from those assaults increased 81 percent.

The number of exceptionally lethal attacks has also grown. In 2014, there were 20 attacks that killed over 100 people. In 2013, there were only two such attacks.

The statistics, appended to the State Department report, were prepared by the National Consortium for the Study of Terrorism and Responses to Terrorism, at the University of Maryland.

Despite the increasing attacks, State Department officials said the United States was making headway in the struggle against terrorism, including by working with partners in the region. John Kirby, a State Department spokesman, said defeating the Islamic State would take time.

"It's going to take about three to five years," he said.

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS

The opacity of Hillary's Clinton's e-mail // WaPo // Rick Morris – June 19, 2015

In his June 12 op-ed, "Get the Benghazi panel back on track," Rep. Elijah Cummings (D-Md.) left out pertinent facts. First, requests from Congress and the Select Committee on Benghazi for documentation and information have gone either unanswered or the responses provided have been slow-rolled since late 2012. This is still occurring even with the release of former secretary of state Hillary Clinton's e-mails. The requests are being expedited now only because a court ordered it.

When Ms. Clinton, using a private computer server, determines which e-mails to turn over to State, there can be no accountability. Ms. Clinton deleted some 30,000 other e-mails. Regardless of your political position, it is difficult to assume transparency under those circumstances. Even if other secretaries of state used private e-mail accounts, none had a private e-mail server.

In addition, the FBI has determined that some information in at least one e-mail was considered classified and redacted it before it went to the committee. This contradicts statements Ms. Clinton made that no classified information was in her e-mails.

Hillary Clinton is playing the "woman card" too early // WaPo // Ed Rogers – June 19, 2015

Americans won't be doing themselves any favors if they make the same mistake three times in a row and elect a candidate who is more interested in acting as some sort of symbol than in being an engaged, working president. President Obama probably peaked on Election Day 2008. He thought he had done his job simply by getting elected and becoming an icon of America's progress on race. By being elected, he proved the melting pot is real. And as significant as that is, it hasn't made him an effective president. Obama is living proof that a president won't necessarily be feared or respected or succeed just because their election was some sort of symbolic breakthrough.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In 2016, it is urgent that we elect a president who actually has the skill set and personality required to be an effective leader at home and abroad. The presidency is not one-size-fits-all. It is a unique job that requires skills that are both innate and learned.

So is it smart for Hillary Clinton to play the "women card" this early in the race? She is already talking about the symbolism of her candidacy as a reason why we should support her. As she said in an interview with the Des Moines Register in Iowa on Sunday, "I expect to be judged on my merits, and the historic nature of my candidacy is one of the merits that I hope people take into account." Well, her campaign can't be pitched as a third Obama term and her own post-government private sector money hunt erodes her credibility in championing solutions to income inequality. Her record as Secretary of State doesn't exactly shine. She doesn't appear to feel particularly strongly about any particular issue. "Fighting for the middle class" isn't exactly a fresh, bold appeal. Anyway, the operative class is beginning to murmur, and a lot of the pundits cannot seem to discern what her real, ultimate campaign strategy is. Is her strategy just to hunker down, stick to a narrow script and play the "woman card"?

In the absence of anything else to say, Hillary Clinton has felt compelled to remind everybody that she is a woman and offer that fact as a key reason why one should vote for her. And perhaps relying on gender and the historic nature of the first female president would be a viable — if risky — plan for a frontrunner during the last ten days of a campaign, but sustaining this for a full eighteen months before election day will become untenable. She needs to build and maintain appeal for a long stretch ahead, and an overt reliance on her gender will not do the trick. Hillary Clinton will need to start answering questions and taking positions on the issues that matter most to the Democratic base, or she risks "Clinton Campaign" becoming a new synonym for "opaque and dodgy". Her campaign is on the brink of supplying more punchlines than real messages.

I have often thought the Democrats didn't want to have freewheeling relationships with the fair-minded media because they didn't want people to know what they really think. Hillary, on the other hand, doesn't want to deal with the media because she doesn't know what she believes. Sure, she's a classic liberal and all that, but she only knows for certain that she wants to be president. Everything else seems negotiable and her policy positions are — at best — situational.

Hillary Clinton wants to take us back to yesterday, not the future // Fox // Cal Thomas – June 18, 2015

In her reintroduction speech on Roosevelt Island in New York last Saturday, Hillary Clinton hit all the boilerplate liberal Democrat notes: The New Deal, big government, soak the rich, evil Wall Street ... you know the song because the music is from a familiar score.

Speaking of songs, Hillary Clinton made reference to The Beatles' "Yesterday" and tied it to the seemingly outdated ideas of the Republican Party. In light of what the country is facing, yesterday is looking increasingly better, particularly if one considers the foreign and domestic policies of Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush (minus some of the tax increases).

While Hillary Clinton wants to channel The Beatles, there is another song called "Yesterday" that may not be as familiar, but better describes her failed policies, as well as those of President Obama and Secretary of State John Kerry, who appear committed to an unverifiable nuclear deal with Iran.

Country singer Roy Clark sang this "Yesterday" song. Here are a few excerpts that might well be used to rebut Hillary Clinton:

"Seems the love I've known has always been

The most destructive kind

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yes, that's why now I feel so old

Before my time."

That could describe Clinton's relationship with her husband, but let's not go there again.

And then there's this: "The thousand dreams I dreamed, the splendid things I planned

I always built to last on weak and shifting sand."

Examples: Hillarycare, which was rejected by a Democratic Congress during her husband's first term, the absence of any significant legislation while she was a senator from New York, the failed "re-set" with Russia, Benghazi, Middle East policy, including the rise of ISIS, the hidden emails, the refusal, so far, to release her medical records, which might shed light on her fall and hospitalization while she was secretary of state. Need I go on?

Hillary Clinton succeeded as secretary of state in logging lots of airline miles at taxpayer expense, but no one seems to know what she actually accomplished. TV interviews of some of her supporters have produced no substantive answers to the question: "What has she done?"

Back to "Yesterday."

"I never stopped to think what life was all about

And every conversation I can now recall

Concerns itself with me and nothing else at all."

That seems fairly descriptive. It has always been about Hillary and Bill, hasn't it?

And then the quite sad last line of the song:

"There are so many songs in me that won't be sung,

I feel the bitter taste of tears upon my tongue.

The time has come for me to pay for Yesterday when I was young."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That “pay” will come in next year’s election if Republicans don’t blow their opportunity by cowering in the face of the bogus “war on women” attack and retreat on social issues as the secular wing of the party continues to urge them to do.

We only learn from the past. We can’t learn from the future because it hasn’t arrived. But we can help shape the future by not repeating the mistakes of yesterday, focusing instead on those things that have a track record of working.

Democrats want to cling to yesterday’s ideology, the one promoted by Franklin Roosevelt during different times. So who is really living in the past? All Hillary Clinton has to offer is bigger government, higher taxes, more spending on failed programs and a lax morality that has eaten away at the moral underpinnings of the nation.

To paraphrase FDR, the only thing we have to fear is Hillary Clinton, herself.

ASU suckered by Clinton Foundation // AZ Central // Laurie Roberts – June 19, 2015

As the world – and more importantly, the Arizona Legislature -- now knows, Arizona State University shelled out $500,000 for the privilege of hosting last year's Clinton Global Initiative University.

It was, Michael Crow has told us, "money well spent."

So says the sucker who paid half of million dollars to get the Clintons for this three-day "marketing opportunity."

Turns out at least three universities haven't paid a dime to host the Clinton Global Initiative University, according to The College Fix.

After learning of ASU's largesse, student reporters reached out to the six other schools that have hosted the weekend conference since its inception in 2008.

Tulane University said it didn't pay a dime to host the inaugural event.

Neither did the University of Texas at Austin, which hosted the 2009 conference. In fact, the Clinton Foundation reimbursed the UT's student government group $28,851 to cover its expenses.

George Washington University, the 2012 hosts, also paid nothing.

"As part of our partnership, we provided space on our campus and many of our students participated and volunteered during the meeting," a campus official told The College Fix. "We did not pay an honorarium to host."

Several private universities -- including the University of Miami, which has hosted the event twice – either didn't respond or declined to disclose whether they kicked in to bring the Clintons to town.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The only other public university to host the event, University of California at San Diego, has not yet responded to questions about whether it paid to land CGIU in 2011. The website reports that it expects an answer to its public records request in July. Unlike ASU, the school doesn't show up on a list of donors to the Clinton Foundation.

That leaves ASU thus far the only public university willing to pay to coax the Clintons to come to town. That is, ASU, the school so financially strapped that it is attaching a $320 surcharge to tuition this fall in order to get by.

Student reporters asked one of ASU's army of PR warriors if the school was aware that others got for free what ASU paid $500,000 to land. The school gave its usual non-answer, saying that "the university co-invested in this educational and promotional opportunity, which was co-produced for our students, and for students from around the world."

Last month, after being criticized for the expense, Crow wrote an op-ed explaining the $500,000 was a worthwhile marketing expense.

Hacks like me, he sniffed, "fail to recognize that the university is about outcomes, about creating master learners immersed in a diversity of thought and prepared for any career path. They fail to acknowledge what the university is and how it acquires what it needs to be successful."

Well, I'm all for master learners immersed in a diversity of thought. I'm just wondering why that diversity of thought costs so much bring here when UT can get it for free?

MISCELLANEOUS ADDED BY STAFF

Marriage Equality Is Only Step One // Medium // Gavin Newsom – June 18, 2015

In the next ten days, the United States Supreme Court will hand down its decision in Obergefell v. Hodges—a case that has the potential to take a place in history alongside landmark rulings such as Brown v. Board of Education, Loving v. Virginia, and Roe v. Wade. Depending on the outcome, same-sex couples across the nation could soon have the constitutional right to marry, a right that those of us outside the LGBT community have always taken for granted.

In 2004, the year we started to marry same-sex couples in San Francisco, it was impossible to imagine that this day might come so quickly. Even in that liberal community, my decision as Mayor of the City and County of San Francisco to order the County Clerk to issue marriage licenses to same-sex couples set off a firestorm of such magnitude that the controversy ended up in the California Supreme Court.

Although the Court halted the unions, more than 4,000 same-sex couples already had married in San Francisco, availing themselves of the right to have their relationships legally recognized for the first time, and giving their children the joy of seeing their parents' unions receive the same protections and validation as the marriages of the their friends' and classmates' parents.

On May 15, 2008, the California Supreme Court ruled that same-sex couples had the right to marry under the California Constitution. The joy that the court's decision brought was soon muted six months later when Proposition 8 enshrined discrimination into California's constitution with a simple phrase, "Only marriage between a man and a woman is valid or recognized in California."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After a lengthy battle, Prop 8 was overturned by the Federal District Court in August of 2010 on the basis that it violated the equal protection clause of the US Constitution.

Now, in 2015, after a series of victories in federal courts, 37 states allow same-sex marriage. If the Supreme Court affirms that the freedom to marry is a fundamental right, that ruling will overturn constitutional amendments across the country banning same-sex marriage.

While this certainly will be cause for celebration, bringing to a close a dark chapter in our history, I fear that the celebration of this milestone might lead some to believe that the fight for equality is over.

Far from it.

Over our history, even when the courts and Congress have acted to afford important and significant legal protections for fundamental rights—such as 19th Amendment,(women's suffrage) , the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Voting Rights Act, and Roe v. Wade—we have all too frequently seen those rights undermined in subsequent judicial decisions and laws enacted at the state and federal levels.

In 2013, for example, the Supreme Court gutted the Voting Rights Act, freeing states to change their voting laws and redistricting maps in ways that would effectively deprive many minority citizens their right to vote and to have equal representation. Chief Justice Roberts reasoned in his opinion for the Court's majority that, "Our country has changed" and such protections are no longer required. That would surprise the millions of citizens who still are prevented from early voting or required to meet onerous identification requirements at the polls. Restrictions on using race or gender as a criteria for school admissions, scholarships and hiring have eroded equal rights for minorities and women. And for decades, state legislatures have been passing laws that limit who may perform abortions, in what types of facilities, and at what stage of pregnancy, all of which have severely limited women's access to abortions in many states.

If the Supreme Court recognizes a constitutional right of same sex couples to marry, then we can almost certainly expect similar efforts to undermine that right. But even if the right to marry remains protected across the country, there is a long list of other rights that must be guaranteed before the LGBT community achieves full equality.

There still are no federal workplace protections against discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity expression; no federal anti-bullying laws to protect LGBT students; and we are nowhere near having in place adequate protections of the rights of transgender Americans. While same-sex marriage rights may soon be guaranteed, the patchwork of same-sex adoption laws across the states continues to be a source of great confusion and frustration for many prospective parents.

Beyond the changes that must take place through continued judicial and legislative action, more fundamental change is needed in public opinion.

The impetus for my decision to order the clerks in San Francisco to issue marriage licenses to same-sex couples was hearing then President George W. Bush call for a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage during his 2004 State of the Union address. "Our nation must defend the sanctity of marriage," he said, as though the nation—or marriage—were under attack.

But even more important to my decision was a conversation I overheard shortly afterwards at the coat check in the capitol. Two men were talking about how glad they were that President Bush was taking on same-sex marriage when one of them said, "I'm glad he's finally doing something about those homosexuals."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Those homosexuals"—in other words, those people who are in some fundamental way different from us. Unfortunately, even the Supreme Court cannot outlaw the underlying fear and ignorance that leads people to view "those homosexuals" as a problem we need to "do something about."

In the eleven years since the so-called "winter of love" in San Francisco, I have become the proud father of three young children. Regardless of what the Supreme Court decides later this month, by the time my children are old enough to consider marrying, I feel confident that the notion that a same-sex couple may not marry will seem as arcane and absurd as the separate lunch counters and drinking fountains of more than five decades ago.

But I'm less sure that the underlying prejudices will have disappeared. Until they have, we must all continue to fight for full equality. And we must fight to eliminate ignorance and hate.

Bigotry may never go completely away, but as the national referendum in favor of same-sex marriage in Ireland demonstrated just last month, majority attitudes can change—and with them, our public policy.

And when they do, it will truly be time to celebrate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "t r u t h o u t" <messenger@truthout.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 8/1/2014 8:12:12 AM
Subject: Big Players Promote Water Privatization

View Recent Newsletters

Tell a friend about Truthout!

Friday, 1 August 2014

truthout

Donate Today!

Truthout is a 501(c)3 nonprofit organization; donations are tax deductible.

Big Players Promote Water Privatization

Ellen Dannin, Truthout: Americans used to take water for granted, but the water shutoff in Detroit has taught us all important lessons. The private sector is willing to be ruthless in denying access to the most basic needs.

Read the Article

Rent or Tuition? The Growing Student Dilemma

Chris Wegemer, Truthout: Increasingly, economic pressures are forcing some to choose between paying for rent or tuition. But homeless college students remain overlooked - and no reliable nationwide data exists.

Read the Article

Fighting Bad Science in the Senate

Andrea Lynn, Next New Deal: The Senate hearing for the Women's Health Protection Act shows just how important it is for women's health advocates to push for the facts.

Read the Article

Utility Trade Group Funds ALEC Attack on Americans Using Solar

Nick Surgey, PRWatch: Although ALEC recently proclaimed it was being falsely portrayed as "anti-clean energy," recent revelations confirm that the group continues to pursue a polluters' wish list.

Read the Article

Anti-Politics and the 1%

Lorenzo Del Savio and Matteo Mameli, Truthout: There are two opposite forms of anti-politics, one striving toward a technocracy controlled by oligarchies and corporations, and one striving toward a radical democratization of society.

Read the Article

Labor and the BDS Movement: Two Perspectives

Andrew Ross and Jo-Ann Mort, New Labor

BuzzFlash

Amendment to Overturn Citizens United Now Supported by Half of Senate Members

Mark Karlin, BuzzFlash at Truthout: Yes, it may be a long, arduous haul to reclaim a populist democracy for the voters, but absent such activity, the US is stuck in the rut of plutocracy.

Read the BuzzFlash Commentary

Do We Have a New App for the Injured and Dying Children of Gaza?

Read the Article at BuzzFlash

Why the Children Fleeing Central America Will Not Stop Coming

Read the Article at

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Forum: For too long, the debate about how best to oppose the occupation of Palestine has been clouded, often intentionally, by strenuous deliberations over tactics. Trade unions are no strangers to these contests. Two activists debate the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions movement.
Read the Article

Report Criticizes EPA Oversight of Injection Wells

Naveena Sadasivam, ProPublica: A new congressional report says the EPA failed to adequately oversee hundreds of thousands of wells used to inject toxic oil and gas drilling waste deep underground.
Read the Article

Antiwar Protests Spreading in Ukraine as Government Wages All-Out War in the Southeast and NATO Threatens Russia

Roger Annis, Rabble: A rising wave of antiwar and anti-conscription protest is taking place in cities and towns across western Ukraine.
Read the Article

World Bank Board Declines to Revise Controversial Draft Policies

Jim Lobe, Inter Press Service: A key committee of the World Bank's governing board spurned appeals to revise a draft policy statement that risks rolling back several decades of reforms designed to protect indigenous populations, the poor and sensitive ecosystems.
Read the Article

Job Growth Slows in July

Dean Baker, Center for Economic and Policy Research: Wage growth slowed slightly in the last quarter to 1.8 percent, from 2.0 percent in the last year. The economy added 209,000 jobs in July, but it was a sharp slowing from its 277,000 average over the prior three months.
Read the Article

Support Truthout with a tax-deductible donation

Please add messenger@truthout.org to ensure you receive our messages
Truthout is a proud member of the New spaper Guild/CWA, Local 36047
Subscribe | Unsubscribe
Privacy Policy

Read the Article at The Nation

Charles P. Pierce | The Sad Clownhood of John Boehner
Read the Article at Esquire

Jon Stewart: Congress Is the "Sharknado 2" of Government
Watch the Video at The Daily Show

Paul Krugman | Knowledge Isn't Power
Read the Article at The New York Times

The Next Epidemic
Read the Article at The New Yorker

The Feds Are Demanding That Twitter Turn Over More User Info Than Ever
Read the Article at Mother Jones

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 1/5/2015 2:17:52 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Monday January 5, 2015 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Monday January 5, 2015 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

CNN: “Hillary Clinton's gender politics”

“Gender -- the issue that Hillary Clinton struggled to find her balance on during her 2008 campaign -- is front and center as she prepares for a possible 2016 presidential run.”

Washington Post: “Clinton, Clinton; Cuomo, Warren”

“History never repeats, but sometimes things circle back in intriguing ways. How else to explain parallels between 1992 and 2016, with a pair of candidates named Clinton, at the start of their presidential campaigns, shadowed by liberal icons of the Democratic Party?”

New York Times column: Frank Bruni: “Are Two Dynasties Our Destiny?”

“One of them? Sure. Both? Too much could go wrong.”

Boulder Daily Camera: “A conversation with Gary Hart: New policies for a new world”

FMR. SEN. GARY HART: “Are there a lot of people who want a woman president for the first time? Yes. Is she

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[Sec. Clinton] well-known? Yes. Is she experienced? Yes. Do those three things qualify her to be president at a time when new ideas, new people and new thinking are required? I'd just leave it at that."

Washington Post: "Local experts predict the sports, music and food D.C. will be buzzing about in 2015" [PARTIAL]

"Who will be the presidential nominees for 2016? Larry Sabato, director of the University of Virginia Center for Politics, edits the Crystal Ball website, which analyzes upcoming elections across the country. Sabato predicts Hillary Rodham Clinton will face off against Jeb Bush in 2016."

Electablog: Hillary's rise is inspiring — Jeb's is everything that's wrong with America

"The rise to become the first female frontrunner for the presidency is unprecedented in American history... Hillary Clinton deserves credit for career and the historic opportunity she may seize. Take on her policies, please. But don't do Republicans the favor of lumping her in with John Ellis Bush AKA Jeb."

New York Post: Page Six: "Hillary Clinton is already seeing big-name support"

"CEO of DreamWorks Animation Jeffrey Katzenberg and co-founder and CEO of Avenue Capital Group Marc Lasry are already planning on ways to support Hillary Rodham Clinton."

Wall Street Journal: "Top Iowa Democrats Slow to Rally Around Hillary Clinton"

"Iowa Democratic leaders say they are troubled by the prospect that Hillary Clinton could win the state's 2016 presidential caucuses without a serious challenge, a view primarily rooted in a desire for a more liberal candidate or at least a robust debate about the party's policies and direction."

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "What Iowa's Democratic Leaders Want: 4 Takeaways"

"Here are four takeaways drawn from interviews with more than half the Democratic chairpeople in Iowa's 99 counties."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Real Clear Politics: Video: “Van Susteren: I'm Not Convinced Hillary Is Going To Run; O'Malley ‘The Big Sleeper Candidate’”

GRETA VAN SUSTEREN: “I actually think the big surprise is going to be the Democratic side of the ledger, whether or not former secretary of state Hillary Clinton runs. I'm actually not convinced -- I'm not convinced she's going to run…”

Politico Magazine: Matt Latimer, speechwriter for Pres. George W. Bush: “Why Republicans Are Ready for Hillary”

“Conservatives do have one thing to be thankful for: The fact is that Hillary Clinton learned so many lessons from her surprising 2008 defeat that she’s repeating each of them all over again.”

Politico Magazine: Bill Scher, senior writer at the Campaign for America’s Future: “The Democrats’ Donkey in the Room”

“As the presidential race shifts into gear in 2015, much rides on how the expected Democratic nominee Hillary Clinton navigates these various poles in the Democratic big tent. Assuming she runs and maintains her wide lead among Democrats, she will have more say than anyone as to how Democrats define their post-Obama future.”

Articles:

CNN: “Hillary Clinton's gender politics”

By Maeve Reston

January 5, 2015

Gender -- the issue that Hillary Clinton struggled to find her balance on during her 2008 campaign -- is front and center as she prepares for a possible 2016 presidential run.

It is, in many ways, a remarkable evolution for a female politician once bedeviled by gender politics to the selfdefined "pantsuit aficionado and glass ceiling cracker" of today.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For much of this year, Clinton has spoken with ease -- and little controversy -- about female empowerment. At Tina Brown's 'Women in the World' conference in April, Clinton declared that the "double standard" for women was "alive and well." In countless public appearances, she has opened up about how that standard played out in her own career: from being underestimated by male colleagues as a young lawyer to the advice given to career women her age that they should keep family pictures off their desks.

The former Secretary of State has turned scrutiny about her scrunchies, headbands and hairstyles into laugh lines. She has poked fun at the sexist slights of foreign leaders—like that of Bulgarian Prime Minister Boyko Borisov, who told her he was briefed that she only wore her hair back when she was in a "bad mood."

She often advises young women to handle criticism by developing skin "as tough as a rhinoceros." And she rarely gave a speech this fall without reminding audiences she was soon to be a grandmother. The tableau was complete when she tweeted a softly lit image of her cradling newborn Charlotte while Bill Clinton beamed over her shoulder.

The careful choreography illustrates the attention her team is giving to reconnecting Clinton with Democratic women, a core constituency that Barack Obama was able to slice into during her first presidential run in 2008.

The renewed courtship essentially began with her concession speech in 2008 when she told supporters that although they hadn't "shattered that highest, hardest glass ceiling," it had "about 18 million cracks in it."

"Should she run, she has an opportunity to continue to build on what (Barack Obama) has done, and another fantastic step on that ladder is the possibility of the first woman president of the United States," said Tracy Sefl, who advised the Clinton campaign on communications strategy in 2008. "The possibility of a woman president is a welcome one, more so than is a foreign one."

Now, Clinton allies encouraging her to run see an opportunity for her not only to hold the Obama coalition, but to improve on his 2012 showing among women, which would spell trouble for her Republican opponent in 2016.

The President led among women by about 11 points in both 2008 and 2012. But some 56% of white women—which were a strong demographic for Clinton—favored 2012 Republican nominee Mitt Romney, compared to 42% for Obama in 2012. Obama also lost married women to Romney by 7 points.

This year's effort to put gender front and center is a nod to those numbers. It also reflects a politician who, after more than two decades in the public eye, is more comfortable sharing her personal experiences with voters.

Another asset is that Obama's historic election -- along with Clinton's competitive bid in 2008 -- changed societal expectations of what an American President must look like. In interviews during this year's midterm elections, many Democratic voters, particularly women, said they feel it is her turn for a historic victory.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Though Clinton has not defined her 2016 message, her speeches this year have hinted a partial framework for her candidacy: her argument that the 'women's issues' she has championed -- pay equity, family leave, raising the minimum wage, access to childcare -- are really "family issues" that are part of her life's work -- and that of her husband -- to boost the middle class.

"With women" in the next election cycle, Center for American Progress President Neera Tanden said, "the opportunity is to connect up these economic issues that they see as time challenges for them—like paid leave, or sick days or childcare—to a broader economic message."

"I can't think of anyone who would be better at doing that than Hillary Clinton," said Tanden, who advised Clinton on policy as first lady, senator from New York and during her presidential campaign.

Clinton is still a cautious speaker. But when it comes to connecting with other women through her own story, she seems more comfortable in her own skin than she did even a few years ago. It is an open question, however, whether independent voters and moderate Republican women will embrace the issues she seems most inclined to talk about in 2016.

"Her natural focus is that she wants to be seen as this person who is a champion for women. It remains to be seen whether that's a particularly successful general election strategy," said Katie Packer Gage, whose firm Burning Glass coaches Republican candidates on connecting with female voters. "Women just don't have history of voting for women; they have a pretty decent history of following their party behavior. So being a woman doesn't necessarily provide some kind of big advantage."

As Democratic Sen. Mark Udall's failed re-election campaign in Colorado this year showed, strategies that are too rooted in gender can backfire.

But Democratic pollster Celinda Lake said that during the 2008 recession male voters became more attuned and receptive to the economic issues that disproportionately affect women, like raising the minimum wage and pay equity.

"What happened in this recession was that men lost their jobs before women did," said Lake, who oversaw focus group research for the Clinton campaign in 1992 and served as a consultant to the campaign. "In lots and lots of families, you had the woman at some point as the primary, and maybe the only, breadwinner in the family. So this last recession really changed things."

Over her long career, Clinton's remarks about women's personal and career choices have often shaped the peaks and valleys of her popularity.

She was shadowed during her husband's 1992 campaign by his suggestion that American voters could "buy one, get one free." That notion quickly became a liability as Hillary Clinton's work as opponents scrutinized her work as a lawyer in the Rose Law Firm while he was governor of Arkansas, as well as her outspoken demeanor.

Fed up with what she considered "spurious" charges about her business dealings in March of 1992, Clinton delivered the disastrous retort that she "could have stayed home and baked cookies and had teas." When strung together with her earlier defense of her husband from charges of infidelity—"I'm not sitting here, some little woman standing by my man like Tammy Wynette"—she became a sharply polarizing figure among women.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Critics were venomous," she recalled in her first memoir, Living History. "I was called a Rorschach test for the American public, and it was an apt way of conveying the varied and extreme reactions that I provoked."

Even by the summer of that 1992 campaign, she noted, most Americans did not realize that she had a child. She relented to a joint People magazine interview where the couple described 12-year-old Chelsea, who appeared with them on the cover, as the center of their lives.

"Friends of the Clintons say that the public labeling of Hillary as an ambitious careerist misses her warmth and playfulness," one notable line from the 'People' profile said. Both Clintons defended her tea and cookies comment as misunderstanding. "It gave a totally false impression of who she is," her husband told the magazine, insisting that she had not been "muzzled" after the controversy.

Improving the First Lady's image among women and presenting her in a more "likeable light" became a preoccupation for the White House staff, as 1990s documents released by the National Archives this year reveal.

She regained some of her footing at a 1995 women's conference in Beijing where she said that "human rights are women's rights, and women's rights are human rights." In another sign of how the female-centered message will coincide with her campaign, the Clinton Foundation plans to release a report tracking women's progress since her 1995 speech this spring.

But as late as 1999 before her Senate run, she was still being advised by strategist Mandy Grunwald to try to show "more sides" of herself and look for "opportunities for humor" to avoiding coming off as so stern.

"The only two (female) candidates I can think of over time who were really perceived as being too tough are Dianne Feinstein and Hillary Clinton," said Dianne Bystrom, who has studied female politicians since the 1990s at Iowa State's Carrie Chapman Catt Center for Women and Politics.

That liability surfaced for Clinton most notably in 2008. She spoke early on about trying to break the glass ceiling of the presidency. But her campaign ultimately centered on the message that she was the only candidate with the strength and experience to lead. When she was asked what it meant to be a woman running as president, her answer was always that she was proud to be a woman making that attempt, but she was running because she thought she'd be the "best president."

Not long before her third place finish in the Iowa caucuses, Bystrom recalled, Hawkeye state polls indicated that voters perceived her as tougher than Obama, but less caring. Soon the campaign had launched a website full of soft testimonials from friends and admirers about the "Hillary I know," and cut ads featuring Clinton and her mother laughing in the kitchen.

She won the New Hampshire primary a day after startling voters by becoming emotional when asked how she was handling the pressure of the campaign. "It's not easy," she said as her eyes filled with tears before a group of undecided women at a Portsmouth, New Hampshire, diner.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Her campaign arranged other female-focused events in the long duel with Obama that followed, but that New Hampshire meeting would mark a rare moment of vulnerability for a candidate who was profiled in 'The New Yorker' in March 2008 as "The Irony Lady."

Clinton had soon swerved back to framing herself as "someone tested and ready to lead in a dangerous world," as one of her ads said—the person voters would want answering the phone at the White House at 3 a.m..

Looking ahead to 2016, Clinton seems unlikely to face the hurdle of a competitive primary, much less a battle over historic firsts. And after four years as Secretary of State—which tabled the experience question for many voters, according to polls—Clinton may feel that she simply has more latitude to talk about her life experiences in a more personal way than in previous campaigns.

"She has more freedom, because she has more political accomplishments than she did when she ran in 2008," said Jennifer Lawless, director of the Women & Politics Institute at American University. At the same time, "all of the Monday morning quarterbacking suggests that it was probably a mistake that (the 2008 Clinton campaign) took the women's vote at all different generation levels for granted."

Primary or not, Clinton and her team seem determined not to make that mistake again.

Washington Post: “Clinton, Clinton; Cuomo, Warren”

By Dan Balz

January 3, 2015

[Subtitle:] Could 2015 be like 1991 all over again? Democratic hopes for 2016 may be at stake.

History never repeats, but sometimes things circle back in intriguing ways. How else to explain parallels between 1992 and 2016, with a pair of candidates named Clinton, at the start of their presidential campaigns, shadowed by liberal icons of the Democratic Party?

For Bill Clinton, it was Mario Cuomo, the three-term governor of New York, who died on New Year’s Day this year. For Hillary Rodham Clinton, it is Elizabeth Warren, the first-term senator from Massachusetts. The two pairings speak to ever-present tensions within the Democratic Party. But they also highlight some important differences between then and now.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As Bill Clinton began his run for the White House in the fall of 1991, Cuomo loomed large. Most of the Democrats' heavyweights had already passed on the 1992 race. Then-president George H.W. Bush had started 1991 with a victory in the Persian Gulf War that took his approval rating to about 89 percent in the Gallup poll. At that point he looked unbeatable to risk-averse Democrats.

Clinton was among those who sensed an opportunity. He had come close to running in 1988 but chose to stay out. In the intervening four years, he had used his standing as the chairman of the Democratic Leadership Council to accelerate the process of trying to redefine his party, seeking to move it off its traditional liberal moorings toward a new centrist identification.

He was anything but a dominant front-runner in the fall of 1991, just one of a number of Democrats with hopes and dreams. Although he had served as governor of Arkansas almost continuously since 1978 (he lost his first bid for reelection in 1980) and had a network of friends that extended far beyond the borders of his home state, he knew he would have to prove himself to become the party's presidential nominee.

Cuomo, meanwhile, was a major figure, if a rather reluctant presidential candidate. He was the leading liberal in the Democratic Party, a politician of intellectual depth and rhetorical virtuosity. Through the 1980s, he was a counterweight to the philosophy of President Ronald Reagan and the rising conservative sentiment in the country. To the delight of his party's liberal base, Cuomo offered a vigorous defense of an expansive role for government, with an emphasis on aiding the poor, the homeless and the downtrodden.

By the late fall of 1991, as Clinton began his rise, Cuomo suddenly appeared as a potentially serious obstacle when he announced that he would consider entering the race. Clinton was both wary of, and ready for, a Cuomo challenge — wary due to the New York governor's national prominence and political heft; ready because he had been honing his arguments for years about the need for the Democrats to change if they hoped to recapture the White House.

Their differences were substantial. Cuomo's governmental philosophy, though he once called it "progressive pragmatism," was the embodiment of New Deal and Great Society ideas and values. After seeing Democrats defeated in three consecutive presidential elections, Clinton recognized that public faith in Great Society programs had waned, that constituency politics had its limits and that the cultural liberalism of the Democrats had created roadblocks with many voters whose support the party needed to win again nationally.

Clinton also knew at the time that there were doubts about him among party liberals. At a forum in Chicago in November 1991, he was asked a planted question about fears that he was a Republican posing as a Democrat. His answer showed his political agility to be a New Democrat rooted in old Democrat symbols. "My granddaddy thought when he died, he was going to Roosevelt," he said.

Throughout December of that year, Cuomo dithered until it was too late. On the day of the deadline for filing papers to enter the New Hampshire primary, there were chartered planes waiting on a tarmac in Albany to fly him to New Hampshire, a lectern set up outside the state capitol in Concord and throngs of reporters in each place awaiting what most thought would be a positive announcement.

In the end, Cuomo chose not to run, earning him the nickname "Hamlet on the Hudson." Mike Pride, the former editor of the Concord Monitor, tweeted the other day that, at the moment Cuomo said no, "Clinton exhaled."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrats and the country were denied what might have been an epic confrontation between old and new Democratic philosophies, offered by two of the party's brightest minds and political talents. We can only speculate how history might have been changed had that clash occurred.

Clinton was ready for a fight that never came. Instead he faced weaker opposition — and his own scarred past — in the nomination campaign. He was able to move his party to the right with relative ease.

The Warren effect

Now, more than two decades later, the dynamics of the Democratic nomination contest are different. Now it is the liberal wing calling for the party to change. Hillary Rodham Clinton is cast as the status quo candidate, a politician rooted in Democratic centrism, defending an older order ushered in by her husband.

Many in the progressive wing of the party — just how many isn't yet clear — are suspicious of the former secretary of state. They see the party as far too tied to corporate and moneyed interests. Fairly or unfairly, they blame the Clintons for much of this. Although Democrats under President Obama have moved left in some areas, progressives pointing to 2016 are restless and looking for someone to shake things up. In Warren they see the ideal candidate.

Whenever a story appears about divisions within the Democratic Party, there are objections raised by those who contend that Democrats across the spectrum are mostly in agreement on policy matters — economic and social. They argue that what Clinton wrought with his presidency has taken root within the party, that the differences are manufactured.

Progressives believe otherwise. They say there are substantial differences. Trade issues divided Democrats when Clinton ran in 1992 and still do today. Warren advocates increasing Social Security benefits at a time when some other Democrats believe they will need to be squeezed. But the gaps between those who see Warren as a champion and those rallying around Clinton appear far narrower than the differences that existed between Bill Clinton and Mario Cuomo.

The differences today are both issue-based and stylistic. Progressives are pushing for a sharper, more populist edge to the Democratic message, with more attention aimed at working- and middle-class families who haven't enjoyed the fruits of the economic recovery. Warren has that populist edge. Clinton so far does not.

Progressive reprise?

Two decades ago, Bill Clinton was ready to take on Cuomo and his philosophy — although his approach never involved a repudiation of the Democratic past. He always found a way to blend old and new. But today, the question is how much Hillary Clinton will feel the need to accommodate those who yearn for a Warren candidacy. How much will she move left, while remaining largely rooted where she is?

In the end, Hillary Clinton could end up as her husband did, without the party's contemporary liberal icon in the presidential field. Warren appears as or more reluctant than Cuomo did in 1991. Although she couches her denials in present tense — “I am not running for president — there is nothing that she is yet doing to suggest preparations for a serious campaign. Perhaps that will change.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

